ORDERS OF REFERENCE

Extract from the Minutes of Proceedings of the Senate of Tuesday, October 28, 1969:

"The Honourable Senator Croll moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Roebuck:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to investigate and report upon all aspects of poverty in Canada, whether urban, rural regional or otherwise, to define and elucidate the problem of poverty in Canada, and to recommend appropriate action to ensure the establishment of a more effective structure of remedial measures;

That the Committee have power to engage the services of such counsel, staff and technical advisors as may be necessary for the purpose of the inquiry;

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, and to report from time to time;

That the Committee be authorized to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee, to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate, and to adjourn from place to place;

That the evidence taken on the subject during the preceding session be referred to the Committee; and

After debate,

In amendment, the Honourable Senator McDonald moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Burchill, that the motion be not now adopted, but that it be amended by striking out paragraph 4 thereof and substituting therefor the following:—

"That the Committee be authorized to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee, to adjourn from place to place, and notwithstanding Rule 76 (4), to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate."

After debate, and—

The question being put on the motion in amendment, it was—
Resolved in the affirmative.

The question being put on the motion of the Honourable Senator Croll, seconded by the Honourable Senator Roebuck, as amended it was—
Resolved in the affirmative."

ROBERT FORTIER,
Clerk of the Senate.

Extract from the Minutes of Proceedings of the Senate of Wednesday, October 29, 1969.

"With leave of the Senate,

The Honourable Senator McDonald moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Smith:

That the names of the Honourable Senators Connolly (Halifax North) and MacDonald (Queens) be added to the list of Senators serving on the Special Committee of the Senate appointed to investigate and report all aspects of poverty in Canada; and

That the name of the Honourable Senator Nichol be removed from the list of Senators serving on the said Special Committee.

The question being put on the motion, it was—
Resolved in the affirmative."

ROBERT FORTIER,
Clerk of the Senate.

Clerk of the Committee.

BIOGRAPHICAL NOTES

Charles G. Munro: outstanding dairy farmer from Embro in Oxford County, an area that has won recognition as one of the most highly developed dairying sections in all of Canada.

Born in West Zorra Township, Oxford County, in 1916, Mr. Munro received his formal education in the Embro Public and Continuation Schools.

Charles has expanded the original 100-acre-farm into a modern 500-acre enterprise on which he has developed a fine herd of Holstein cattle. He ships his milk to the Toronto fluid milk market.

Mr. Munro is the immediate Past-President of the Ontario Federation of Agriculture. He was the second man in the history of the OFA to gain three consecutive one-year terms as its leader.

He is also President of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, and recently he was named a Vice-President of the International Federation of Agricultural Producers.

Despite the heavy demands of his farming operations, Mr. Munro has always found time to take an active part in church and community affairs.

He is a member of the Session of Knox Presbyterian Church in Embro, a past-president of the Oxford County Federation of Agriculture, a past-president of the Oxford County Holstein Association, a past-president of the Oxford County Soil and Crop Improvement Association, a past-chairman of the Oxford County Whole Milk Producers' Association, and a past master of Thistle Lodge, AF and AM, Embro.

In their earlier years, both Mr. and Mrs. Munro played an active role in Junior Farmer Activities. Mr. Munro is a past-president of the Oxford County Junior Farmers' Association, while Mrs. Munro was, at one time, a member of the executive of the Junior Farmers' Association of Ontario.

Mr. and Mrs. Munro have three proud children.

David L. Kirk: Executive Secretary Canadian Federation of Agriculture and Dairy Farmers of Canada. Born—Saskatoon, Saskatchewan, 1920. High School—Ottawa, Ontario. University —BA (Honours Economics)—University of Sask., 1942.

Joined Saskatchewan Wheat Pool on information and secretarial staff in 1944, where stayed until spring of 1953. Joined Canadian Federation of Agriculture in 1953.

Member: Economic Council of Canada. Canadian Consumer Council.

Chairman: Canadian Council on Rural Development.

Executive Member: Private Planning Association of Canada. Canadian-American Committee. Canadian Economic Policy Committee.

Associations: Agricultural Institute of Canada. Canadian Agricultural Economic Society. Canadian Association for Adult Education.

Stewart Sutton: Born — Coaticook, Que., 1909, married, 3 adult children.

Previous to graduation from the Department of Social Science (now the School of Social Work), University of Toronto, 1933, worked with the Big Brother Movement of Toronto, Toronto YMCA and latter with the Regina YMCA and the Saskatchewan Boys' Work Board of the Religious Education Council.

Following graduation spent a period of study at Hull House, Chicago under the guidance of the late Jane Adams and also with the Institute of Individual Psychology.

Was employed as a social worker with the Protestant Children's Homes, Toronto until 1936, subsequently for some years as Assistant Director of the York County Children's Aid Society and later Director of the Frontenac County Children's Aid Society, Kingston.

From 1942-1946 organized and directed the Directorate of Social Services for the Canadian Army and was briefly seconded to the Department of Veterans' Affairs in Ottawa to advise on the reorganization of its social service section and on medical and psychiatric social services.

1946-1955, Director of the Children's Aid Society, Toronto.

1955, UNICEF Representative in East and Central Africa.

1956, UNICEF Director for the Middle East.

1961, UNICEF Director for Continental Africa.

1963, International Director of International Social Service, Geneva.

January 1966, Secretary General, Vanier Institute of the Family.

Mrs. A. F. W. Plumptre (Beryl A.): attended the Canadian Conference on the Family in 1964 and has been a member of The Vanier Institute of the Family since its formation. She was elected President of the Institute in November 1968, succeeding Dr. Wilder Penfield, the Institute's first president.

From time to time Mrs. Plumptre has served as economic consultant to several federal government agencies—the Wartime Prices & Trade Board, the Tariff Board and the Royal Commission on Coastal Trading.

Formerly a member of the National Industrial Design Council, of the Advisory Council of Consumers to advise the Department of Health and Welfare on matters involving consumer interest pertaining to the Food & Drug Act and the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act, and of the Canadian Consumer Council. National President of the Consumers' Association of Canada 1961-66.

At present a member of: the Economic Council of Canada and the Ontario Economic Council, and a Director of The Canadian Welfare Council.

Also a member of: the Voluntary Action Committee of the Canadian Association of Adult Education.

Activities in other voluntary agencies have included: Canadian Red Cross, Ontario Board Member Toronto Children's Aid Society, Board Member Ottawa Children's Aid Society, Board Member Ottawa Family Service Agency, Board Member.

Mrs. Plumptre has travelled widely in Canada, speaking to consumer organizations, Canadian Clubs, industrial and union associations and conferences such as The Conference on Social Welfare, The Canadian Conference on Business Education in the Secondary School, The Managers Conference of the Federated Co-operatives, and The Canadian Tax Foundation Conference on The Report of the Royal Commission on Taxation.

(b) a chapter on learning in a recently published text book entitled, "Experimental Child Psychology".

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Tuesday, February 17, 1970

The Special Senate Committee on Poverty met this day at 9 a.m.

Senator David A. Croll (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, this morning we are to hear a presentation by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. On my right is Mr. Charles G. Munro, President of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, and who was recently named a Vice-president of the International Federation of Agricultural Producers. Sitting next to him is Mr. David L. Kirk, Executive Secretary of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and the Dairy Farmers of Canada. There are biographical sketches of both these gentlemen in your files.

Mr. Kirk will open the meeting by giving us a run-down of the brief.

Mr. David L. Kirk, Executive Secretary, Canadian Federation of Agriculture: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I shall try to be fairly brief. This is not a long submission to start with, but it makes a number of points that we think are worth making.

The first paragraphs are philosophical in their vein, and the basic point we make is that poverty is no longer a social and economic phenomenon with which we must try to deal, but which will, in fact, continue to exist. We believe that that traditional view of poverty is no longer held by people. Society increasingly is now saying that poverty should not exist. That is new, and is rather profoundly important and revolutionary in the final analysis. I do not know whether this is the impression you have been getting in your hearings, Mr. Chairman, but it is the feeling we have about poverty.

However, we must deal with the problem of poverty, however you may define it—and it is getting a broader definition all the time. We make the point that in programs dealing with poverty you are intervening in people's lives, even though you are trying to help. If you are going to intervene in people's lives then you must make sure that you intervene for the better, and you must make sure that you intervene in a way that treats people with dignity and respect. When you are intervening in people's lives by means of social planning of various kinds then you must do it in a way consonant with human dignity, and in a way that really helps, and that leaves people with a sense that they have had something to say about their lives.

This is what we mean by participation. We think that this is profoundly important, and we emphasize the aspects of participation without an adequate and open flow of information at all levels and stages of policy development. That is the point we want to make there.

There are two paths to the alleviation of poverty. One might be called welfare programs. That is to say, by provision of goods and services, either private or public, you try to increase the level of material and personal well-being of people. That is direct provision. The second is the developmental concept, that you do not give people anything but you help them make a living better. These are the two basic approaches to poverty. They, of course, inter-relate. Good welfare programs can profoundly affect the development of economic opportunity and successful economic development. Similarly, many programs that have welfare aspects are not purely welfare programs. They are social service programs, such as education and health, going far beyond poverty-stricken people. These kinds of programs inter-relate.

With those few remarks we arrive at the farm policy question in relation to the poverty problem and the situation of farm people. We say and believe it to be true that a great many farmers receive well below acceptable levels of income. There is no proposal known to us for an approach to agricultural policy which is acceptable even to the majority of farmers, much less to the Government, that offers the expectation of a really acceptable level of returns from agricultural production to the large majority of those persons now engaged in agriculture. That is a hard, brutal fact, and one of the main points we wish to emphasize.

There is not sufficient market in relation to our resources and the number of farmers. The current technology does not permit the indefinite continuation of present numbers of farmers on an economically viable basis. At the same time many farmers now in agriculture cannot be expected, realistically, to improve their position through change of occupation in their lifetime. In addition, there are extensive areas of the country where there are farm people who are boxed in badly by chronically high unemployment rates in alternative employment areas. That is true of Quebec, the Maritimes and other areas. Currently it is true also in the Prairie provinces.

We refer to the agricultural problem, limitations of the market, potentialities for expanding the market. We do know how great the potential is for some products. The producers think we had better stick to the domestic market and plan our production so that at least we have some security in milk, poultry and egg production. This leaves pork, beef, grains and oilseeds where the potential for export is the critical question. In other products there is a real export potential, but with huge question marks about the potentiality for increasing export markets. Overall, the point is that for the poverty question the field of opportunity for the small farmer is contracting and the farmers' legitimate need for security and price stability will likely lead to an increasing degree of planning. Such planning will leave little room for easy assumptions that the solution to the farmers' problems will be to produce in larger and larger quantity and more and more efficiently—that is the way to solve the farm problem. Because every planning proposal means for every person you say can be placed in a good position, that very plan says that another fellow is not going to make it.

That is the tough nature of agriculture planning. We find it very true in the dairy and even in the grain sectors. Many individuals will identify themselves as people for whom there is little or no hope of successful expansion into remunerative commercial production. Their position is going to get worse and worse, rather than better and better. There are many of these people.

In paragraph 22 at page 7 of our submission, we mention some of the variations to be found in personal circumstances. We say that to change the picture significantly for tens of thousands of small producers, for whom there are limited alternatives and for whom you just cannot expect that the industry is a very optimistic place, would involve much more extensive subsidization.

There are two basic areas of policy. One is mobility policy, retaining, re-establishment and all the package of mobility such as alternative employment opportunities. We are all in favour of a massive and very necessary effort in the agricultural field to facilitate agricultural adjustment and the search for new employment opportunity. We want that very much, but our thesis is that it still leaves a significant residual of people who will not and cannot be helped by these programs and who are going to be in an increasingly disadvantaged economic position year by year. There are anywhere from 50,000 to 100,000 of these people in agriculture today. So we must not fool ourselves that we are going to help all these people by retraining, re-establishment and mobility programs, no matter how desirable they are. They are not in a position to avail themselves of that type of program. It is not known how many there are, but we do know that the numbers are significant.

It is pointed out in our brief that farm policy in the sense of programs cannot be relied on to meet the problems of this sector, but we should not ignore the possibilities of giving marginal help to many of these people. Improvement of farm prices and market can be marginally helpful to the small farmer and very important to him programs of this nature have some advantages, but they have many weaknesses in the sense that they are inaccurate in their incidence. Who needs the assistance and who does not? However, they are inexpensive to administer and they may be only assistance available. For example, it is all very well to say that the small milk producer should not get $100 or $200 a year extra for his milk production through the support program. Where else is he going to get that amount of money each year? That is a good question as far as the small producer is concerned. Ultimately we arrive at a proposal for minimum incomes. We recognize the arguments against this and try to deal with them to some extent. We make a point which reverts to the earlier philosophical basis on the question of whether we can afford a minimum income policy. We say that it is an arguable matter. In terms of economic growth and investment needs, a strong argument can be made for the contention that we cannot afford it. The present stance in the country is that taxes are too high. We recognize that. But there will be an increasing credibility gap between those who say we can help and those who say we should help. There is an increasing basic scepticism in society that in this age of modern technology anybody has to be poor, in the traditional sense of the word at least, and if we do not recognize this I think we will get severe social disaffection, because that credibility gap is distinctly there, whatever the economic analysis. That is one of the propositions we put forward. We say there should be a minimum incomes policy. That is where we come on this sector of the farm group, where mobility adjustment, retraining and all that kind of thing cannot do the job.

We think price support programs planned to do that kind of job, to help the smaller farmer—might have some potential. A program of early retirement for farmers, where the land is purchased as part of a land used program, plus a program of helping small farmers, such as are widely used in Europe, so they can obtain a pension, is worth inquiring into.

I hope I have made clear our basic analysis, that developmental programs alone will not meet all the problems of all the farm people now getting into deeper and deeper trouble.

The Chairman: Mr. Munro, have you anything to add or will you wait for questions?

Mr. Charles G. Munro, President, Canadian Federation of Agriculture: At this point, Mr. Chairman, I will wait for the questions. I think Mr. Kirk has given a good summary.

Senator Pearson: I was interested in your brief, but you do not arrive at any cure. This is the problem with agriculture today. There is no cure for any of this poverty in the rural areas, whether it is in the non-farm group or the farm group. To take farmers off the land and retrain them is just to put them in the situation where they are pushed into the cities or towns where there is already this problem; there is no need to shove any more people into the cities, because they already have their problems. Just what would you do in the way of retraining? What have you in mind?

Mr. Kirk: There should be a package of policies to enable a person who wants to to obtain training. That is the minimum, that if somebody wants to he should be able to try to start a new life. There are many people, although by no means all of them, who, if there were policies available to make an adjustment, would be prepared to do so. It must not be assumed that farmers are a totally immobile group who will not change and will not shift. That is not right. The history of the past 20 years shows that; they are a most mobile group.

Senator Pearson: They are shifting on their own at the present time.

Mr. Kirk: They are shifting on their own under the force of attrition largely.

Senator Pearson: Your idea is that they should be retrained before they get away so that they are able to take positions in the city?

Mr. Kirk: There should be less attrition and more help.

Senator Pearson: What do you think of this program of their not leaving the land but going into stock, financing people to go into stock rather than into grain growing? Surely then there will be a flood of beef cattle, dairy cattle, poultry or pork. What will happen? We will very quickly have a surplus in another product instead of in grain.

Mr. Munro: That is clearly a very great concern to many of us, because this will not help the small producer in any event; He will not have the shifting ability; and furthermore he will not have sufficient product to help himself. For the farmer that we look on as economic, this becomes a terrific problem. In the poverty sense, this is not necessarily the whole problem. Moving into a modern hog operation, for example, requires a considerable amount of money and a lot of know-how. The same can be said of moving into a beef enterprise, in which, depending upon the type of operation, it may be two to four years before any return becomes noticeable to the producer. Any shift taking place there will be relatively slow.

As Mr. Kirk said, poultry, egg, dairy and vegetable producers are very conscious of the domestic market, because they see absolutely no hope of moving into exports, particularly because of dairy subsidy programs which result in dumping dairy products on world markets at absolutely fire sale prices. To embark on exporting poultry and vegetables is to move into with integrated operations, and we are generally at the wrong end of the market, due to our geographical location, to have any advantage.

Senator Pearson: If a small farmer is financed to go into poultry, at the present time he could produce 70,000 to 100,000 eggs a day and flood the local market. This can be done so easily nowadays. It is exactly the same with the hog market. A very few small farmers could flood the local market, and the problem is how to help all the small farmers in a district, because there are more small farmers than big farmers. I do not see how to create a median when they are allowed only so much.

Mr. Kirk: The first thing we say in our brief, which I should like to re-emphasise, is that we know of no agricultural policy that gives an out for everybody now engaged in agriculture. There is no such plan, and the reasons are rooted in the technology and the nature of the market. That is a fact, not an alternative, unfortunately. We wish it was not, because in the farm movement we have been knocking ourselves out for 50 years trying to find some way of beating that fact, but we have not been successful because there is no way to do it.

Senator Pearson: That comes to the only problem you have and that is to dispossess the small farmer of his lands by buying him out and putting him on pension or retraining him for some other kind of work.

Mr. Kirk: We would not put it that way. You have got to improve his opportunities on the economic side and improve the circumstances by some welfare programs, public or private. By private I mean provisions of privately used goods and publicly used services. I do not mean charity versus government. What we are saying is that you have got to do some of that if you expect to deal with that aspect of the poverty problem. It is as simple as that, because there is no other way for some and it would be very wrong to say that you are going to solve the problem by telling everybody that they must move into town if they are unable to make a living as a farmer. Many of them would be vastly worse off under those conditions.

It is rather a striking statistic that one-third of the total net income of Canadian agriculture is represented by farm produced goods and the imputed rent of farm homes. It shows how very widespread the income earning base is from that sort of income itself, and I think it is very remarkable in this day and age.

The Chairman: Would you please state that again?

Mr. Kirk: Your net income figures—they are aggregate figures for Canada and it is calculated by taking your cash sales and then deducting your expenses and getting the resultant. But also you put in a figure called income in kind, which is added to the cash receipts as a form of income, including goods used on the farm, such as farm wood lot utilization and the imputed rent on farm homes. All of that is one dollar out of every three of net farm income.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): I have one thing that I want to put into the minds of the committee here. We are talking about farmers who are moving to town. I think that we have a lesson to learn from what happened in the City of Montreal. Montreal, as you know, has the highest unemployment rate across Canada, which I think is between 16 and 20 per cent. You will find that most of these unemployed are farmers.

The Chairman: Senator Fournier, I do not wish to contradict you, but I have not seen any figure other than 8 or 9 per cent.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): I have seen 16 per cent.

The Chairman: All right.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): You will find out that these unemployed people are ones who left their farms in 1965 and 1966 and went to work in Montreal because there was a surplus of work, due to construction at Expo, the new highways and approaches. This was a boom and the farmer could make all kinds of money, but now these people become a problem to the city. This is an example and we should be careful in the future when hiring these farmers who are untrained and unskilled. There was a boom of employment, but only for a short period of time.

I would like to know more about the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. Are all 10 provinces members of this organization?

Mr. Munro: Mr. Chairman, with the exception of Newfoundland, all provinces are members.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): How do you affiliate, through the Department of Agriculture of the local association?

Mr. Munro: We would not go through any Department of Agriculture. This is the farmers' own organization. In each jurisdiction we have a provincial organization run by the farmers in that province. We have, as well, the Dairy Farmers of Canada, an organization established by the federation and the United Grain Growers, which stretch across the three Prairie Provinces and upper B.C. British Columbia. There is also the Horticultural Council, another organization that went back before the days of federation. It represents the fruit growing and vegetable industry. They are also members. That is the basis of our organization.

In the Province of Quebec we have really three strong organizations which form the basis of our membership. We have the L'Union Catholique des Cultivateurs, the Co-operative Federée de Quebec, and the Quebec Farmers' Association which is a group of English-speaking farmers, and I understand they are forming a fairly close alliance with the UCC. This is why we have the word "federation," because it is truly a federation, the same as Canada.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Would you have a rough idea of how many members are in the organization?

Mr. Munro: We do not operate with direct members except in some jurisdictions. The UCC has a direct membership base and in the Maritimes the organizations there operate on a direct membership, but many of our organizations do not necessarily identify their individual members. The scope of our organization, in one way or the other, takes in almost all farmers in Canada. This may seem an anomaly to you, because you are also aware that there is a national farmers union. We could be representing the one and same person through the association of that farmer and the fact that he has laid some money on the line to belong to the national farmers union.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Are the headquarters of the federation in Ottawa?

Mr. Munro: Yes. The address is 111 Spark Street, within sight of this building.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): I have one more question and then I will pass to somebody else. Your brief mentions little about farm labour. Is that not a problem for the small farmers, that they are unable to get farm labour?

Mr. Munro: I think the problem for the small farmer is that he does not generally want farm labour. Certainly if he operates in a small way, particularly with livestock, then it does become a problem, because he cannot afford to get sick. He cannot have any time off unless he can find someone to pick up the "chores," which is a farm expression. Another anomaly is that the farm labour becomes a problem for the larger economical farmers to get, and this is paradoxical. We have a surplus really of underemployed in one area of the country and we have the mobility to get them to where the jobs and this is becoming a very serious problem. I happen to be a dairy farmer and as President of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture it is necessary that I employ labour. I have always done this because I have never believed in a one-man operation. As I said, you cannot afford to get sick in that type of a situation. I, therefore, developed my own organization so that we could have people working for us enabling us to have time off and live somewhat like the rest of society. One can take holiday and everybody knows that they are going to get one. You can structure your operations so that when Sunday morning comes someone knows they are not going to have to get up at six o'clock and milk the cows. This is a problem in the structuring of agriculture in Canada today.

As a matter of fact, I was at the advisory committee meeting of the Farm Credit Corporation a couple of weeks ago and they were making recommendations for the freeing up of some money to establish some livestock operations in western Canada in the prairie region where the surplus of grains is at a disastrously high level. I said that if you are going to do that, give some thought to the development of not just one man operations but two men operations, whether the one man owns it and the other man works for him. I think it is cruel on the agricultural community that we are structuring on livestock and one man operations, for the reasons I have given.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): This is not exactly the type of labour I had in mind. I had in mind the small farmers who have about ten months out of the year and can go all right on the road but there is a period in the spring where they need help, when they are going to plough up grain in the ground, and there is a period in the fall where the farmer needs additional help, if it is only one person. This is where the problem of the small farmer arises. You cannot get men in the spring or in the fall, with the result that many small farmers have thought it better to give up, because they are getting older in age and they cannot carry on.

Mr. Munro: Mr. Chairman, if I may come back to that, this is part of the transition which has to take place. My concern, from an economic point of view, aside from the poverty problem, is that we do structure depth to our farms, so that our labour force is employed.

As to the labour force on my farm, may have to go a bit faster at certain times of the year, particularly if the weather is catchy in the spring period, but they are fully employed the year round. We structure our farm that way.

This is also the problem on cash crop farming that you mention, that there are high periods of stress. It is also the problem on certain types of crop farming—fruit and vegetables, tobacco. This has a very high seasonal import of labour, so this undoubtedly affects the situation.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Thank you, sir.

Senator Carter: I would like to follow on Senator Pearson's earlier questions. Mr. Kirk has emphasized both in the brief and in his reply to Senator Pearson that there is not one policy, and he has given examples that where you employ one you disemploy another, that you help one and probably put another out of business. Have you broken the overall problem down into segments—the ones which can be helped, on the one hand, the one that has possibilities—and the ones that cannot be helped, on the other hand? Have you devised policies for those that can be helped? Perhaps my question is not clear. You mentioned two divisions of agriculture—one geared to the domestic market and ones that have possibility in foreign or export markets. It seems to me that within those two groups there should be some groups that are not entirely hopeless.

Mr. Kirk: That is right. The Farm Credit Corporation has been the agency most directly involved in the individual decisions in the development of the farm industry as a whole. Their criteria historically has been that no one should be loaned any money unless they can make it economically. Of course, the trouble always with that kind of decision-making is that if you do not have a context of planning of the total economy, this accumulation of individual decisions can result in a situation that changes the basic economic situation that you are going by in the first place in lending the money. That is to say, you can create an excessive demand.

The answer, as far as that part of it is concerned, is "No, we have not got complete answers to that". There are some agricultural sectors where the producers simply do not believe it is worthwhile or desirable to plan in this way or share up the market. The dairy producers, the egg producers, the poultry producers are thinking in terms of sharing the market in a quite deliberate and systematic way, setting quotas, and then probably have some form of negotiability to that right to market access which allows for adjustment.

The beef producers on the other hand are a long way from any such concept, on the whole. On the whole, they do not believe in that very much, and for reasons that are clear in the beef industry. So there is a wide range of views on that part of it, that is, agricultural planning. In so far as you do plan, then you do of course pinpoint with more precision the limits of the opportunity of the industry for farmers as a whole. You say "this is the market" and then you have some mechanism whereby people get access to that market and under those conditions what happens is that you get a competition for quotas. The worst thing about that policy is that the value of the quotas becomes capitalized. That is the problem. There is no doubt that the farmers as a whole want to move towards more stability in their basic program. I think you would agree, Mr. Munro?

Mr. Munro: Yes.

Mr. Kirk: The historic instability and attrition and waste of human lives is the result of the farmers' blood-letting. There is a blood-letting that takes place in the farm industry, a competitive blood-letting. Farmers are fed up with that. They do not think that is the way to live.

In the circumstances, our basic position has been that we do not think any individual should have to be told that he must not farm. We have never come to that position. He should have opportunities for making alternate choices, and improved opportunities. We have always said that we think that good agricultural policy needs longterm agricultural structuring and adjustment and should have in it a program whereby the government can and will acquire land.

Senator Carter: Regarding the ones that have some economic viability, to what extent is that developed? You say you cannot force farmers to do this or that, and that a lot of individual plans add up to one cancelling out the other. You do not know what the ultimate result would be. To what extent does the individual farmer who is a marginal farmer, develop those plans with an intelligent assessment of what is likely to happen, what income he is likely to get? Or does he go ahead in blind hope, "I will do this anyway and hope to God things will work out". To what extent do you help farmers to band together to help themselves to eliminate chance as far as possible, to have at least some intelligent basis for their activity?

Mr. Munro: I think they are tied to tradition—and I have said this many times to farm meetings. I think they are tied too closely to tradition. It may be that our total society is too tied to tradition.

The innovators are relatively few in number and this becomes part of the total problem, because these people cannot adjust to the technology and may become in many instances unaware of the services that are available. In many instances they took up farming because their fathers were placed in that position through some program—it may have been a Government program of retirement from the army or something else—and they were placed in a location that, geographically, would not lend itself to modern technology in the use of equipment. So long as they were using horses in the irregular shape of their fields and their location was not as highly important factor, as it is today. Even within some of the better areas, geographically, we find those that are tied to tradition.

But my concern, basically, is that we have a program that somehow involves that individual as a person in the program. One of the most notable of our many programs was the ARDA program with which you are familiar. That started out as a philosophy to restructure the rural community. Basically it was to help these kinds of people. But those responsible for that program in the provinces saw it as a program to do physical things. That is not a very good word, but I think I convey my meaning. They wanted to do physical things rather than to involve the individual in the program.

Senator Pearson: In the community program?

Mr. Munro: Yes, rather than involve the disadvantaged individuals. As president of the Ontario Federation at that point in time, I found that we simply could not develop the thesis that it was the individual who was important. Very bluntly, our politicians saw the physical things, because they could stand up on election day and talk about the physical things—the dam that was built to control the flood waters in a river basin and so on. Those sorts of things that had formerly been done in another branch of Government were moved across, but the disadvantaged individuals were not gathered together in a conscientious program. As a matter of fact, I don't think we even had at that point in time sociologists trained to deal with that type of situation. I know in my own organization we had some transformation within the training of our own staff to deal with this situation, and some of those staff people did go across eventually and work for the Government.

Senator Carter: Would you make the same criticism of regional development which has taken over ARDA? Or would you take over the ARDA program?

Mr. Munro: Perhaps Mr. Kirk would like to answer that question.

Mr. Kirk: A couple of mistakes have been made. I am sure that this committee has heard a lot about the economics of optimum resource use, but there is another basic economic proposition which should be kept in mind and that is that you should always assume, in the absence of any other evidence, that an individual is making the best economic adjustment he can in his circumstances. Any other assumption is madness. Right? Now, I don't say that everyone does make the best adjustment possible, but that this is a very sound assumption to start with.

Then it may be asked how we then change the circumstances in order to change the incentives and the responses. It took 20 years to find the answer to that in respect of the programs for developing countries and international technical assistance. It finally sank in that the peasants in middle India, for example, were doing the best they could for themselves as they saw it, and probably as it actually was, and it was necessary to do something to change the rules for them, or change the opportunities, or else nothing would happen.

The same thing is true here. One thing that was not done so far as the small farmer was concerned was to really have any program that changed the package of economical alternatives that he was faced with. Not really. So nothing happened.

Another major mistake we have made was to adopt the idea that, in respect of the people about whom we are talking, they must be changed into something else, and that it is a question of major radical changes in all cases in all circumstances. I don't think it is. All that is necessary in some cases is a quite marginal change. Sometimes $100 or $200 or $300 in one form or another is very important. Especially is it important if you don't have any other program to take the disadvantaged individual out of his circumstances. In that case either he gets the $100 or he does not, and the $100 is a lot of money in terms of a net income of $2,000 or $2,500.

Senator Carter: So these little subsidies on milk are important to him.

Mr. Kirk: Yes, they are.

Senator Inman: Mr. Chairman, coming from a small agricultural province, Prince Edward Island, and having been born on a farm and feeling quite close to the farmers there, I am particularly interested in this brief. On page 2, paragraph 5, there is an enumeration of programs to help people. In the middle of that paragraph the brief says:

Fourthly, there are real problems in making sure that administrations, beset by many problems and pressures, and the need for internal order and consistency, achieve necessary flexibility and responsiveness in dealing with the people they are supposed to assist.

Is this a question of administration and do you find many cases where administration is to blame?

Mr. Kirk: Administration is to blame, yes. What I should like to make clear here is that that statement should be taken particularly in relation to the sort of listing seen in paragraph 22 on page 7. That is a listing of all the different circumstances—or some of them, at least—which people can find themselves in. There are some alternative income sources that some people adopt; some people are older, some are not; some are in debt, some are not; and so on and so forth. The point is that a perfect program would have a good deal of selectivity and flexibility in it, because of the complexity of the circumstances in which the people with whom you are concerned live. It would be extremely difficult, especially in federal programs, to achieve flexibility and responsiveness in a program that seems tolerable administratively. You need rules, in other words. You need what looks like equity of application in the sense that at least one rule should apply to everybody. But one rule applying to everybody, far from treating everybody alike, may in fact treat everybody differently. One rule does not apply to everybody. This is a basic problem of programs aimed at getting at individual people. I think it is a basic problem, and I don't know any answer to it, except through the participation means. By participation I mean that you ask these people and you work with them and you tell them what is going on and you help them. That does not mean you do anything they say, because it can't work like that. But you are very honest and open about what you are prepared or not prepared to do, and you are willing to reconsider.

Senator Inman: I was thinking of this in the context of and in connection with programs such as NewStart which we have had in operation for the last year and a half or two years in Prince Edward Island. Do you know about that?

Mr. Kirk: Very generally. I am not really thoroughly acquainted with it.

Senator Inman: Under this program an effort is being made to take people off farms that are not very productive, and a great many people are not very happy about it, of course.

However, to continue, on page 3 you mention about the lack of power. You say "it is becoming increasingly clear that one of the hidden causes of continued poverty is a lack of power." What do you mean by that?

Mr. Kirk: I think that is the old question that is so often mentioned these days; too many organizations do not represent the poor, and that in fact the poor are not represented at all. I think it would be fair to say even about our own organization that while we are concerned about the poor, for us to stand up in a naive sense and say that the basic power base in our organization in terms of representation comes from the very poor in the farm community would be flatly wrong.

Senator Inman: You say they are not given enough power and responsibility. Does that refer to the making of decisions regarding housing or equipment, or what do you mean by that?

Mr. Kirk: When you have a program like NewStart, responsibility can mean that in fact you involve the people concerned so that they make some of the decisions about how the NewStart program works. I think that is what is meant by responsibility. Secondly it means that they are not merely manipulated, and this is where administration comes in again. Participation can be very difficult. You go out to a community and you say "we want to hear what you have to say, and we want to help," but if there is a plan already prepared that really has no potential for real modification in response to the demands made, then everything that is suggested fouls up the basic policy structure and is rejected. Then what you end up doing is trying to sell these people on your policy and you just are not interested in getting a policy from them.

Senator Inman: We have a very strong federation of agriculture in Prince Edward Island and I have in mind, for instance, two farms where the farmers went into a lot of expensive equipment, but after three or four years they were left with practically nothing. They had over-bought themselves. In one instance a farmer had bought two or three heavy tractors and another man bought two combines. Consequently they could not pay for them. These instances come to mind in the context of responsibility and the seeking of advice about this sort of thing.

Mr. Kirk: That is disastrous extension, isn't it? I think there has been a great deal of disastrous extension in the Maritimes.

Senator Inman: Yes, because our farms do not warrant it. We might have two or three farms of 500 acres or so in Prince Edward Island, but the average farm does not run to much more than 200 acres.

Mr. Kirk: I do not really know this, but I have had a suspicion for many years—and this is a personal view—that we have not given nearly enough attention to adapting our technology or finding a technology that can best be adapted to some of these cases you are talking about. What has been done is simply to try to transfer a large farm technology to these medium-sized farms. What you need in fact is a better technology for farms of this size.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): In many cases people like this were advised by experienced salesmen. Here I am not referring just to salesman or equipment, but to salesmen who are experts in agriculture. Being from New Brunswick I know what happens in these cases.

Senator Inman: Then in paragraph 37 in page 10 you speak of the principal alternative that appears to be available, and you mention early retirement for farmers associated with land purchase policies. However, I wonder if this would be beneficial to the individual. We have spoken of this situation before where a farmer was getting on in years and could no longer operate his farm and making him retire. But is this beneficial to him when he has worked all his life on a farm?

Mr. Kirk: Well, if it is not, you must not make him do it in the first place. Of course there must be quite a number of people who, within their physical capacities can maintain production on a very small acreage, and with the retention of their house for the rest of their lives can retain the benefits of that income. However, the cases we are speaking of are where individuals may have a house, but have very little other real income to start with. If you acquire his land and make fairly generous annuity payments in compensation for it, you might be helping greatly. You might very well, it seems to us, save a considerable expenditure of resources in farm production that is not very economical. There are many instances where you could give people who have next to nothing some security and some income and enable them to live in the neighbourhood where they belong and still have their house, garden and maybe a wood lot for the stove. That is the kind of thing we are thinking of.

Senator Inman: I am in full agreement with that because some of these people when they move away from the farms and into the towns are very unhappy.

Mr. Munro: Mr. Chairman, there is another aspect that we should keep in mind. If there is such a program, you not only help these people by leaving them in their houses and leaving them in the communities that they know and are content in, but you do something else as well; that is you stop the next generation by the purchase program from getting into an even worse position on that piece of property trying to eke a living from agriculture on a diminishing base in our technology.

Senator McGrand: The first question I want to ask relates to page 8 where you refer to the development of new employment opportunities in rural areas. Before dealing with that, however, I have another question to ask. Is there an over-production of butter or the danger of an over-production of butter in Canada?

Mr. Kirk: Yes, more butter is being produced in this current dairy year in Canada than is being consumed.

Senator McGrand: I understand that this situation is general throughout the world, is that right?

Mr. Kirk: Yes, it is pretty general. Ours is just a drop in the bucket compared with the total surplus.

Senator McGrand: And I understand that in Britain, Holland, Belgium, Norway and in European countries generally they do not produce enough food for themselves. I understand there is no European country producing enough food for itself.

The Chairman: France does, doesn't it?

Senator McGrand: There is no European country producing enough food for itself, so there is a chance to import Canadian food. However, the agriculture in those countries is protected. They produce and sell what they have, and then, what they do not have, they can import. So, Canadian agricultural products going into those countries are going into a market that is sort of loaded against them, are they not?

Mr. Kirk: Right.

Senator McGrand: That is one of our big problems.

What is the future in these small areas, the small farms, the six-o'clock-in-the-morning-every-day-of-the-week farms, and this sort of thing? What is the future of co-operative action where small farmers can pool their livestock, and so on, and put them into a large compound with all the technical equipment, and can do a real job which they cannot afford to do individually? I do not mean that they give up their jurisdiction over it, but they have community planning. What is the possibility of developing that in these problem areas?

Mr. Kirk: I think the potentialities are very great, just as they have been in the past, except for one problem. That is that Canadian farmers and people generally do not have and do not want to acquire social skills involved in that kind of co-operative.

Senator McGrand: It is a question of teaching them. You will not do it with the man 60 years of age, but you can with people in their thirties. I thought this was one of the things ARDA was going to do.

Mr. Kirk: Broadly speaking, I think it is true to say—except to a limited degree in Saskatchewan, for a period—that there has never been any real governmental support to the co-operative philosophy of farming. The Co-operative Union of Canada has tried to push it, but the difficulty is due to the fact that farmers have not been exactly complaining bitterly day in and day out about it, they are not all that enamoured of the idea themselves.

The Chairman: Are you not the greatest individualists we have in Canada?

Mr. Munro: Can we answer this another way? The only successful one I know of works on a different basis, it is social and religious—the Hutterites; but there you have a different philosophy of life completely. Our hope of developing that in the rest of the economy, I am afraid, is not very great. Unfortunately, from my point of view, I think we are moving the other way.

Mr. Kirk: I wish it could happen; it would be wonderful.

Senator McGrand: You are from Ontario and know Ontario well. What are your problem areas? Eastern Ontario—I have heard so much about it—the Bruce Peninsula, the Muskoka area, are they the areas where it is most difficult to keep agriculture alive?

Mr. Munro: Frankly, it is those areas where the geographic base for agriculture is limited due to thin soil—Prince Edward County has thin soil and is droughty—due to a shallow base and high rock level, and it would get little rainfall in the summertime. Then there are the irregular shaped fields of those areas traditionally. But interspersed through the rest of the country we do have problem areas.

Senator McGrand: Having asked those introductory questions, will you answer the one on page 8 concerning the development of new employment opportunities in rural areas? What does that mean?

Mr. Kirk: The Department of Regional Economic Expansion will tell you it means nothing. They tried it and it is not a viable way to go at it. Broadly speaking, as I understand it, the philosophy of the new department is that they had better concentrate on the larger growth centres in disadvantaged regions, because they are not going to create widely dispersed new employment opportunities in small centres.

It must be admitted that in the ARDA program, although it was an early objective of the program to create a widely dispersed economic base, in terms of small processing plants, tourist development opportunities, farm vacations and all kinds of things, it just has not worked out that way. All we are saying is that we are not really convinced that there are not real opportunities there, if we went at it better.

Senator McGrand: What happened to ARDA?

Mr. Kirk: The bulk of the actual money, apart from research money, was spent in soil and water development projects which, broadly speaking, were not relevant to these very small farmers. That is the shortest, simplest answer.

Senator Carter: I thought the underlying principle of ARDA was better utilization of land resources. If land was being put to a certain use, if it could be better utilized for a woodlot or building houses, I thought the idea was to change the use of the land.

Mr. Kirk: Yes, and there has been a certain development of reforestation and some things like that, including community pastures. It would be very wrong to say nothing was done under ARDA. A great deal was done, but they were not employment development programs, on the whole; they were resources programs, as you have pointed out. These simply did not impinge on very large portions of the population, and I do not think there was enough intensified on-the-spot, on-the-ground search and exploration for that kind of opportunity.

I can find people in this country who still say that huge opportunities, not making $1 million but for a little help and better employment and better use of resources, are being neglected because there is not sufficient detailed attention on the ground to working with people in that area, so money flows in easily and rapidly if the case is made, in small amounts, if necessary. People still say that there is still a great potential there.

I wish I could be much better informed about it. It is a big subject, but we are saying we think you should not totally neglect those possibilities yet and that you should still work to them.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Who are the people who are saying those things? I think this can reflect on ARDA too. Who are the people who were going to New Brunswick with a great big program and trying to sell ARDA? Were they qualified; did they know what they were talking about?

Mr. Kirk: I really cannot answer that question. In principle, the federal Government established the framework for policy-making and the provinces made the policy. It did not work quite this simply. The very existence of the federal policy put a lot of pressure on the provinces to act. I do not know who the people are. It is a very complicated process and I do not think you could pin them down. I think the New Brunswick Government wanted to do something and tried to, and they had this federal opportunity.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): I cannot agree with you, and we are certainly not going to get into an argument. They were not provincial, but federal employees.

The Chairman: I have just two questions. If maintenance income is accepted, is there to be a differential between rural and urban groups?

Mr. Kirk: I think that that is a matter that should be discussed in very great detail. It would depend upon the level, to start with. For instance, if you had a low level of income as a matter of general policy, and it was a recognized part of that policy that you would have to supplement that income in many areas, then that is one thing...

The Chairman: But, Mr. Kirk, it would not make any sense to put in a maintenance income if it did not meet the needs of the people. If you are going to have to supplement it then it is not maintenance income, is it?

Mr. Kirk: Let us take this negative income tax proposal. It is quite clear that there are some families in some urban locations where the maintenance of their income at the level of the income tax exemption would not suffice.

The Chairman: But, take the level mentioned by the Economic Council. This morning one of our great political parties made a declaration of policy in which it said: "We are opposed to income tax for people who are below the poverty line as defined by the Economic Council." That is an important declaration. In the light, of that statement would you have a variation between the rural and urban areas. That is my question. Perhaps you would think about that for a moment. My next question concerns the credibility gap in respect of which you said the question is: "Can we, or can we not?" What is your view?

Mr. Kirk: My view is that we had better move fairly rapidly towards doing it.

The Chairman: We must be able to afford it, or we should not get into it. Is that what you said?

Mr. Kirk: Yes, that is what I said.

The Chairman: Let us get into it quickly.

Mr. Kirk: Yes.

Senator Carter: Does Mr. Kirk mean that the longer we wait the less we shall be able to afford it?

The Chairman: I hope not.

Mr. Kirk: Let me answer your first question in this way: It is undeniable that individual circumstances differ in respect of maintenance incomes. That is undeniable. If the thing was based upon criteria that did not create more injustices than it eliminated—well, it is an administrative problem again. I would want to know exactly what you mean by “some areas” and “some persons” with respect to differentials. I would not be against differentials in principle.

The Chairman: I did not suggest a differential, Mr. Kirk.

Mr. Kirk: I thought you did.

The Chairman: No, I asked if you were in favour of a differential. If you have read our record then you will know that we are not for it. At least, we have not indicated that we are for it.

Mr. Kirk: I see.

The Chairman: Dr. MacEachen, and Professor Eagleson, whom we heard a short time ago, were very emphatic about there being no differential. You are another group with an agricultural background, and I wanted to ask you that same question. With respect to the credibility gap, they were also of the view that we can afford it, and we ought to get on with it. You agree with that?

Mr. Kirk: Yes, I do.

The Chairman: And that is your view as well, Mr. Munro?

Mr. Munro: Yes.

Senator Fergusson: Mr. Chairman, you have asked the question I was going to ask about the differential. My other questions are very brief. All the references have been made to people who own farms, but nothing has been said at all about the people who are farm labourers. They do not belong to your organization, of course, but you must have a closer association with them than we have. I wonder whether there is any future for that sort of people. Is it possible that they could be trained to become experts in their fields?

Mr. Munro: I think I can answer that question. Those who are in that field now generally get to be experts. Certainly those who work for me are experts. You do not find those people in the areas that we are concerned about in respect of poverty. Those that I know have a good income because they have complete mobility. They can move to good jobs, and the farms that employ farm labour are generally those types of operations that have scale enough that they can pay a decent wage. In all fairness, I do not think these people are suffering.

If I can use a personal example, I know a man who worked for me for twelve years, and he has now retired because he has got to that time in life when he has had a slight heart attack. The man who is following him has been with me for ten years, and he is still only 32 years of age, and is married with a young family. He commands a good wage by anyone's standard in the labouring field, because he is not only a labourer but he has management responsibilities.

These people are in a good position, and there is a crying need among the economic farm units for this type of people who have these skills.

Senator Fergusson: Could we not train more people to fill that need?

Mr. Munro: That is a good question, because some of us are not able to find people with these skills within Canada, and we have to reach outside Canada and bring people in from other countries. This is something in regard to which there has not been a conscientious program in Canada. In the United Kingdom the people that form the basis of the work force on the farms have a great deal of stability, and that stability comes from their early training.

The Chairman: Does Manpower enter into this in any way?

Mr. Kirk: Manpower does.

Senator Fergusson: Does Manpower give some training?

Mr. Kirk: Yes, they do have some programs of farm training, but I do not know that they are as well developed as they should be. There is an increase in demand among farmers for such people.

Senator Fergusson: But we have people who want to work, and this is something that they can be trained to do.

Mr. Kirk: Yes, I think we should look at that very intensively.

Mr. Munro: This is an anomaly in our times, because we have those who are disadvantaged and those who need help, yet although the Department of Manpower and Immigration is involved I do not believe that they are doing an adequate job.

Further to that, I know that in my own Province of Ontario in order to take care of this the provincial Government inaugurated a program because of the inadequacy of the federal one. In my opinion this is ridiculous.

Senator Fergusson: How is it working in your province?

Mr. Munro: Trained labourers are recruited in Europe.

Senator Fergusson: Further to what Senator McGrand said about the employment opportunities in rural areas, why can we not develop Canadian handicrafts in rural areas? For instance, we have beautiful woods, so why can we not manufacture Canadian furniture? Is this not one opportunity that might give employment to people living in rural areas? I do not mean furniture alone, but various other articles.

Mr. Kirk: There is one shop in Ottawa which manufactures traditional type furniture in a relatively small way. It has been very successful and perhaps could be expanded.

Senator Fergusson: I do not mean luxury type products. It could be kitchen chairs and a great many ordinary items made from our wonderful lumber. I wonder if this has been tried and whether it would work?

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): The people who have the ability to do that have no money, so you are right back where you started.

Senator Quatt: I have heard arguments for and against guaranteed annual income. I hope this question will not embarrass you. Would your group be in favour of a guaranteed annual income?

The Chairman: Yes, they said so in the brief.

Senator Quatt: I have not had a chance to read the brief.

The Chairman: They are very emphatic about it. The question also arose as to whether the country could afford guaranteed income. They are of the opinion that we can afford it and should get on with it right away.

We are going to have a member of our staff contact Mr. Kirk to see what further information he can provide in relation to the European experience of purchasing farms, leaving people on them and giving them an annuity or allowance. Mr. Kirk, you have literature and knowledge on that subject.

Mr. Kirk: Yes.

The Chairman: Our staff will speak to you with regard to this at some time immediately after the hearing. Will you provide the information to them?

Mr. Kirk: Yes.

Senator MacDonald: I have been a member of the Federation of Agriculture of Prince Edward Island for many years, and I would like to deal with the difficulties in the farming population. I had a very good friend there, J. Lincoln Dewar, who died a few months ago. I am sure you must have known him.

Mr. Kirk: Yes.

Senator MacDonald: In 1935 the Farm Loan Board was revamped and put into operation with branches throughout the country. The limit of the loan then was $6,000. Anyone who was in debt had to possess sufficient physical assets to secure a loan. We also had another organization, known as the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act under which, if a farmer owed $5,000, both secured and unsecured liabilities, and the appraiser found that he was not competent to meet his payments, he could recommend a loan and refer him to the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. In some cases the Supreme Court heard the application.

The Chairman: Senator MacDonald, would you mind getting to the question. We are running short of time.

Senator MacDonald: This is information which I am sure the members of the committee would like to hear about the cause of many of the difficulties in farming communities.

Some years ago the Government raised the amount of the loans to $40,000, but an applicant had to have sufficient physical assets to secure it. I have been informed that many people received big loans and are now so badly loaded down with debt that they are ruined. That is one of our troubles. Another fact which I will mention more especially for those who do not farm is that a few years ago the Government saw fit that in the purchase of a tractor, for instance, a certain percentage was paid as a down payment and the remainder loaned by the bank. That was fine, but pay day generally comes around and here is where the difficulty started. Some farmers would buy too much machinery on that basis. That is one of the factors that has caused much of the difficulty. In addition, some of these people would borrow from finance companies in order to settle their debts, paying 16 or 20 per cent interest on the loan, thus going into debt again.

I am not asking you to answer this unless you wish to do so. Do you think that any of these factors have been the cause of difficulties?

Mr. Kirk: In individual cases probably people have got overloaded with credit in relation to their ability to earn an income from it. That kind of thing is not really the basic nature of the agricultural problem, which is the fundamental economic situation of increasing productivity and limited markets.

Mr. Munro: These are not the people who we are concerned with in this brief. We are thinking of people who are not able and never have been able to even borrow money, because they had no real equity.

Senator Pearson: You are referring to the scarcity of markets. Given a little assistance a small farmer could produce more than the market would stand. Do you think we in this country should start working on a basis of scarcity rather than plenty, and that the guaranteed income should fill the gap?

Mr. Kirk: Farmers are all in favour of working on a policy of plenty, provided they can get paid. It is as simple as that. They are congenitally inclined to produce plenty; they do it all the time. Their problem is that they do not get paid enough for it. The small farmers that we are talking about do not contribute a large proportion of the total production, and the kinds of things we are suggesting will not significantly increase that proportion. The surplus problem does not arise primarily in this group.

Senator McGrand: It seems to me that when we discuss these things it is always suggested that people in rural Canada should be trained for jobs in industry in the urban areas.

The Chairman: That is not what he said.

Senator McGrand: That suggestion seems to go on and on. About ten years ago, when a Senate committee studied the manpower problem, there was a report that in this technological age people would have to be trained three or four times during their lifetime for new jobs, that so many million jobs must be found by 1970 and so many million jobs must be found by 1974. It is frightening to contemplate where these job opportunities will come from if we continue to try to take people out of the rural areas and train them to live in the large cities. If you were given an amount of money to look after somebody, where would you prefer to keep him, in the country or in the city? In the country where taxes pay the rents or in the city where rents are high? In the country, where he can grow a certain amount of his own food? Would you answer that question for me? To me that is important.

Mr. Kirk: First of all I would ask the man what he wants to do, and then I would work out the best way with him.

Senator McGrand: Say you have a certain amount of money. It seems to me better to pay these people to stay where they are than to spend money training them.

Mr. Kirk: The central point in this brief is that, as you say, there are a great many people for whom you will not meet the problem by talking about mobility, manpower and resettlement. That is the central point in our brief.

The Chairman: Perhaps, senator, you would not mind my saying this. I think the committee might be interested. One of the significant things that has happened as a result of the old age security supplement is that these people have not moved to the city or to more urban areas, that there has been a significant movement of older people from urban areas into smaller areas, where the money goes further. From our point of view, that is a very important statistic, which I saw recently, on which we will shortly have some evidence.

Senator McGrand: That is why I asked that question.

The Chairman: May I, on behalf of the committee, say to you, Mr. Munro and Mr. Kirk, that you have presented a very interesting brief. It had much of philosophy and a great deal of realism. It was a thoughtful brief on your part, it was helpful to us, and we are very appreciative.

Mr. Munro: Thank you very much. Thank you for hearing us.

The Chairman: We now have a brief presented by The Vanier Institute of the Family. On my immediate right is Mrs. Plumptre, who is very well known to all of you, and you have her curriculum vitae in the record. Next to her is Thomas J. Ryan, a professor at Carleton University, and Mr. Stuart Sutton, who is Secretary General of the organization. Mrs. Plumptre will make an opening statement to cover the highlights and then questioning will commence.

Mrs. A. F. W. Plumptre, President, The Vanier Institute of the Family: Mr. Chairman, honourable senators, The Vanier Institute of the Family wishes to thank you for this opportunity to present our submission, and to express to you our concern regarding the large number of Canadian families now living in poverty. We also wish to commend your chairman and the members of the Senate for their quick response to the suggestion of the Economic Council that the Senate "might consider the advisability of creating a committee to inquire into the problem of poverty in Canada". The evidence submitted to your committee and your deliberations will, we hope, strengthen the determination of Canadians to respond actively to the call of the Economic Council "for a national commitment to move towards the elimination of poverty."

In examining the evidence submitted to your committee and other studies, we have been interested in a particular theme which has been discussed in a number of these documents—the influence of the institutions in our society on poverty and the biases against the poor which exist in various institutions. We have been struck by the persistence of this theme of institutional and institutionalized discrimination. In our submission we have suggested a hypothesis which, if fully substantiated, could help not only to explain poverty, but to indicate definite lines for policy and action for the eventual elimination of poverty in Canada. We have taken this approach because we believe that the process of formulating and testing such hypotheses is going to be essential to the further development of effective anti-poverty policies. It is our hope that the theory of poverty we present and the questions we raise will be further examined and tested by your committee and your staff, and that it will, like other theories of poverty, generate wide debate.

The hypothesis which we submit for discussion is that there is in our society pervasive discrimination against low-income people—discrimination which, consciously or unconsciously, permeates the policies of most of our major institutions. Through this discrimination the poor are excluded from the broader social and economic participation which is open to others. It is the exclusion of low-income people, when this exclusion is not voluntary on their part, which we define as the essence of poverty.

The social and economic environment, a product of the attitudes and activities of the whole society, is embodied in large measure in social institutions. We have families and communities and governments, we have churches and clubs in abundance, we have markets for labour and for products, we have school systems and political parties. A close examination of the policies of at least the major institutions would be necessary to test the hypothesis that there is pervasive institutional discrimination against the poor. We have not undertaken such a test, but we have drawn together some of the readily available evidence presented in testimony to your committee or in the results of recent research in Canada. The cumulative effect of this evidence, to us at least, indicates that a full and searching examination and documentation of the way many institutions function is urgently needed. To us, this preliminary evidence suggests that this hypothesis of institutional discrimination might go a long way towards explaining how poverty is created and sustained in an affluent society.

It might also help to explain the difference between the characteristics of the poor and the non-poor. If the risk of becoming poor through income-interruption is greater at low levels of income, and if the poor are functioning in an environment in other ways less receptive or more hostile than that of the non-poor (to a degree which cannot be explained simply by the lower relative incomes of the poor), then, given equal effort and skill on the part of both, a poor man can expect to achieve less success in any given endeavour.

The experience of less success or more frequent failure will affect attitudes and expectations. It could affect school leaving age. It could affect employability. A relatively harsher environment could further reinforce disadvantage and discrimination as the individual and the environment interact. Is there evidence to suggest that this indeed is happening in our society? Is there evidence that some of our citizens live in a Canada Minor where they are not merely poor but where the very fact of their poverty serves to keep them poor?

Our brief examination of the evidence relating to the policies of some of our major institutions indicates that the form of discrimination which had the most serious effect within the whole institutional structure is the discrimination associated with unemployment. Low-income workers also experience discrimination in other ways, such as lack of information on jobs, lack of training and adequate counselling, and earnings too low to support a family at an acceptable standard of living. But the most discouraging is that resulting from unemployment. The unskilled marginal worker, the old and the very young worker, these are the people who suffer most from income interruption. Although least able to bear it, they are the first persons to feel the burden of unemployment when restrictive policies are necessary to maintain price stability. Can poverty be eliminated if steps are not taken to shield the poor from the full brunt of maintaining price stability?

As we have pointed out in our submission, the poor also experience discrimination through policies of other institutions. As consumers, it is not simply the difficulty of having less purchasing power. Less information, more fraud, higher prices associated with small quantity purchases, lack of transportation for family shopping, and many other elements enter to reduce further the real income that their limited dollars represent. Moreover, consumer problems for poor families may be particularly serious because they can affect income-earning ability quite directly. Access to credit, to health services and information (especially on nutrition and family planning), to transportation, to education and to various forms of public services are especially significant. Discrimination against the poor by such institutions as supply these goods and services could have grave consequences.

Here, honourable senators, I wish to draw your attention briefly to two of these areas of discrimination which we have discussed more fully in our submission—consumer credit education. Consumer loans are made partly on the basis of an applicant's assets but chiefly on the stability of his income. A marginal unskilled worker who has few assets and who has a high risk of income interruption through unemployment, has more difficulty securing credit than workers with more assets and regular income. This inability to secure credit may and often does cause severe hardship for families of such a worker. It may even result, and often does, in forcing him out of his job.

But this policy which discriminates against the poor could also be economically wasteful. If credit worthiness rather than the probable productivity of the loan is the basis for issuing consumer credit, and if, on this criterion, a poor applicant is refused credit for purposes such as further training for himself or for more education for his children—that is for investment in human capital—then society loses as well as the applicant. The Special Joint Committee on Consumer Credit recommended that loans to the poor should be guaranteed on the grounds of equity. We would add to these grounds those of economic productivity. The contention that “red convertibles” should not take precedence over loans to the poor for productive purposes is an argument supportable on grounds both of equity and efficiency. This is an argument of particular importance at a time when restrictions on consumer credit are being considered. Reducing availability of consumer credit irrespective of its proposed use would clearly be discriminatory against the poor as well as economically wasteful.

With respect to education the evidence to support an hypothesis of discrimination is very strong. Dr. Ryan of Carleton College is here to discuss with you the results of research to date which indicate that the experience of a very young child in a deprived environment may so affect its future development that it may never develop its full potential. This is the area where the Economic Council of Canada and the Vanier Institute are jointly sponsoring further research.

Within the school system itself, the system takes a large toll of children from low-income families. Their progress tends to be slower, their grades lower, and their drop-out rate higher than that of their classmates from non-poor homes. Those children from low-income families who persist in the school system are also much less likely to continue their education than are children from non-poor families. Higher education in this country still requires some substantial commitment of personal resources, and also some evidence, for admission, of good past performance. Both may be particularly difficult for the student from a poor family to provide.

Honourable senators, you have already received testimony indicating the discrimination which many of the poor experience in regard to housing, and to which we have drawn your attention in our submission. We cannot stress too strongly the disrupting effect of dilapidated houses, overcrowding, lack of heat, of adequate sanitary facilities and of privacy on family life. It is a sad commentary on our society that only in recent years has there been evidence of a serious public commitment in Canada to provide better homes and a better environment for poor citizens. The gross inadequacy of the provision of public housing units in the past is a matter of record. Even though housing for low incomes is now, for the first time, forming a really significant proportion of new housing construction there is still no reason for complacency either regarding the supply of housing for families living in poverty, or in the administration of these units.

Most regrettable is the discrimination which the poor experience under our system of justice. It would be difficult to defend the view that all Canadians feel equal before the law. It would also be difficult to maintain that the poor do not experience discrimination in the enforcement of the law and its daily application to their lives. Evidence indicates discrimination through the system of administering family law, through the high cost of divorce proceedings and the application of reciprocal enforcement of maintenance orders under various provincial legislations.

The poor do not understand their rights under the law, nor do they always have the resources to fight for these rights or to protect their interests. Legal aid in some provinces, especially in Ontario, offers some help, but is only touching the tip of the iceberg and still not assisting those who are submerged. Until the poor have assistance in understanding the law and knowing their rights they will continue, not without reason, to regard the law not as a protection of their rights but as a source of injustice.

For many years there has been considerable debate regarding the need for reform of our tax structure. This is not the time to discuss the Federal Government's proposals for this reform, but we would like to raise some questions which indicate the need for a system more equitable for the poor. Why, for example, have we tolerated a policy which places a higher proportional burden of taxation on those with low incomes than those with higher incomes? Why do we favour those with high incomes by accepting the principle of permitting exemptions from incomes rather than giving tax credits? Why is there no provision permitting the deduction of expenses incurred by an employee in earning wages? Why is a deduction not permitted for child-care expenses when both or the only parent is working? And in relation to the fiscal policies, why are those who are excluded from the Canada Pension Plan and Unemployment Insurance predominately the poor?

Information systems constitute one of our social institutions. Much of the available information is vital to the efficient performance of individuals and families in labour markets, consumer markets or capital markets. Much of the vital information does not reach the poor. Often, mainly through lack of facility in reading, the poor are not aware of many occurrences or opportunities which could be helpful to them in their roles as workers, consumers, parents etc. Are we failing in our responsibility to the poor by not developing and using radio and television in a more informative, creative and educational way?

All this preliminary evidence indicates strongly to us that the current policies of our institutions may be maintaining poverty in Canada or at the very least delaying its elimination: it also indicates that to the degree the poor have characteristics which differ from those of the non-poor, some part of this difference is likely to be attributable to the unpleasant experiences they have accumulated in the environment in which they live. Alienation from society constitutes a rational response to an environment in which they experience insecurity of income, social exclusion, non-participation and physical deprivation. To ask them to change in the absence of environmental change is to ask for irrationality on their part.

No anti-poverty policies which aim to change the individual without changing the environment in which he functions are likely to succeed in eliminating poverty. To be fully effective, these policies must change the policies of all our institutions which discriminate against the poor. This calls for a careful and systematic examination of these institutions, and the involvement in anti-poverty policies of all those responsible for the policies of these institutions. Since institutional change does not require additional resources but a re-allocation of existing efforts and the re-thinking of existing priorities, important anti-poverty policies can be undertaken even at a time when the overall demands on the economy cannot be increased for fear of generating further inflation.

RECOMMENDATIONS

At this point it must be stressed that the most important factor for the elimination of poverty is the rate of growth of the economy and the provision of jobs through his growth. But the experience of recent years when our economy has grown and expanded indicates that growth alone will not solve the problem of poverty. The majority of Canadian families and individuals have benefited from the increasing affluence of our society, but many members have been left behind in poverty suffering from inadequate incomes and an inadequate standard of living.

We have submitted for debate the hypothesis that the essence of poverty is the exclusion of the poor from the broad social and economic participation in our society which is open to others. In other words, because of the pervasive discrimination in the policies of our major institutions, the poor are unable to lift themselves and their families above the poverty line, and so remain in poverty.

1. If we are fully committed to eliminate poverty from our society then a strong central agency responsible for the direction and co-ordination of anti-poverty policies should be established. This organization would involve not only those responsible for anti-poverty policies of governments at all levels, but also those responsible for the policies of our institutions.

2. This agency would be responsible for the direction of a study in depth of the policies and structure of our major institutions to ascertain the extent to which these institutions exclude the poor from social and economic participation in our society.

3. In the near future, the Federal Government will be announcing new policies on taxation and social security. These policies should be carefully examined to ensure that any recommended policies and actions should not continue discrimination by these institutions against the poor. In the case of taxation policies, assessment should be made to ensure that any regressive measures more burdensome to lower groups should be avoided.

The social security policy should ensure security of income, tied to fluctuations in the cost of living, to those persons who cannot earn adequate incomes. This income should be sufficient to provide an acceptable standard of living for these individuals and their families.

4. Accepting the thesis that the poor do not lack the motivation to work, we maintain that the most devastating discrimination against the poor is the lack of opportunity for regular employment which will provide sufficient earnings to keep a worker's family at an acceptable standard of living. Those who wish to work should have the right to work. To adopt a policy which forces a worker out of his job, and to offer him welfare rather than another job when he wants to work is an insult to his human dignity. This principle—the right to work—has particular importance at the present time when restrictive policies are aiming to secure price stability. The burden of unemployment is falling on those least able to bear it—the unskilled and marginal workers, the old worker and the very young worker. Statistics of unemployment should indicate the level of unemployment among these workers as compared with that of skilled workers.

Are we as citizens fully accepting our responsibilities for the social effects of our economic policies? When jobs disappear, incomes of the unemployed are partially maintained through unemployment insurance payments, or failing these through welfare payments. Are we willing as citizens to continue policies which discriminate against a large proportion of our population, are costly to us as taxpayers and ignore the opportunity of increasing productivity in areas where we are demanding increased production—such as more hospitals, better services, better housing and other facilities? Is it more costly to society to use human resources productively than to maintain them on welfare payments? Are our welfare policies closely associated with those who could organize the production of services and better public facilities need by society? Why is there an entrepreneurial gap between the worker on welfare and possible productive employment? Are governments and industry making available sufficient training facilities for workers whether they need additional basic education or training in work skills, so they will be able to meet the requirements of jobs in productive employment? Do we lack the imagination, intelligence, courage and determination to guarantee jobs for all those who desire them?

These are questions we must face if we are really determined to eliminate poverty and to enable all citizens to participate fully in our social and economic environment. To remove the basic causes of poverty rather than ameliorating the problems of the poor demands the involvement of all sections of the community, government and non-government.

Honourable senators, you have accepted a most important challenge. You are fortunate to have a chairman who in the past has accepted many challenges which he has met with constructive ideas and recommendations. We are sure your report will be no exception in this regard. We look forward to this report which we hope will make Canadians realize fully both our responsibilities and the action we must undertake for the removal of the canker of poverty from our society.

Proféssor Thomas J. Ryan, Associate Professor, Carleton University: Mr. Chairman and honourable senators, this portion of the brief has focused upon the children who are growing up under conditions of poverty, of whom there are approximately 1½ million in Canada. For these children, poverty is to be considered not so much in terms of economic deprivation, but more in terms of the physical and experiential deprivation commonly associated with economic deficit.

There are two introductory statements which I would like to make. First, there is sufficient evidence to indicate that a child's physical, cognitive, and social development is largely determined by conditions experienced during the first five years of life. Second, any program designed to combat poverty and the effects of poverty will not attain maximum success unless there is included a means of providing infants and young children with adequate cognitive and social stimulation, as well as physical care.

The most visible evidence comes from assessing school performance. Children from low socio-economic groups reach a deficit in school performance in grade 1 which becomes relatively worse throughout the school years. Certainly, part of the problem stems from "middle class" school systems attempting to serve "every class" children. But there is more to it than that. Measures of physical, intellectual, language, and certain aspects of personality development, all of which are positively related to academic achievement, reveal that children from lower socio-economic groups perform more poorly than children from higher socio-economic backgrounds.

Much is known about the causal factors behind these poor performance levels. For example, inadequate nutrition during pregnancy and the first few years of life is related to infant mortality and morbidity, physical development and capacity to learn, and the knowledge of and the capability of providing nutritional requirements varies considerably across socio-economic groups. Intellectual development is a function of early learning experiences; the provision of such experiences differs markedly between socio-economic groups. Language is largely learned through parental rewards and through imitation of adults. Parents from lower socio-economic groups are not prone to reward verbal behaviour nor do they provide a good model for speech development. Achievement motivation is positively related to socio-economic status as well as to academic success, and lower-class as compared with middle-class mothers are less likely to encourage and reward achievement-oriented behaviour.

Based upon the data from longitudinal studies, curves of growth and development lead to the generalization that a child's development does not progress in equal units per unit of time. Periods of rapid growth tend to be in the early years of life followed by periods of less and less rapid growth. This differential rate of growth with time is important to note because the importance of the influences which affect growth and development is likely to be far greater in the period of rapid development of a characteristic than in a period of less rapid development.

The results of investigations which have manipulated the early childhood environments of disadvantaged and retarded children are indeed encouraging. The beneficial changes in the intellectual performance of children, as a result of having experienced an effective intervention program, should be sufficient to arouse the attention of Canadian governmental bodies. While advocating the benefits of environmental stimulation during early childhood, it is fully realized that the timing and type of intervention as well as its long-term effects are not fully known and are in need of extensive research.

In Canada, research programs for disadvantaged children are sparse, uncoordinated and undersupported. Each program stands on its own when, without too much effort, an integrated program of research making better use of present resources could more efficiently gather the information needed. We should no longer allow the provision of early childhood experiences and the evaluation of their effects to proceed in a haphazard manner. Integrating the sources of financial support would facilitate the development of a research policy, promote the development of urgently needed longitudinal research projects and would be guaranteed support for their duration.

The recommendations in this brief have taken into account the need for social action as well as the need for research. The efforts of federal, provincial and municipal governments have been advocated. It has been suggested that the federal Government might serve as an information clearing house, an advisory bureau in the development of research policy. An elaboration of these functions is contained in the brief. One or more provincial governments might initiate a university-based child development centre which could become the basic research centre for the development of new techniques for disadvantaged children. Specialized graduate training in child development is also needed in Canada.

Finally, it is suggested that municipalities should become involved in, first, the development of preschool centres; second, the establishment of "corner nurseries"; third, programs of home tutoring and, fourth, the provision of mobile nursery schools for rural areas. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator Ferguson: I should like to compliment Mrs. Plumptre on her excellent brief. She summarized it very well in her presentation today.

I find it rather discouraging that apparently the institute believes that until there is a change in society's attitude toward the poor there really is not much we can do. How in the world are we ever going to accomplish a change in attitude.

Mrs. Plumptre: You have raised a very good point, senator. Quite frankly, most Canadians don't realize the plight of the poor, which is one of the real problems facing your committee. But the fact that you are having these hearings across Canada and because of the information you are bringing out you are making people realize the great need for something to be done.

We feel and hope, as is obvious from our brief, that a body will be established to research these institutions — not only the ones we have mentioned but other institutions as well — to really indicate how, sometimes quite inadvertently, they do discriminate against the poor. I think as people begin to realize this is the case, a change in their attitude will come about. In respect of such discrimination, people are only beginning to realize that our taxation, for example, has been regressive; they are only beginning to recognize many of the difficulties that the poor suffer under the system of justice. That fact has come out very strongly in some of the evidence submitted to you.

As you say, we just don't realize, and we must keep at it, because it involves all citizens making up their minds that they are not going to have poverty in their midst.

Senator Fergusson: I suppose it can only be through the efforts of committees such as ours and other similar bodies that we will bring to the attention of the public and persuade them that the poor have been discriminated against.

Mrs. Plumptre: Quite frankly, I am very disturbed by this problem. In fact, our board had quite a discussion on this topic when we were going through the brief, and we were very disturbed, too, with the problem of unemployment. The burden is falling on the unemployed.

An editorial in the Globe and Mail on Saturday is quite indicative of the emphasis that should be placed on this problem, because it shows the increase in millions of dollars that is going to be spent in just one city merely because of increased unemployment. The question that comes to mind immediately is whether any study has been made to show the real cost of what we are paying in welfare to the unemployed who want to work — not the people who need welfare continually, but the unemployed who really want to work. We are spending millions of dollars to keep them alive on a subsistence level. Are we really incapable of taking those resources and putting them to work for us? After all, the money is being spend anyway.

Senator Fergusson: Yes, the same money could be put to much better use with much better results.

Mrs. Plumptre: I should hope so.

Senator Fergusson: On page 14 of your brief, Mrs. Plumptre, you refer to the cost of divorce proceedings. You say that a further source of discrimination is the high cost of divorce proceedings, especially since the adoption of the new federal legislation. I am very sorry to hear that the new federal legislation has not been all to the good. We thought we had done something wonderful.

Mrs. Plumptre: Unfortunately, it would appear to be the case. This point was brought up by a member of the board, a seasoned member of the legal profession who is working in legal aid. I don't like saying this about the legal profession, but in this gentleman's city the legal profession, apparently, is now saying that, whereas a divorce used to cost $500, it will now cost $800 and, if the person wishing to get a divorce does not have the $800, too bad. In other words, it used to be $500 and it is now $800.

The Chairman: Let us deal with the poor first. There has been evidence before this committee that the poor in the province of Ontario can obtain legal aid and obtain a divorce. That evidence has been before this committee. In Winnipeg we heard similar evidence with respect to Manitoba. That is a fact, and is a result of the hearing and the heat we applied at our hearing.

Divorce is not really the problem that troubles us the most, however. Nor am I defending the legal profession when I say that I don't believe the statement you made is complete.

Mrs. Plumptre: Mr. Chairman, I should like to draw the attention of the committee to the latest issue of the Law Society Gazette, in which an article on legal aid points out that legal aid has still a long way to go before it meets the needs of the poor.

I should also like to draw your attention to an error in our brief. On page 14 we attribute a statement to the Minister of Finance. It should have been the Minister of Justice.

Senator Fergusson: I have another question referring to page 14 of the brief, in the middle of the page where you have a statement—"Similarly the application of reciprocal enforcement of maintenance orders under various provincial legislation, affecting deserted and separated spouses and their children work serious injustices on the poor." Would you elaborate on that?

Mrs. Plumptre: This comes from a study which we are doing at the present time and we have been very diligent to have evidence forthcoming to justify the study. If a court issues a maintenance order against an individual, and the man skips off to another province, hundreds of dollars may be spent in tracing him, and then if he has no job, he goes into jail and the family goes on relief. There is this considerable difficulty in enforcing maintenance orders because of provincial regulations. There is a study of which you may have read done by the Ontario Law Commission under the chairmanship of Mr. Baxter, and they have dealt with this problem and also with the question of reform of the civil code in Quebec. In both studies they are dealing with the question of maintenance orders and the difficulty in questions of family law. It is very surprising how much improvement is needed, and the studies, I think, will show that there is need not only for improvement in administration, but for reform in the law itself.

Senator Fergusson: Will it recommend changes in the law?

Mrs. Plumptre: We hope so. It is still in the process of conducting its study.

Senator Fergusson: At this stage I would like to say that although you announce that Mr. Stewart Sutton is the executive general secretary, I should like to mention for the benefit of members of the committee who may not know it, that he has been a very distinguished employee of the United Nations in the UNICEF. He has worked throughout the world, and I think the Vanier Institute are to be congratulated on having him as secretary general.

Mrs. Plumptre: We certainly agree.

Senator Carter: Mrs. Plumptre, the essence of your brief, as I interpret it, is that the poor are victims of their environment, and their environment is determined largely by the attitudes of certain groups that make up the public at large.

Mrs. Plumptre: Yes.

Senator Carter: And you say that no matter what programs we develop, welfare programs or income programs, it is not going to make much difference unless we change those attitudes.

Mrs. Plumptre: Yes.

Senator Carter: That at least is your hypothesis which you have not tested, and you say in your brief or at least you suggest that this committee should do this testing.

Mrs. Plumptre: It is not just the attitudes, but also the policies of the institutions.

Senator Carter: But you cannot divorce policies from attitudes. Are they not related? Do not attitudes determine policies?

Mrs. Plumptre: Yes, but I just want to emphasize that the policies are not of themselves the real reason for discrimination. However, I am sorry to keep interrupting.

Senator Carter: Then, my first question is this; how can one go about testing your hypothesis? It is such a broad thing. Do you suggest that we should take two parts of it or two elements of it and test those?

Mrs. Plumptre: I would hope there would be somebody who would test them all. For example, let us take the labour market. Why don't we test the whole labour market to ascertain the extent to which the labour market discriminates against the poor? This we feel to be the very basic and most important discrimination which the poor have to suffer. Take the case of a young man or a boy who wants a job. He has no skills and no training and he lives in a poor environment where people do not buy a newspaper. Now, he may ask his friends about opportunities for jobs, but they are in the same situation that he is in. He may get a job and he may not, but right at that moment the discrimination starts. But then take the case of a boy or a young man who has been to school and who has received some training and has achieved some skill. His family can direct him into something or he is in touch with people who in turn are in touch with industry and because of this he is enabled to make a start.

Senator Carter: Well, in a sense that is true, but in another sense it is not. I agree that to a certain extent the discrimination is there but it arises out of the young man's handicaps or lack of skill.

Mrs. Plumptre: But what is the basis of the handicap?

Senator Carter: Let us develop this a little. How do you suggest that any policy to change this can be implemented? We are wrestling with the problem and government is wrestling with it. But they have manpower training problems and so they have developed programs through which they are trying to upgrade the handicapped and give them better skills and teach them how to make better use of the skills they have and how to make better use of land and things like that. But the scale on which this has to be done is very great and I do not know if we have the resources to do it. You are assuming that we have the resources to do it, but I really do not see how you can get on to the practical implementation. I agree that much of what you say is true, but let us take for the moment the concept of the "right to work." How can you implement this "right to work?" I take it you mean that if a job is not there, you must create a job.

Mrs. Plumptre: Yes, indeed. This is exactly the situation. You must create the job. Here we have all sorts of people who are unemployed and are on welfare and who want to work. At the same time we have great entrepreneurs in our society. In between you have this tremendous gap which needs to be filled. This gap is so great that we have to keep these people on welfare, paying them money, because we do not have enough imagination to bridge that gap. It is a very great problem, but I think we have to face up to it. And I do not think that we are facing up to it. I realize that the manpower people are beginning to do an excellent job, but it is not sufficient just to train people, you have to have jobs for them when they are trained.

Senator Carter: That is contrary to some of the evidence that has been presented before us. In fact we have been told that the day is coming when we will have to pay people for not working.

Mrs. Plumptre: Yes, but that is still some distance away and I do not think I shall be here when that happens. We may have to reduce the hours of work and spread the work, if you like, but before that happens we have to sit down and recognize the fact that we do have poverty in our society and ask ourselves if we, as people in an affluent society, are prepared to go on with this situation. I do not think we are.

Senator Carter: What you are saying then is that if we have 6 per cent of our people who are not working, while 94 per cent of our people have jobs, that 94 per cent must give up part of their jobs so that the other 6 per cent can work.

Mrs. Plumptre: No, no.

Senator Carter: Well, then how do we implement this?

Mrs. Plumptre: Why don't we take a look at the process? We realize and we would like to stress that the 6 per cent unemployment figure can be very misleading. I think it would be very important to have a breakdown of the unemployment figures because I think they would show that a very great portion of these people who are without jobs are the poor. I was reading an article concerning some research done recently in the New Republic published in January. It referred to the fact that in some of the states they have something of the order of 8 per cent unemployed but that probably 15 to 20 per cent of this group of people are the unskilled. Now it is fine for us to talk about these percentages, but they are not the main thing.

The Chairman: This morning Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche) referred to the City of Montreal as having an unemployment rate of 18 per cent in the poorer areas whereas Quebec as a whole has 7 or 8 per cent. That is the point the witness is making and she is quite right on that.

Senator Carter: I know. Even in my own province the figure is about 20 per cent at the present time, but what I do not see is how you can provide jobs for this 20 per cent.

Mrs. Plumptre: To follow up your question, Senator Carter, surely, you do not think the demands for goods and services are satisfied, do you? Do you not think we still want more? Do you not think we want better housing, more hospitals, more sewers, more parks, greater possibilities for recreation for poor people? There are so many demands. Cannot we meet them by somehow or another putting our minds to work and saying: We are not content with our society at the present time. We are going to make sure that we get the most important resources in our economy to work, and to work more efficiently?

I agree that it is complicated, but we have to look at the whole economy and say: These people have difficulty getting out of the situation they are in. They need training, better housing, greater justice before the law—in fact, better education. It is no good looking at things piece-meal; we have to look at the whole economy and put our minds to work on it—just as you people are doing and, goodness knows, you are bringing this whole thing out into the open.

Senator Carter: In other words, you are saying we have to revise our priorities?

Mrs. Plumptre: Yes, and get the whole nation and the people involved in these institutions to work at it and to put their minds to it.

Senator Carter: I would like to know how you go about doing it.

Mrs. Plumptre: First of all, I would have a body come up with strong recommendations.

The Chairman: You did not hurt our cause or the cause of the poor this morning.

Senator Pearson: I was quite interested in that allusion of yours on page 16 to the two different Canadas. This seems to indicate that the poor exist to a large degree because our society wants them there, wants to keep them poor and out of the way. I do not think this is exactly right. I think that the great majority of people who are in the middle-or upper-class are indifferent. Everyone is indifferent to his neighbour; he does not even recognize his neighbour.

Mrs. Plumptre: You say that you think that is so?

Senator Pearson: Yes.

Mrs. Plumptre: Yes, I agree with you.

Senator Pearson: This is the trouble with the different elements in society. Each is doing a little dab of work to help the poor, but you have to involve everyone. How are you going to get everyone involved?

Mrs. Plumptre: You can do it by hammering away and by somebody giving good leadership. Look what has happened since the Economic Council put out its Fifth Annual Review 1½ years ago now. We had poverty before that, but it was somehow tucked away somewhere, and it was not until the Economic Council said, "Here it is. Look at not only what it is costing the poor but what it is costing the economy as a whole," that people began to take notice. Then, in the Second Annual Review they showed what it costs. If we can get this across, we are all going to be that much better off.

Senator Pearson: In the brief we had earlier this morning, that of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, they talked about the problem today being the tremendous amount of services we can produce in this country in agriculture. The problem is, what are we going to do to get and keep everyone employed in the rural areas yet, at the same time, cut down the surplus? You are suggesting that you go for cutting down the hours of work.

Mrs. Plumptre: Maybe. I did not actually say that, because I think there are so many demands to be met.

Senator Pearson: You think that we should build up the demands?

Mrs. Plumptre: Yes, and we cannot always do that to the extent that, in the case of wheat, say, we grow all the wheat. However, I think we can help a great deal. Of course, I am not going to put myself forward as an agricultural expert here this morning; you have already heard those people.

Senator Pearson: I have written down here that a child of the poor is less apt in his educational instruction because of the nutrition he receives, his home environment, and so on. Will he not be behind the children of the middle class all through his life, even when the children of the poor have special types of education and training for their future life, until the guaranteed income brings future parents up to the status where the present middle class is?

Dr. Ryan: I think the answer to the question is: Yes, but not necessarily. He does not have to be behind for the rest of his life.

Senator Pearson: But do you have to change his type of education, the environment of education, because the middle class is a little ahead of him all the time and he feels a little depressed because he cannot move as fast?

Dr. Ryan: The point is that you could have him ready for that school system, to perform in a manner comparable to the middle-class child, if during his first five years of life certain procedures were undertaken to promote his intellectual development, including such things as working with his parents to teach them how to stimulate a young child. In the area of language development, language is probably the single most important skill a young child needs to progress normally in school. There is a vast difference in language used across the socio-economic groups. This has been shown in studies, an example of which is contained in the brief of how the lower class parent might respond when he wants his child to be quiet, with "Shut up!" or, "Be quiet!", a very short imperative; whereas the middle class—implying along with that, the better educated parent will say, "Would you be quiet for a moment because I want to make a phone call, and if you are not quiet I will not be able to hear too well." There is a vast difference in the number of words used and the reasoning and quality of the words.

Senator Pearson: That is the type of instruction right there.

Dr. Ryan: Yes, and this starts within the first few months of life. One can observe the parental responses to vocalization in young infants, a child as young as three months of age being led to vocalize.

Senator Quart: Mr. Chairman, first of all, I would like to congratulate Mrs. Plumptre of the excellent brief; and I would particularly comment your answers, Mrs. Plumptre, to Senator Carter regarding the creating of jobs. I am with you all the way on that. I have always felt that way about it, and I thoroughly agree with you.

Regarding slum housing, and all the rest of it, where the unemployed and the poor could be employed, I think it is an excellent idea you have left with us.

Regarding the services of the various organizations you mentioned, it has always been a sort of pet theme of mine that I believe in many cases—as you mentioned, I think it is on page 6—the poor are reluctant at times to go to Manpower, or some other government agency, and they do not realize, because they do not have the know-how, what services they can get through these agencies and also the various voluntary organizations. The question is, how you inform the poor. Would a co-ordinating council of some kind, such as your own, be the answer, that would undertake to co-ordinate and investigate the various services, to find out what they really can do, particularly for the poor? I know of specific cases where the unemployed have gone to Manpower. There is a discrepancy somewhere. If we want an employee of some sort we are told by Manpower that they simply have not got one. I know that I have never heard of any employer having any great success in getting the type of employee he wants from Manpower, other than just casual labour. On the other hand they do not seem to keep a record of the demands of employers. There seems to be a lack of co-ordination.

Mrs. Plumptre: I think you have raised a very important question. We, in the Vanier Institute, feel that the family today is much more alone than it used to be. The family in the small community had the grandparents and the aunts around it, but the small family in an urban area is very dependent upon the community for many resources, and it does not know about these resources. I know that the Welfare Council and the Social Planning Council in various cities have tried to put out various pamphlets, but poor people do not read and pamphlets do not reach them. This is something we need to face up to. I do not know whether our organization, with its present income, is the one to do it, but somehow or other we have to solve this problem and let the people know that the community resources are.

You have raised a question about the manpower situation. One thing is that many people do not like going to Government offices. It may be that they go once and they are greeted by an official who is not sympathetic, and they tell their friends about that experience, and hostility develops.

However, there is one matter that I should like to see this committee deal with. I should like to know what percentage of job vacancies are reported to Manpower. I tried to get some statistics on that, because I think it is a very important matter. I know from having discussed it with officials that they are trying to get better co-operation from employers, but at the moment we do not know to what extent employers are reporting not only the job vacancies but the qualifications required. They should be more precise in respect of the qualifications of the people they want for the job. This is most important. When Manpower is trying to develop its training courses it wants to know of as many jobs as possible.

Senator Inman: I have read both of these briefs, and I would like to congratulate both of you, Mrs. Plumptre and Dr. Ryan. I should like to ask you if you think that welfare is somewhat at fault in not doing enough to investigate cases. I should like to mention something that happened in my own province. There is a big fish plant there that operates the year round. The trawlers come into the open harbours, and at times unload 20,000 tons of fish. That plant advertised for 75 workers. I saw the advertisements in the paper, and I know that they were, as we say, scouring the country for workers, and they could not get one. The people said that they were on welfare and they were not going to give it up. I am just wondering what is the answer to that situation.

Mrs. Plumptre: I cannot comment, of course, on that particular instance, but in the brief I draw your attention to the fact that there are many people with large families who cannot afford to take a job. They are much better off on welfare. This is a sad commentary on our society, that there are jobs that do not provide enough to keep a family. This is dreadful. This point was emphasized when we were discussing our brief, by the labour people, and especially by Mr. Donald Macdonald, who is a member of our board. He said it is true. Many of them just cannot afford to take a job.

I am not in a position to criticize the welfare agencies. I think we all know of some unfortunate instances, but one of the sad things is that we are tending in some ways to keep people on welfare, and there is a great deal of cheating going on. I know of cases myself where the applicant has refused to give all the information he should to the welfare group because of the unpleasant way in which he has been received.

I know of one particular widow, whose husband died only recently, who decided now that her children were at school that she would take a job because she wanted to start a fund for her boy who wanted to go to college. She was told that she could not do that; that if she did she would be cut off from welfare.

This is an insidious kind of thing, and you have raised a difficult question for me to answer. I am not associated with the welfare people, but I do think we have to look carefully at our welfare system.

Senator Inman: You speak of the poor as regarding the law not as a protector but as a prosecutor. Are there not cases where poor people can obtain legal help, if that is necessary?

Mrs. Plumptre: My information is that Ontario is doing something, but this article by Mr. John Honsberger, to which I referred, suggested that many of the poor do not know that their problems are legal problems, and they do not know that there is protection for them. If they do not know this then they do not go to the Legal Aid office. The Legal Aid office does not initiate any help; you have to go and ask for it. If you do not know you have a legal problem, then you do not go. One of my young lawyer friends pointed out that the only office is down town, and it is open between the hours of 9 to 6. If you cannot get there between those hours then it is too bad.

Senator Inman: We have heard many criticisms from people who live in public housing, especially about the inspectors, and the type of help they get from them. Would you like to say something on that?

Mrs. Plumptre: This is one of the things I have discussed with people who have been closely associated with the problem. I know that the members of this committee have seen this housing, and therefore will know more about it than I, but one cannot help but get the impression that there are very many unfortunate occurrences because of the inspection. If a woman with a child is on welfare and is living in public housing they will burst in on her in the middle of the night to make sure that she has not a man there. This is terrible. She has a right to privacy as much as anyone else. There is room for a great deal of improvement in this regard, but there are other people who know more about that than I do.

Senator Inman: I have mentioned before that many of them seem to be painted in very grim colours. I think Senator Fergusson was in one place where the woman complained about the white tile on the floors.

Mrs. Plumptre: Yes, I read that in the evidence, but I think there are many more serious things than white tiles. That is a minor thing when compared to the basic question.

Senator McGrand: I should like to follow up with Dr. Ryan this question of the development of underprivileged children, and the statement that they should receive attention early in life. There is a great deal of crime and violence in the world today, and some people are worried about it. I have been told that if you recognize a psychopath at three or four years of age you may be able to liberate him from whatever he will develop into. That is rather along the line of what you are talking about, although I am talking about poverty in a slightly wider sense. Do you know what can be done or has been done about this? Do you work with Professor Wake at all?

Dr. Ryan: Yes. He has moved to St. Patrick's now, but we are together quite a bit. We are in the same area, although he is more concerned with the question you have just asked—the development of aggressive behaviour and physical cruelty in children.

In answer to the specific example you have chosen I can only answer in the general sense. We could presumably alter the subsequent behavioural development of this child at the age of three if we had introduced certain conditions during the first three years of life. The argument is similar to those I am presenting, which are in terms of social development. The psychopathic would fit within the scheme of developmental social behaviour. If psychopathological behaviour is recognizable at three years of age, it presumably is because of the child's experiences during his first three years of life. I question whether extreme psychopathological behaviour is detectable at three years of age, although it certainly is within a few years after that.

Senator McGrand: It is certainly recognizable.

Dr. Ryan: You cannot pick out deviant behaviour so early. I would push it beyond five years of age, when you get the children in the school area with constant observation of behaviour.

Senator McGrand: If you can bring this boy along a little quicker, you could do the same thing for these people who develop criminal tendencies.

Dr. Ryan: Yes, it is quite in line with the suggestions we are making. The reason that has not come into this particular submission in more detail is that within that area of behaviour we know much less.

The Chairman: Please do not present us with new problems, doctor; we have enough as it is.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): I am in full accord with the two briefs and believe they are on a very high level. They contain some of the best information we have received and are full of goodwill, ambition and well meaning. However, they lack the application of some of the methods. It has certainly opened many doors for long arguments and discussions. There is enough material in the briefs to keep us here for a whole week and every minute would be interesting.

The question is raised why we do not do certain things. The short answer is that the financial structures in our system do not permit them to be done. This is one of the big problems, especially with regard to housing. With regard to labour, we have technology, electronics, computers and mechanization on one side, which eliminate jobs. On the other side are the problems of management and production.

Mrs. Plumptre: I agree with you. We submitted this brief with the intention of arousing debate. We need much more debate across the whole country on these problems. I do not agree with you when you say the finances are not there. This is a rich, affluent country and we do not have to go on with the same system we have had for years and years. We have to make sure that we get the conditions we desire from our affluence. I certainly hope that you will stimulate a great deal of debate. We have to face up to these problems if we really want to do something about them.

The Chairman: I have been saving up three questions for you. I do not have to tell you anything about committees; they meander along until they reach some point of consensus. We are thinking in terms of income from the federal Government, services from the provincial Governments. Delivery under the Canada Assistance Plan Act. Where what we need is not available, we would buy it from voluntary agencies.

Mrs. Plumptre: The first thing is that you have to make many leaders at all levels across the country more concerned with poverty. This cannot be done in a piecemeal way. There must be very strong co-operation between governments at all levels, not only federal, but provincial and municipal. The Canada Assistance Plan Act needs to be looked at very carefully. I am not sure that it is really working to the extent it should in order to alleviate poverty. Incomes must be provided for the people who really cannot work. We must also make sure that they have a good living. On the other hand the other people must be given an opportunity to really do the things they want to. If they wish to work they should be able to. This is almost the basis of it.

The Chairman: Once we agree to a maintenance income do we not set the people free at that moment? We do not say you have to take this sort of shirt or housing. Are they not put on their own at that moment and set free to a great extent?

Mrs. Plumptre: Do you mean if you give them a guaranteed income?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mrs. Plumptre: I am not sure that I am sold on a guaranteed income for everybody. There is no doubt whatever about people who cannot work or hold a job. We have to look at it in a broad way. Giving some sort of an income to people will be helpful. For example, at the moment a man who may wish to move from one province to another is not helped under the manpower mobility program, which is only within a province. If the man has an opportunity of securing employment in another urban area in another province and has a little money he can perhaps afford to take the step. I can see that that would perhaps make them more mobile and secure, but just giving them money is not going to bring them out of poverty when all our institutions discriminate against them.

The Chairman: We are just thinking of one thing at a time.

Mrs. Plumptre: I know you are looking at these annual incomes to see the results. I am prepared to go along with it to a certain extent, but I think there are many more important things that need doing.

The Chairman: The American experience today indicates that the pattern of life has not changed.

Mrs. Plumptre: That is right; this is the real basic thing.

The Chairman: It is the most wonderful thing that has happened. We are thinking in terms that a person on relief is a prisoner of the system.

Mrs. Plumptre: Yes.

The Chairman: We are thinking in terms of liberating them from the system so that they are on their own responsibility.

Mrs. Plumptre: We want a system under which they have a choice of where they want to live, what kind of work they want to do, what they want to buy. That is what we are aiming at.

The Chairman: I have another question on something you raised, and which we discussed. You were talking about the working poor and the fact that the family can receive more on relief than from working, due to minimum wages and perhaps other conditions. In that case, do we recommend subsidizing industry or do we subsidize the person?

Mrs. Plumptre: You may have to subsidize industry if you want them to establish training schemes to give the man a skill and give him a good wage. However, immediately you get into that it raises great constitutional difficulties. On the other hand, you must make sure that you bring the person along with you. He may not have a basic education and therefore may need something more before he gets into industry. He may not be ready to have the training industry can give him. Therefore you say you have to subsidize the man. You may not only have to give him an income but also make sure that he is having some education so that eventually he can join the labour force at a wage that will give him an income sufficient to support his family.

The Chairman: You have hit two points, but not quite on the head for me. Leave training out of it for the moment. Consider the man who has been working, who has four children and a job that does not pay enough to support the four children. At that moment he needs more money and says to himself, "I may as well go on relief. I can get more money on relief".

Mrs. Plumptre: He has to go on relief.

The Chairman: We say, "Don't go on relief. We will subsidize you". Now, do we subsidize his employer or do we subsidize him?

Mrs. Plumptre: Subsidizing him is another way of putting him on welfare is it not?

The Chairman: No, do not put him on welfare.

Mrs. Plumptre: You mean a new subsidy?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mrs. Plumptre: Which is a type of welfare. What is the difference between that and welfare?

The Chairman: What we are trying to do is to keep him working. That is the point.

Mrs. Plumptre: I see. I am sorry, I did not understand that.

The Chairman: Never mind where it comes from. We are trying to keep him working and induce him to do so by giving him a certain amount of his earnings over and above the amount he would receive if he was on welfare.

Mrs. Plumptre: I am sorry, I did not realize you wanted to keep him working.

The Chairman: Yes, we want him working.

Mr. Sutton: Could I ask a question, Mr. Chairman?

The Chairman: Go ahead.

Mr. Sutton: Do you have in mind that he gets this with dignity, that he receives an increase in his wage or gets it as a welfare supplement?

The Chairman: He cannot do much about his wage. The point I am trying to get at is this. I am trying to keep him off welfare.

Mr. Sutton: He gets it as a right though?

The Chairman: He gets what we give him.

Mrs. Plumptre: As a right?

The Chairman: Yes. As a matter of fact, there are three provinces doing just that, quietly and very nicely. You and I can be a little ashamed that one of them is not Ontario, although she can well afford it.

Mrs. Plumptre: She certainly could.

The Chairman: That is the point. I think the committee would be hesitant to subsidize the employer, because the tendency would then be to keep the wages at the lowest level, no matter what happened.

Mrs. Plumptre: I was going to say, it is not only a question of giving him something. Would you not feel a worker would be a better person if you could say that not only would he get a subsidy but we would try to develop him more so that he could have a better job?

The Chairman: Yes. That is two things. Now the third one. When the inflation issue became a little warm and it was reflected in the unemployment, we immediately asked our research staff to provide some background material, which was passed on to all members of the committee. Of course, they reflected our views. Now, I know exactly what you were saying when you were talking to Senator Carter. The unemployed person who loses his job in the national interest becomes something less than a statistic. You say there is a social responsibility towards that man.

Mrs. Plumptre: Absolutely.

The Chairman: Wait a minute. Senator Carter then says, "I can't quite put my finger on a job for you." That is being realistic.

Mrs. Plumptre: Sure.

The Chairman: What is the alternative?

Mrs. Plumptre: You certainly may have to pay. You have got to keep the man alive, therefore you have to pay him something in the meantime. The point is that there should be a quicker adjustment. I think Mr. Rasminsky said that the policy to control inflation must have different aspects. Up to the moment there has been a great deal of emphasis on employment. Now we are beginning to think it is not always good for some regions and some people. Surely when a man is put out of work there must be a much closer contact between the welfare people. Some organizations believe that instead of spending all this money in that direction a new hospital is wanted. Suppose the man is a construction worker, could we not try to get the man working on that? Or put him to work on digging for a new sewer? I do not suggest we should make work. These are things that society needs.

The Chairman: In your answer you mentioned spending money on new projects. Many say that when you do that you are heading up inflation.

Mrs. Plumptre: No, you are not, because you are already spending the money on welfare.

The Chairman: Not quite the same amount of money is spent on welfare.

Mrs. Plumptre: Well, it is an awful lot.

The Chairman: It does not bring any results, of course.

Mrs. Plumptre: That is the point.

The Chairman: That is the normal argument used. I do not agree with it either.

Mr. Sutton: Is not the point that while it may cost more than welfare, while the man is on welfare he may live, eat and survive, but he is completely unproductive. Surely you do not just take account of what that welfare costs and limit it to that. If the man is productive, there is not only what welfare costs but what he can add by his productivity.

The Chairman: When Mr. Smith of the Economic Council was before us we asked him what it costs. He is very adroit.

Mr. Sutton: He has to be.

The Chairman: Yes. He gave us some idea, and of course, it runs into fantastic figures. We asked our own staff to examine it and they told us it was a very expensive exercise. Nobody is able to say what the figure is.

Mrs. Plumptre: Exactly.

The Chairman: That is about the truth of it. Of course it is expensive, and of course it is a narrow viewpoint, but we have to live with some of it and the best you can do is try to correct it. Are there any other questions?

Senator Carter: I would like to ask one question of each of those here, starting with Dr. Ryan. Dr. Ryan, recently I read an article containing a statement that struck me as something new. It was that a normal child, with normal average intelligence, can learn as much in the first nine years of life as in the remainder of a normal life span. Would you agree with that statement?

Dr. Ryan: Definitely. The child's intellectual development is half-way there by the time he is four or five. This comes from studying curves, just taking the I.Q. scores up to adult age. He is half developed by the age of five.

Senator Carter: Which means that our whole educational system, in so far as they know that fact, is wasteful. It is initial in the sense that in order to bring about certain changes at grade 8 or 9 that it can be accomplished, but it is more difficult than it would have been at the age of four or five.

The Chairman: Yes, but Dr. Ryan, we really do not get at the poverty at home until the child comes to school.

Dr. Ryan: Right.

The Chairman: At four or five years and then we have lost the battle.

Mrs. Plumptre: We would argue that that is too late.

The Chairman: At the present time we have almost lost half the battle before it begins. What you are saying to us in effect is that we should get into the homes.

Dr. Ryan: I am saying that we should begin at least by age three.

The Chairman: How do you get into the homes at age three?

Dr. Ryan: In the United States, for example, there are programs of home tutoring which begin at the age of two or three months. We have, available in this country right now, agencies, such as the Public Health Nursing, that check to see if the baby has a rash or any disease. I would think that we could expand this kind of service and build into it provisions so that these agencies or something similar to them could help by tutoring parents in the techniques of child bearing. The big thing that the poor parent seems to be lacking is knowledge of alternative ways of doing things. From what I understand, these home tutoring programs—this is exactly what they give the parent—teach the parents that there are different ways of saying things to children and also different ways of getting them to accomplish things.

The Chairman: Recently Tim Reid got me on this subject, as you know. He is pretty knowledgeable. As a result of that he is going to get an invitation to come before this committee. The studies are just in their infancy in the United States. Important as it is, there are other areas that we could follow that would be much more rewarding at the present time or appear to be. What do you think about this, Dr. Ryan?

Dr. Ryan: I cannot think of an alternative approach if I understand your question.

The Chairman: If we cannot reach the child at that very early age . . .

Dr. Ryan: But we can.

The Chairman: When you talk about that health nurse getting into the home you are talking about .0001 of the number of people and it amounts to almost nothing in the present context. Therefore, if we cannot reach them at the very early stage, should not we see if we can reach them at four or five years of age?

Dr. Ryan: I do not know if it is better; I do not think so. You do have a chance to reach them at four or five years of age through your nursery school and day care facilities and it is clear that reaching them at this age can help tremendously. There are studies which show this.

Senator Fergusson: What proportion of poor children attend those schools?

Dr. Ryan: This is the next point. Your nursery schools are typically a middle class . . .

Senator Carter: That is the point I wanted to develop. You recommend corner nursery schools and I presume these would be what we would call neighbourhood schools so that they could all be on the same level. Who do you see administering them? Do you see these as a part of the general system or are they special schools operated by private agencies? What is your opinion as to how these should be organized?

Dr. Ryan: They are not generally part of the system. Let me go back one step. The thinking here has grown from some studies in the United States in regard to their home tutoring programs in which they are using, as home tutors, disadvantaged parents who may train in techniques of child bearing and then go about and train other disadvantaged people. This does two things, it bring the home tutoring program to disadvantaged homes while at the same time creating a job for a poor person. With a corner nursery, for example, we would get a parent in this small area, effect the necessary renovations in the home, which would be minimal, and train this person in child care and how to stimulate young children. This could be restricted to a very small number of individuals. The advantages here are that—coming back to the knowledge that there is an information gap which poor people have—they would be more likely to find out about something a block away than across town and also more likely to have some trust in the person running this particular outfit because they might know them right off the bat. They could participate in it.

The other part of your question in regard to who would be in charge of these, I do not understand the Government structures at all . . .

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): You are lucky.

Dr. Ryan: But, I think this would have to be a combination of municipal and provincial governments, because provincial governments are involved in licensing and regulation for day care centres. However, municipalities would have to also be involved.

Senator Carter: Do you think it could be applied to the rural areas?

Dr. Ryan: The rural areas are different, especially if you are talking about a home here and one seven miles away, et cetera. I would think that some kind of mobile nursery or mobile day centre could provide a better alternative than what is available so that a parent would know, for example, that this institution would be moving within a mile or two of their home every other Monday or two days a week, whichever way it could be arranged. I do not see a development of a fixed centre in rural areas as a kind of place where people would be able to get to easily.

Senator Pearson: There is one rural area in Saskatchewan where they are doing this.

Dr. Ryan: A mobile centre?

Senator Pearson: No, but there is a centre where the mothers are working on this problem. Each mother has a certain amount of training and she works for a month or six weeks at a time and then the next mother takes on the job. It is all voluntary as far as that is concerned. They are doing the training of the people right from the early ages.

Mrs. Plumptre: I would like to add that we do not have to wait until the people have the children. We could do a great deal by looking at our educational system and seeing if we are giving the children today—some are going to be parents very shortly—the real education for family living. This is a real question we have not faced up to, but are now beginning to. When you think that some people get married very soon after they leave high school and have no apprehension really of the problems, is this not a reflection on our educational system?

Senator Carter: Mrs. Plumptre, you mentioned a co-ordinating central agency. Would you elaborate what its powers would be and as to whether it would be functioning as a private, Government or joint agency?

Mrs. Plumptre: We have not really discussed what this should be in detail, but we feel that there is such a need for co-ordination in even the piecemeal policies we are doing in many areas and voluntary agencies. At the present time there has not been enough co-ordination. I would think it would be a federal body with, of course, the co-operation of the provinces. It would need to bring in a lot of other people and not just Government representatives.

Senator Quart: My last question, which I have asked before in other cases, is this. Would you think this would be an admirable solution? For instance, let us take men and women drawing welfare payments, when he takes a job he makes $50 over and above but he has to declare it and he is taken off welfare. Would it be some sort of solution if he did not have to declare this, probably up to $100. Would it not give him an incentive to work and perhaps be promoted and finally get off welfare? I have been speaking to quite a number, and even on Saturday afternoon I was speaking to a number of very intelligent people—Guide officers—and we were talking in general; and most of them say the people who go on welfare do not want to get off because it would take so long to get back on welfare again.

Mrs. Plumptre: I think that is very important. It is an unfortunate principle we have, that you must declare everything you earn and then it means the less welfare you are getting. Either it takes away the incentive to work, or else they work and cheat. Now, what do you want?

Senator Quart: That is it, we are teaching them to cheat.

Mr. Sutton: Mr. Chairman, dare I ask a question?

The Chairman: Certainly, go ahead.

Mr. Sutton: In your first question, you said that this committee had certain types of possible procedures in mind and you mentioned three. Your last one, if I understood you correctly, referred to the purchase of service from voluntary organizations. Am I correct?

The Chairman: That is correct.

Mr. Sutton: I wonder if I might comment on that, in connection with what Mrs. Plumptre and Dr. Ryan have been saying. It occurs to me that if by this you mean voluntary agencies and at local levels, this could be an extremely part of the whole business of reaching families in the sense in which Dr. Ryan was thinking of, where in our own brief we are speaking of the lack of access to information and fact and understanding by the poor.

I have been out of this country for 11 years and back here for 3½ years; but I am very much impressed by what appears to be the “dying on the vine” of the voluntary agencies, if I have in mind the same group that you have. In the early days, they were set up to provide aid to the poor but now the whole function has changed to counseling and education and support.

If you have in mind something which would lead to the enrichment and expansion of those services, this is one way in which—provided we know what we are doing and know what we want—you can get into these homes. You are raising a question of how you talk to the poor. Yet this very service is dying on the vine.

The Chairman: We realize that and we realize it is not possible for us as a government to reach them.

Mr. Sutton: That is right.

The Chairman: We have in these voluntary agencies thousands of people who want nothing but an opportunity to serve. We can get that service much cheaper than we can establish it. At the same time we can get something with the service that you do not always receive in the public service.

Mr. Sutton: This will not put an end to poverty, but it will help with the education.

The Chairman: Yes, and give some credence to what Dr. Ryan has said.

Senator Carter: You have the main fact, which Mrs. Plumptre has put, in regard to attitudes. Those people go out with a spirit of care and if they will not change attitudes, I do not know who will.

The Chairman: If there are no other questions, I would say, on behalf of the members of the committee that this has been for us a rewarding morning. We have had the representatives here of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, knowledgeable persons who knew what they were talking about and who presented their case well. We have had Mrs. Plumptre and her group, speaking for the Vanier Institute of the Family, and this has been a delight. I do not know if you realize, honourable senators, that she was the person who gave meaning and purpose to the consumer movement in this country. We are looking for great things from the Vanier Institute. Mr. Sutton and Dr. Ryan, thank you, too, for being so helpful. You have spoken clearly and forcibly and we will pay a great deal of attention to what you have said. All of you have made a contribution this morning which will go a considerable way towards finding a solution to the problem of poverty in this country.

The committee adjourned.

APPENDIX A

SUBMISSION TO THE
SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY
FROM THE
CANADIAN FEDERATION OF AGRICULTURE

The Issue of Poverty

1. Poverty is a good word, which is why it is used so much. Like all good, non-technical words, it defies precise definition in technical terms. Rather it tends to expand in the scope and richness of its meaning. For us, the word "poverty" has acquired not only new meaning in material terms, but expanded social, psychological and political content, reflecting conditions created by the emergence of our technological society.

2. More and more strongly the point comes through. In poverty's material sense at least, and in its social sense too, it is not only an offence to be indifferent to poverty and lacking in charity; it is an offence to permit the continued very existence of poverty. The job is not just to help the poor. It is to eliminate poverty, if poverty is defined in the two classical senses of people suffering acute material deprivation, and people constituting a social substratum.

3. This is of course rather revolutionary. The point is that the goal of the elimination of poverty is no longer considered utopian by many, perhaps most, persons. We are in, as the colloquial phrase goes, a new ball game. We are sure that as this Committee wrestles with the subject before it, this is becoming clear. The old meanings and connotations of poverty become less appropriate. The very existence of it becomes a kind of measure of failure.

The Human Requirement in "Poverty" Programs

4. Programs and policies to reduce or alleviate poverty involve changing the conditions and circumstances of people's lives. Accordingly, there are two very important things to watch. One is to ensure that people lives and circumstances are in fact changed for the better, and not for the worse. The second, is to make sure that people be treated with dignity, respect and understanding. The last is actually the most important. It is first of all a human right. Also it is in fact a requirement for real success in any program.

5. Programs to help people, or to help them help themselves, normally encounter certain hazards. First of all, people do not always in fact treat other people with dignity and respect, and this must be watched. Second the interests affected by programs designed to eliminate or alleviate poverty are not normally those only of persons living in poverty. Conflicts of goal and interests can arise. Third, the expectations held out for programs can be far ahead of their real potential for meeting the need, and the discrepancy can lead to unhappy results including less than adequate assessment of the programs themselves by those responsible for them. Fourthly, there are real problems in making sure that administrations, be set by many problems and pressures, and the need for internal order and consistency, achieve necessary flexibility and responsiveness in dealing with the people they are supposed to assist. The problem of avoiding the creation of credibility gaps is a continuing one. One should not promise to do what one cannot or will not or does not intend to do. This is at best unfair, and at worst cruel. It is also destructive of the social fabric.

6. All this relates closely to the question of participation—that much used and abused word. Participation basically has to do with the democratic principle that people should have a proper say in how the country is run—with special emphasis on how it affects them. It is, in short a profoundly important matter. It is a very complex operational not to say philosophical question. Nevertheless, two basic requirements for participation are clear:

7. (1) There should be adequate means for people to have their say, and to express their needs and aspirations, in matters affecting their lives. It is becoming increasingly clear that one of the hidden causes of continued poverty is a lack of power. Power to affect the decisions that are made about people by those people. Under the existing system poor people have things done for them or done to them, but seldom if ever are they given enough power or responsibilities so that they can make some important decisions for themselves. The cost of our imposed help may be very great not only to the rest of society but also to the poor themselves and, most important, to their children.

8. Pride and self esteem are essential to each of us and to deny it to people with less economic wealth is burdening them with a double disadvantage. It is neither just nor very intelligent.

9. (2) There should be an adequate information flow to all concerned and by all appropriate means, and at all stages of policy formation and implementation. Information is a basic and essential tool to achieving the first requirement. This means a much more open process of access to and transmittal of information than we have yet achieved in this country.

Basic Paths to Alleviation of Poverty

10. There are, it seems to us, two basic kinds of ways by which one deals with the poverty question, which though interrelated are nevertheless distinct:

11. —The first is what might be called the welfare program—by which we mean the provision of goods, and services, either directly to the individual or in the form of public services—that increase his level of material and personal well being.

12. —The second is the economic or “developmental” program—by which we mean those that create and increase the ability of people to earn a living, and so pay their own way.

13. Programs in the welfare category can of course have a profound impact on economic opportunity and performance. Programs in the second, correspondingly, are ones in which all, not only the poor, share, and in which major issues of public policy regarding their provision and financing arise which are not exclusively poverty issues. Many of them in the field of public services (e.g. education).

14. On the whole, it can probably be said with some confidence that the second category of programs—increasing economic opportunity and remuneration for work performed are, in a private enterprise, market economy, the most difficult with which to deal.

Farm Policy in Relation to the Poverty Problem

15. There are a great many farmers who receive well below acceptable levels of income, whether received in cash or in kind. There is no proposal known to us for an approach to agricultural policy, which is acceptable even to the majority of farmers, that offers the expectation of a really acceptable level of returns from agricultural production to the large majority of those persons now engaged in agriculture. First the market isn't there in sufficient amounts, and second, current technology in farming does not permit indefinite continuation of present farmer numbers, on a basis consistent with any accepted standards of economic efficiency in agriculture. At the same time a great many farmers experiencing very low levels of returns simply cannot be expected, realistically, to improve their position through change of occupation in their lifetime. In addition, in a more short-run sense, there are extensive areas of the country where unemployment is chronically high and alternative employment opportunities are very limited.

16. When we say this, we realize we are talking about a very complex process of change and adjustment in agriculture. We are also talking about people. You can't say with confidence to any individual farmer that there is no place in agriculture for him to make an adequate living. He will quite properly answer—why not? Even though one can with some confidence say that the number of farmers will continue to contract, as it has in the past, this, as far as any individual is concerned, falls a lot short of deciding his fate. It is as well to keep in mind that if considering the individual farmer, whether small or large, part time or full time, the only rational starting assumption to make is that, from his point of view, each farmer is making the best economic job of it he can, taking into account all the circumstances.

17. In addition, when we say “the market is limited”, and there is not enough of it to go around on an efficient basis of production, the statement, while true, is not as simple and precise as it may sound. We are a country producing an export surplus of agricultural products. The world outside to which we must sell is not a simple world of open markets, but one in which importing countries have their own agricultural policies and other economic controls. They can and do artificially interfere with free price competition and access to markets of imported products. Major issues of domestic agricultural policy and international trade policy bear on this problem, and are under continuous development and review. We do not know how much pork, beef, poultry, or eggs we could even find export markets for at any price, and we do not know precisely, either, how low a price we would have to accept to get the market from others who are undoubtedly looking at the possibilities of agricultural expansion also. We can calculate the size of the domestic market in prospect, and it is limited in relation to our capacity to produce.

18. So we do know that opportunity is limited for expanded agricultural production for our farmers, but we do not know how limited. We accordingly do not know, even given say improved extension and management service, training programs and access to credit, what scale of opportunity exists for assisting present low income farmers to improve their position in their present occupations. We do not know, from a governmental point of view, what resources should be put into agricultural expansion, and in what products, and what degree of planning should be applied to the process.

19. In eggs, poultry and milk, producers are pretty well convinced that they must basically look to the domestic market, and operate on the basis of a planned, regulated system of production and marketing. Insofar as this takes place, and we are moving rapidly in that direction in both the dairy industry, and in the egg and poultry industries, there will be no argument about size of markets. Producers will be absolutely limited in their ability to expand production beyond definite limits, (although promotion and new product development will affect these) and numbers of producers will be definitely restricted, and will decline. This leaves pork, beef, grains and oilseeds. These are the products where the potential for export expansion is the critical question. However, for this very reason, it is clear that in a world of basic over-capacity in agriculture in relation to commercial markets, the price outlook for export-oriented production should not be considered encouraging. Small units will not be able to make any money. Large investments will be required to make a go of it. Prices, without government support at least, will not likely improve much if any. Also, strong pressures for some form of allocating shares of markets in a planned way may also arise in the grains business, though this is not clear.

20. The point of all this for the poverty question is that the field of opportunity for the small farmer is contracting, and the farmers' legitimate need for security and price stability will likely lead to an increasing degree of planning. Such planning will leave little room for easy assumptions that the solution to the farmers' problems will be to produce in larger and larger quantity, and more and more efficiently.

21. It will be possible, and to a considerable extent is possible now, to identify those small, low income producers for whom there is little or no hope of successful expansion into remunerative commercial production. If we talk to them many will identify themselves without hesitation.

22. How can public policy help these producers? Their personal circumstances vary widely. Some—many—are in the later stages of their working life; others are in the early stages. Some have access to some alternative income; others do not. Some have made a very efficient adaptation to small farming (though with a still very limited income); some have not. Some would like to leave farming if they could; some do not wish to do so. Some for family reasons or others virtually cannot leave. Some are in debt; some are not. Some are in serious want; some are simply at unpleasantly low income levels. Some produce very little products for sale; some produce significant amounts. Some have only a small investment in the farm; others have a fairly substantial investment. Some have children who wish to farm; some do not. Some have adequate homes; many do not.

23. All are in an economic position that will steadily deteriorate unless they obtain additional non-farm income or successfully expand their scale of farming operations. How many should be classed as people living in poverty is a matter of judgement (including that of the poor themselves), but none are living in enviable economic circumstances.

24. To change the picture significantly for tens of thousands of small producers would involve the introduction of much more extensive farm product subsidization to farmers, some kinds of direct policies to supplement incomes either in cash or in kind (e.g. housing), or both. A very large proportion of such producers will be in the older age brackets. The government today views even the subsidy programs it has at present (notably the dairy industry program) with evident (and we feel unseemly) lack of enthusiasm. If it contracts present programs or even leaves them where they are there is nothing in present national policy that holds out any hope of avoiding (however well we do at growth centred regional expansion, and retraining and mobility programs) a continuation of extensive below-standard incomes among farm and rural people. We either decide to do something about this or we don't. If we do there will be a bill to be paid, and very likely a much justified one. We are sure issues of essentially similar nature exist in the urban sector, although in proportionately lesser degree.

25. We wish to be clear. We believe in, and fully support and press for, greatly expanded and intensified attention to all adjustment and mobility opportunities that may be created for remunerative employment for farm people, including:

26. —intensive attention to retraining and re-establishment programs;

27. —development of new employment opportunities in rural areas, and;

28. —intensified and improved agricultural extension, management training, and credit programs to provide opportunity in agriculture for those wishing to intensify their efforts and improve their abilities in this area.

29. We support programs, too, in which the government, on the farmers' voluntary decision, is prepared to smooth the path of adjustment by acquiring the farmers' land on a fair basis as part of overall policy. We support improved educational programs in all respects. We support the improvement of social services to farm and rural people. These are all real and urgent needs.

30. A much more massive and systematic approach, on a co-ordinated Federal-Provincial basis, should be made aimed at expansion and improvement of programs in these areas.

31. What we are saying additionally, however, is that with all these programs, and all our best efforts in the field of marketing and production policy in agriculture, there will be a lot of people whose position will not be touched or improved, and who need and deserve a better deal. It is as well to face this fact. Hopefully, if other programs are well carried out, and standards of educational achievement rise, the dimensions of this problem will drastically decrease over time, but they will not disappear, and those presently in these circumstances will in any case not be helped—they will only try to live through it.

32. We should, in our policy thinking, and in our programs, be very careful that we do not irresponsibly induce people to move from the farm when in fact their circumstances are likely to be worsened, and their own lives made less satisfactory still (and probably at greater cost to the taxpayer in urban welfare and other costs).

Can Farm Policy Deal with Farm Poverty?

33. The question is often raised, in and out of farm circles, whether the problems of poor farmers, as we have been discussing them, are really part of the problem of "farm policy" or not. It is a good question, deserving discussion. If what one is asking is whether the problem can be dealt with by a set of policies uniformly applicable to the whole industry, the answer, as we have indicated, is "no—the problem is not simply part of farm policy".

34. But this far from settles the question. In the first place, policies for improvement of farm prices and markets can be marginally helpful to the small farmer, and can be very important to him, though no "solution" to his problem. The small farmer does, after all, obtain part or all of his income from the production of farm products.

35. (It is a rather striking fact that of the total net farm income from farming in 1969, Dominion Bureau of Statistics estimates show that 1/3—$1 out of $3 represents income in kind. This is the value on the farm of farm produce consumed on the farm, wood products produced and consumed on the farm, and rent imputed to farm homes. In this technological age it remains true that for many tens of thousands of farmers the food, fuel and housing that the farm provides is a very significant proportion, often the whole, of their returns from farming).

36. In the second place, returns to farm production, through subsidization, provide one channel through which, on a planned basis, it is potentially possible to supplement the incomes of small farmers, by paying on a limited amount of product to any one individual. This alternative, though not at present significantly applied in Canada (it is an aspect, though not a declared objective, of some support policies) remains a policy option that is often discussed in Canada and may have real possibilities. It has the advantage of not requiring a welfare administration. Though it may be imprecise in its application in relation to need, it is nevertheless inexpensive to administer, and has some unexplored possibilities in more refined principles of application. There are disadvantages also. One is that the product, produced in small amounts, must be marketed, and this has implications for the efficiency of the market system, (which affects other farmers) and for quality, uniformity and control of supply. Also, it can be argued that to reserve a part of farm production as a welfare-oriented share of the market militates against "commercial" producers, for whom too the available market is very limited, the cost-price squeeze severe, and returns well below a fair level. Care and judgment would have to be exercised in administration of such a policy, but its possibilities should not be altogether neglected, especially if no alternative means of meeting the problem are in sight.

37. The principal alternative that appears to be available, though not the only one, (for example early retirement programs for farmers, associated with land purchase policies, is a constructive possibility being given serious thought) is the adoption in Canada of a general minimum incomes policy. The Canadian Federation of Agriculture supports the adoption of such a policy in Canada. There are two main objections made to a minimum incomes policy:

38. 1. the country can't afford it, and

39. 2. it would create an incentive for people to avoid productive work—to subsidize laziness and irresponsibility.

40. On the first point, the major arguments against seem to be on the one hand, that people simply are not willing to make the necessary income transfer, and on the other, on a more sophisticated level, that added expenditures for consumption would excessively contract savings for investment, slowing the growth of the economy and making everyone worse off in the final analysis. We have no easy arguments against these objections. They involve in part economic analysis, and in part basic ethical and political judgments. We would point out, however, that faced with the triumphs of technology in this age, the case against such policy must be made much more convincingly than it now is, because the credibility gap between those who believe we can and should do it and those who believe we can't and shouldn't is going to grow rapidly. The issue urgently needs to be grappled with.

41. On the other side, there are potentially great, if difficult to calculate, economic benefits to be obtained from eliminating conditions of dire poverty, reducing excessive dependence on welfare administrations, and improving morale, attitudes and willing social participation in the whole community. This aspect of the matter should also be urgently assessed. The economic waste created by poverty is high.

42. On the second argument, that of encouraging laziness and irresponsibility, our view is that to oppose sound and progressive social policy, on grounds that if given half a chance large numbers of people are going to choose to lead unproductive and selfish lives, provides an unfortunate commentary on society. We doubt if it is true to a large degree, in any case. If the problem exists, and we do not say that it is altogether absent from the situation, the solution surely lies in improving attitudes and values in our society, not in aggravating the problem by avoiding the implementation of otherwise sound policy.

43. The Negative Income Tax method has many features which appear to cope with this objection. While it has not been widely tested, it does appear to hold our great potential. Particularly it does not involve a means test or supervision, which are two of the less desirable features of most welfare programs.

44. Secondly, there is much less disincentive to improve the economic position of the individual and family by themselves than under present systems.

45. Thirdly, it would be relatively simple to administer through an extension of the present income tax system.

46. Such advantages cannot be ignored and we would urge a large scale test be undertaken in a rural and an urban area as soon as possible to assess the effectiveness of the technique in relieving poverty and in helping people to help themselves.

47. The point is, of course, as we have tried to make clear, looking at the farm context, that there are many cases of real need, which from a social point of view should undoubtedly be met, in which measures of direct assistance in some form are required and in which it is clear that a minimum incomes policy is the most direct, simple, inexpensive, equitable and socially dignified means of meeting the problem. It would not solve all problems of welfare requirements, but it would meet many of them. Many expensive, and often undignified, forms of welfare programs could be avoided. It is altogether likely that the real cost to the nation, taking into account savings in expenses and improvements in productivity over the years, would be much less than many imagine.

48. We have not, in this submission, gone in for the presentation of a great deal of data. The essential issues are in our view not changed in any case by trying to put exact numbers on them. Conditions change very rapidly, and in any case, we have no new figures to present. The analysis of the census data in the document entitled "Low Income Sector in Canadian Agriculture" prepared for the Canadian Agriculture Congress last Spring gives the statistical picture pretty well, and the analytical approach is, we think, a useful one. The Canadian Council on Rural Development, too, will be presenting evidence regarding standards of living of rural people.

Domestic Food Programs

49. Recently a major Conference was held in the United States in which the question of policy for meeting food deficiencies in the diet of the United States population was intensively explored, with recommendations coming out of it for major expansion of the school lunch and food stamp programs in that country. Although a good study of the question is not available (and should be made) there is little doubt that even today there are many people in our society who do not get enough food, and of the right kind. This is a poverty problem, not a high food price problem.

50. We think it is absolutely ridiculous, in this day and age, with our capacity to produce food far exceeding our markets, that everyone should not, as an absolute minimum, be well fed. Programs such as school lunch programs, food stamp plans, school milk programs, or other should be immediately worked out and applied to ensure that a sufficiency of good, nutritious food can be and is purchased by all our people.

Going About the Job

51. In looking at the question of more systematically and thoroughly tackling the problem of poverty, either by welfare or developmental means, it is abundantly clear that most areas of jurisdiction involved lie with the provinces. Yet many of the economic policy problems, perhaps most, to which poverty is related must be considered and dealt with on a national basis. The need for reasonable equity and uniformity of treatment of Canadians across the country is another real and important consideration in our national life.

52. It is not our intention to give any easy prescriptions for dealing with Canada's constitutional issues. It is clear to us, however, that

53. (1) Canada requires to a significant degree to have a national philosophy and approach to these questions, and

54. (2) That an increasingly with degree of Federal-Provincial co-operative study, policy development and activity will be required.

55. These are matters to which the Committee should give particular attention. The need for co-operative approaches and co-ordination of effort exists in farm policy, it exists in welfare policy, it exists in housing policy, it exists in economic development policy, and it exists in the aspirations of Canadian people, in our opinion.

Respectfully submitted,

Canadian Federation of Agriculture
February 17, 1970.

APPENDIX B

Submission to the Special Senate Committee on Poverty by The Vanier Institute of the Family,
17 February 1970.

Mr. Chairman,
Honourable Senators,

The Vanier Institute of the Family wishes to thank you for this opportunity to present this submission, and to express to you our concern regarding the large number of Canadian families now living in poverty. We also wish to commend your chairman and the members of the Senate for their quick response to the suggestion of the Economic Council of Canada, in its Fifth Review, that the Senate "might consider the advisability of creating a committee to enquire into the problem of poverty in Canada". The evidence submitted to your Committee at its hearings in Ottawa and in other centres is not only increasing our knowledge regarding the causes and effects of poverty, but making Canadians much more aware of this national problem and strengthening the determination of Canadian leaders, and, we hope, Canadian citizens generally, to respond actively to the call of the Economic Council "for a national commitment to move towards the elimination of poverty."

The Vanier Institute of the Family

This Institute, incorporated in 1965, was established as the result of a resolution passed at the Canadian Conference on the Family in 1964, that a permanent institute should be established to carry out research and studies on family problems, and to develop, in co-operation with other organizations, a program "rooted in the realities and concerns of Canadian families".¹ The Institute's membership represents the various ethnic, social, religious, occupational, geographical and other elements of Canadian society. Policy of the Vanier Institute of the Family is established by the Board of Directors, four of whom are nominated by the Prime Minister of Canada and the remaining 21 elected from among the members. The Institute is financed basically by the income from an endowment fund to which the Parliament of Canada voted an initial capital grant of $2,000,000. This has been supplemented by capital gifts from provincial governments, corporations, organizations, foundations and individuals, and by matching grants from the Federal Government. The Institute is required to make an annual report to the Government of Canada.

The Institute is not a social service agency established to give counsel and guidance to particular individuals or families in trouble. Nor is it a social welfare agency. We are attaching to this brief, as Appendix 1, a pamphlet outlining the purpose of the Institute, and giving a brief description of its research projects and other activities.

For centuries, the institution of the family has been taken for granted, and research on the family has not been considered necessary. But recent scientific, technological and social developments have produced changes which affect all families, internally and externally, about which we need to know more. Not that changes in values are new. Throughout the ages social values have continually changed, but more gradually and at a rate to which adjustment was easier. What is new is the rapidity and pervasiveness of change which through improved communication affects us all. While this has provided new opportunities for the enrichment of family life, in many families it has produced uncertainty, disruption and deterioration of family relationships. These developments have pointed up the need for a better understanding of the family and how it functions. The contribution of the Vanier Institute to this better understanding is twofold. The Institute initiates and supports research designed to add to the available information about the family. Through conferences and publications research findings and information from other sources are disseminated to professional workers, policy makers and others.

The Vanier Institute is interested in the family in all its aspects. We consider it to be not only the basic social unit of our society but also important among producing and consuming units in our economy. The family as an institution has survived many social upheavals, and in our cybernetic, technological and rapidly changing society it remains and will probably continue to be the primary source of love, acceptance, security and sense of identity for all its members, and the primary agent in the growth and development of the child. The Vanier Institute aims to strengthen this unit so that it can adapt and change and become more effective in enabling its members to cope constructively with the pressures and demands of our society.

We are particularly concerned with those forces which give the family the quality to survive and adapt successfully to changing conditions, and with the influences of society which appear to be damaging to families. The poverty which affects so many Canadian families today is thus of special concern to the Institute.

The publication of the Fifth Annual Review of the Economic Council of Canada in 1968, in which the Council pronounced the poverty in Canada a national disgrace and pointed out that one family in four was living in poverty, drew an immediate response from the Board of Directors of the Vanier Institute. One element in this response was a directive that an approach be made to the Economic Council with an offer to help with the further research which the Council had indicated was essential to build up the knowledge and understanding necessary for the elimination of poverty in Canada. As a result the Council and the Institute are jointly sponsoring a multi-disciplinary research project. This study, now in progress, is designed to add to our knowledge about early childhood in the hope that a better understanding of the effects of poverty on young children will lead to more effective preventive policies. One of the objects of this submission is to bring this inquiry, still at an early stage, to the attention of your Committee, and it will be referred to later in this submission.

Discrimination and Poverty

In preparing this brief, the Institute has accepted as a starting point and for analysis, the definition and poverty lines traced by the Economic Council and the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. We realize that the latter will be refined as research and surveys are carried further enabling allowance to be made for such factors as geographical influences, the disposition of property, etc. We have in addition examined evidence submitted to your Committee, material published by the Economic Council of Canada, by the Ontario Economic Council and other studies. We have been interested in a particular theme which has appeared in a number of these studies—the influence of the institutions in our society on poverty—and we propose to pursue this theme today.

The Ontario Economic Council in its study, "Poverty and Institutional Reform" points out how organized and vocal groups in our society have been able to influence change in institutions to protect their own interests, whereas the unorganized poor, because of their isolation and dispersion, have not been active participants in society. In its Sixth Review, the Economic Council of Canada, in discussing the cost of poverty to the economy due to the frustrations preventing the potentially employable poor from participating in a productive way in our society asks and answers: "If the unutilized or undeveloped human resources in Canada are potentially highly productive, why has our economic system failed to seek out and harness the potential of these resources? To some extent, this failure appears to be associated with institutional rigidities and attitudes... which have become embedded in policies and practices that tend to make the economy function in a way that is pervasively discriminatory against the poor". The Council then briefly refers to some aspects of discrimination—the labour market, transportation, education and some aspects of social welfare policies—which prevent the poor from developing their full income-earning potential and from pulling themselves out of poverty. There are, in addition, many other organizations and individuals who have, in their submissions to you or in other places, made reference to the biases against the poor which exist in various institutions.

The Institute is not in a position to provide new evidence on these statements, nor even to substantiate the evidence which has been presented by others. We have, however, been struck by the persistence of this theme of institutional and institutionalized discrimination. In this submission we draw together and re-examine briefly some of the evidence, and then suggest a hypothesis which, if fully substantiated, could help not only to explain poverty, but to indicate definite lines for policy and action for the eventual elimination of poverty in Canada. We have taken this approach because we believe that the process of formulating and testing such hypotheses is going to be essential to the further development of effective anti-poverty policies.

There are a number of theories about poverty in North America. They range from the simple (and easily refutable) "the poor are lazy", through "poverty is simply a lack of money" to more sophisticated theories about generational poverty, cultures of poverty and underdeveloped human capital. They are debated and debatable, and their validity depends, to some degree, upon the definition of poverty which is involved. To an even greater degree, however, their debatability is probably a product of the fact that the evidence available to substantiate them is fragmentary, never quite current, and always to some degree uncertain. It is our hope that the theory of poverty presented in this brief, in conjunction with the evidence, will be further examined and tested by the Committee and its staff, and that it will, like other theories of poverty, generate wide debate.

One of the themes which has recurrently appeared in testimony before your Committee and in the flood of literature on poverty which marked the 1960's has been the exclusion of the poor from the broader social and economic participation which is open to others. It is the exclusion of low-income people, when this exclusion is not voluntary on their part, which we define as being the essence of poverty. Is it possible that this involuntary exclusion arises, not from the characteristics of the poor themselves, but from the fact that in our society there is pervasive discrimination against low-income people—discrimination which, consciously, or unconsciously, permeates the policies of most of our major institutions? Such a theory, if it accords with the evidence, might go a long way towards explaining how poverty is created and sustained in an affluent society. It might also help to explain some of the differences between the characteristics of the poor and the non-poor. If the risk of becoming poor through income-interruption is greater at low levels of income (which in itself is evidence of discrimination), and if the poor are functioning in an environment in other ways less receptive or more hostile than that of the non-poor (to a degree which cannot be explained simply by the lower relative incomes of the poor), then, given equal effort and skill on the part of both, a poor man can expect to achieve less success in any given endeavour. As an illustrative metaphor we might ask whether the poor do not in fact function on a steeper portion of the hill with more icy patches!

The experience of less success or more frequent failure will affect attitudes and expectations. It could affect school-leaving age. It could affect employability. A relatively harsher environment could further reinforce disadvantage and discrimination as the individual and the environment interact. Is there evidence to suggest that this indeed is happening in our society? Is there evidence that some of our citizens live in a Canada Minor where they are not merely poor but where the very fact of their poverty serves to keep them poor?

The social and economic environment, a product of the attitudes and activities of the whole society, is embodied in large measure in social institutions. We have families and communities and governments, we have churches and clubs in abundance, we have markets for labour and for products, we have school systems and political parties. A close examination of the policies of at least the major institutions would be necessary to test the hypothesis that there is pervasive institutional discrimination against the poor. We have not undertaken such a test, but we have drawn together some of the readily available evidence presented in testimony to your Committee or in the results of recent research in Canada. The cumulative effect of this evidence, to us at least, indicates that a full and searching examination and documentation of the way many institutions function is urgently needed. We turn now to a brief consideration of the operations of a few of our institutions in relation to the poor.

The Labour Market

The thesis that the poor generally lack the motivation for work is no longer usually accepted. Lack of skills, poor education, malnutrition and often poor health place them at a disadvantage in the labour market. Evidence indicates that in the labour market low-income workers experience substantially more difficulty and greater frustration than other workers.

These difficulties begin as they enter or re-enter the market. They lack information as to jobs available, and for the most part rely on friends, relatives and other workers for information about job vacancies. These contacts are likely to be limited, especially if workers have led a relatively isolated life during a period of unemployment. Many do not buy newspapers, so are unaware of advertised jobs; often jobs in their neighbourhood are not advertised.

Experiences during periods of unemployment sometimes lead to a hostile attitude towards bureaucracy, so that some workers hesitate to apply for work at government employment centres. Unfortunately those who do apply cannot always be referred to prospective employers as many job vacancies are not reported to these centres. The Department of Manpower and Immigration is working to secure better co-operation from employers in reporting vacancies and in specifying more accurately requirements as to qualifications for jobs, and also to "reach out" to workers and youths who otherwise would not use the services of manpower centres. But to overcome the difficulties of poor workers much still needs to be done in this regard.

Even after finding employment the low-income worker faces conditions which make it relatively more difficult for him to increase his limited earnings or to bring his family above the poverty line. Many factors contribute to poor earnings, but there can be little doubt that some of these factors discriminate against low-income workers. Many of these workers outside the ambit of organized labour, are likely to receive lower wages than unionized workers, and indeed are not likely to be recompensed in accord with what their skills and efforts are actually worth to the economy. Nor are they likely to be among those recompensed for expenses of employment. Many of these workers fill jobs in essential services, (such as store clerks, some cleaners, dishwashers, etc), which offer regular employment, but in some cases do not pay the worker enough money to support his family adequately. It is not unusual that workers with large families, willing and capable of filling such jobs, cannot afford to take them, since their earnings would be less than the income the family could receive through welfare payments. Competition for higher-paying unskilled jobs, such as some jobs in construction, is usually intense. For some workers, however, these jobs are not possible, either through lack of the physical stamina which these jobs demand, or in some cases through lack of transportation to the job site. Moreover the intermittent nature of these jobs often offsets the advantage of the higher wage paid. Experiences such as these, and there are many others, tend to rob a worker of his motivation to work², of his self-confidence and self-esteem, and often lead to his family accepting a defeatist or more hostile attitude toward their environment.

Would better counselling and more-easily-available training have raised the earning capacity of some of these heads of family? A preliminary report on Employability and Public Welfare in 1968³, based on direct observations of the counselling by the former National Employment Service of 100 employables who had difficulty in sustaining a work pattern indicated that, after counselling, little was known of the client's work skills, family settings, social and psychological characteristics. The maximum amount of time spent in counselling clients was 9 minutes per month; and 25% of the clients were seen for counselling less than 1 minute per month. Such counselling could hardly have been helpful. The Department of Manpower and Immigration has opened over 350 Manpower Centres across Canada, whose function besides matching manpower demand with supply is to offer counselling, to disseminate information on jobs, and to provide other services to workers and immigrants. Good counselling is expensive, demanding trained personnel and time. If constitutional difficulties and lack of trained personnel should prevent the development and availability of good counselling services for workers across Canada, this will work particular hardship upon the poor. Manpower policies cannot be dissociated from the performance of the economy, and these policies must be oriented towards the upgrading of the labour force. It is particularly important that these programs be directed to disadvantaged workers who are not given the opportunity to participate in industry programs, and who are unable to finance further basic training on their own behalf. To date approximately 315,000 persons, more than half of whom are heads of families and many of whom have lived in poverty, have been taken into training under the Occupational Training for Adults Program. While both these and other measures indicate a lessening of some of the discrimination which many workers experience, they are piecemeal policies which do not lessen the form of discrimination which has the most serious effects, not only within the labour market but within the whole institutional structure—the discrimination associated with unemployment. The unskilled marginal worker, the old worker and the very young worker, these are the people who suffer most from income interruption. Although least able to bear it, they are the first persons to feel the burden of unemployment when restrictive policies are necessary to maintain price stability. Can poverty be eliminated if steps are not taken to shield the poor from the full brunt of the burden of maintaining price stability?

The Consumer Market

The market place for goods and services, the consumer market, is difficult territory for any householder to negotiate these days, but the difficulties faced by poor families are not simply those of having less purchasing power. The very fact of having less purchasing power can alter the character of the market in which they bargain. Less information, more fraud, higher prices associated with smaller quantity purchases, lack of transportation for family shopping, and many other elements enter to reduce further the real income that their limited dollars represent. Since these difficulties have been documented before this Committee by witnesses of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs it is not necessary to elaborate on them here. Consumer problems of poor families may be particularly serious because they can affect income-earning ability quite directly. Access to credit, to health services, to transportation, to education, and to various forms of public services are especially significant, and discrimination against the poor by such institutions as supply these goods and services could have grave consequences.

Consumer Credit

Among the most frequent purposes for which consumer loans are extended are the ordinary expenses of living, such as food and other expenditures, health care, and rent. Such access to credit in times of need has prevented many families from getting into deeper difficulties, and permitted them to sustain their economic equilibrium and their participation in the labour market. The poor, however, not only have much less access to this stabilizer than do others, but they often need help from this source more urgently, since few of them have privately contracted insurance policies or many other assets on which they can borrow. They also have less access to credit for the purpose of improving their earning capacity, such as paying tuition fees, meeting living expenses while retraining, or financing school-related expenditures for their children. The criteria for obtaining loans ("credit-worthiness"), rather than being based on the probable economic productivity of that credit, (which is appropriately the basis for extension of loans to business), tends to be based partly on the accumulated assets and current income but chiefly on the stability of the income of the applicant. The high risk of interruption of that income due to the high incidence of unemployment among the poor has already been noted. Due to this high risk and the fact that the poor tend to have both few assets and low incomes, loans, even for highly productive uses, may not be available to the poor. Thus, given an equal need for cash and similar intentions for its use, the poor man is still less likely than others to have access to credit.

About half of the applicants for consumer loans are regularly turned away. An analysis of the grounds for refusal of loans to poor borrowers would give some indication of the extent to which the poor experience discrimination due to the failure of society to devise a system for spreading the risk of income interruption. It is notable that studies of borrowers having difficulties with consumer debts indicate that a far higher proportion have difficulty because of income interruption arising from sickness, accident or interrupted employment than from irresponsible use of credit.

The lack of access to consumer credit also affects the way capital markets function, especially with respect to the creation of human capital. Education-related expenditures have an important place among the consumption expenditures of the non-poor⁴, even though the great bulk of funds for education in this country are derived from general tax revenues. The growing importance of the home environment to good school performance is gradually being recognized. So too is the need for private and public initiatives in retraining or maintaining skills in the face of changing technology. Both these developments point to the growing importance of the private investment process that goes on at the behest of individuals and within families. If there is a lack of access to consumer credit and to capital markets for the productive purposes of investment in human resources by the poor, then either the gap between the poor and the non-poor will widen or the poor must be given precedence in our publicly organized programs. The proposal by the Special Joint Committee on Consumer Credit for guaranteeing loans to the poor on grounds of equity is further strengthened by this argument. Economic efficiency and the public interest are not served by consumer credit being extended with no consideration as to its probable economic productivity. Thus the contention that "red convertibles" should not take precedence over loans to the poor for productive purposes is an argument supportable on grounds both of equity and efficiency. It is also an argument of particular importance at a time when restrictions on consumer credit are being considered. Reducing the availability of consumer credit irrespective of its proposed use would clearly be discriminatory against the poor as well as economically wasteful.

Education

With respect to the education system, the evidence to support an hypothesis of discrimination is very strong. It may be related to the several levels of education.

The effects of early childhood experiences on the development and learning capacity of the young child have been well documented by research in other countries. Results to date appear to indicate that the experiences of a very young child in a deprived environment may so affect its future development that it may never develop to its full potential. This is the area where the Economic Council of Canada and the Vanier Institute are jointly sponsoring further research. We are attaching to this submission a memorandum prepared by Dr. T. Ryan of Carleton University to inform the Committee more fully of this problem in relation to poverty and the attention being given to it through research and experiment in Canada and elsewhere. Unfortunately the understanding of the importance of early childhood experiences and the services available to help families to maintain or enrich these experiences are still very much confined in Canada to the non-poor.

The evidence on performance within the school system itself clearly suggests that the educational system takes a larger toll of children from low-income families.⁵ Their progress tends to be slower, their grades lower, and their drop-out rate higher than their class-mates' from non-poor homes. Those children from low-income families who persist in the school system are also much less likely to continue their education than are children from non-poor families.⁶ The basis on which higher education is provided in this country still requires some substantial commitment of personal resources, and in addition some evidence, for admission, of good past performance in the school system. Both may be particularly difficult for the poor to provide. Despite the fact that substantial public resources flow into higher education they do so in a way which is regressive with respect to the distribution of income: that is to say, these resources tend to be raised by taxation which bears most heavily upon the low and middle class income groups (e.g. municipal property taxes), but they tend to be expended on the children of the higher income groups, who are able to reap greater advantages from the public education system. It is also notable that, for those who drop out of school and who, subsequently, wish to obtain training, federal training allowances are only available after a three-year hiatus, except for trainees with dependents. Failure to overcome this constitutional problem which impinges more markedly upon low-income than on high-income persons is undoubtedly a discriminatory element in our educational institutions. What are the basic reasons for the discrimination to which the children of low-income families are subjected in the educational institution? Is it lack of public consensus as to the priority which should be given to education in the allocation of resources? Does this justify policies which make it difficult for students from poor families to secure financial resources (through student loans, etc) to continue their studies?

Health

In its booklet "Meeting Poverty", the Special Planning Secretariat pointed out that "low income groups receive less health care than higher income groups and their illnesses tend to be more severe". The introduction of medical care and hospital services since that report was written may have improved considerably the health care which low-income groups now receive. Whether or not all of these groups across Canada receive the same degree of care is another question, and one which we hope the Committee will examine.

To a certain extent poor health can result from the effects of other institutions, especially those of education, housing and government informational services. A contributing factor to ill-health is lack of proper nutrition. It is recognized that poor nutrition during pregnancy affects birth weight, which in turn affects infant mortality and morbidity. Many mothers of poor families having little or no knowledge of nutrition do not know how to spend their food dollars to secure the best nutritional value for their families. Nor do they always have knowledge of family planning and birth control methods so that the families with lowest incomes and education still have the largest number of children. (1967 Census). This means that "the economic pressure generated by a large family tends to be more severe among those who are least capable of coping with their family needs."⁷ To ensure better national health, and to remove the discrimination against the poor in these matters, close co-operation between Federal and Provincial authorities is necessary for a more effective policy. The National Survey on Nutrition announced by the Department of National Health and Welfare should point up the needs and the lines for action on the nutritional front. What will bring more action to provide more information on family planning? The way for action has been cleared by the amendment of the Criminal Code, and one Provincial Government has an active subsidized policy. Services in other Provinces appear to be less effective. It would be regrettable if the Federal Government should decide not to take any action to inaugurate a national information policy on family planning.

Housing

The damaging effects of inadequate housing on families cannot be too strongly stressed. Dilapidated houses, inadequate heat, insufficient basic plumbing facilities, overcrowding and lack of privacy cannot help but lead to family disruption and despair, ill-health and disease. It is only in recent years that there has been evidence of a serious public commitment in Canada to provide better homes and a better environment for poor citizens. For a number of years the national housing policy has assisted Canadians (through the insured loans provision of the National Housing Act) to acquire houses, but this policy has, for the most part, helped those who were able to help themselves. Statistics indicate that over the past decade the average income of borrowers under this section of the Act has been well above the average income of all families⁸ and "a decreasing proportion of low income families have been able to benefit from this provision of the Act".⁹ The recent change in the Act which increased the maximum value of a house for which a mortgage could be obtained (an amendment included in a package designated as assistance to low-income persons) could, unless deliberate efforts were made to confine its benefits, be absorbed by those best able to afford the more expensive dwelling, with the net result being fewer but more expensive homes financed.

The benefits which low-income families in urban areas used to receive from the construction of more expensive homes through the effect of the "trickle down" process or chain moves have now largely disappeared with the move "back to the city" and the high rate of new household formation.

In contrast to policies for home owners, the gross inadequacy of the provision of public housing units in the past, under other Sections of the Act, is a matter of record. Far too few units were built even to meet the minimum requirements of the poor, and too many families (including single aged surviving members) continue to exist in over-crowded, sub-standard, decrepit and depressing quarters.

Even where units have been built for poor families public housing laws and the policy regarding the administration of these housing units do not always ensure that there will be no discrimination against tenants who are poor. Three-quarters of all public housing tenants are poor working families who have large families and low income. Is the policy of tying the rents for these units rigidly to the income earnings of the family removing the incentive of the family to try and increase their earnings? Do contracts give the tenants all the rights commonly associated with tenancy and private housing? Do tenants of these units have privacy and stability of tenure? It is also highly doubtful whether enough consideration in designing public housing is always given to the needs for good family living. Are poor families being moved into box-like units which provide shelter, heat and plumbing, but few, if any, extra facilities, such as storage space, pay laundries, utility rooms, etc., and with inadequate space for study and for leisure activities of the family?

There is no simple solution to these problems, or to the basic problem of meeting the demand for decent housing for all our families. The experiments of some authorities to try and overcome problems of management, segregation, the removal of incentive, and, hopefully, the removal of the stigma attached to living in public housing in some areas, are encouraging. Even though it has been announced that, for the first time, housing for low-income families is now forming a really significant proportion of new housing construction, there is still no reason for complacency regarding the housing of families living in poverty.

The System of Justice

It would be difficult to defend the view that all Canadians feel equal before the law, and that there is not a bias in our legal system against the poor. It would also be difficult to maintain that the poor do not experience discrimination in the enforcement of the law and its daily application to their lives. But the poor also experience discrimination in obtaining equal effective status under the law, be it as tenants, debtors or borrowers. The Committee has already received testimony to this effect.¹⁰

As families, the poor experience discrimination in that, as the Minister of Justice has pointed out, "One may find two separate systems of family law—the family law of the rich created, developed and administered by the courts, and the family law of the poor, as public law administered largely through provincial and local non-judicial agencies, and sometimes more concerned with minimizing the cost of relief than maximizing the rights and interests of recipients".¹¹ The double standard also applies to the policy of government grants. For the poor, welfare grants are regarded as a charity—for the rich the receipt of subsidies and government aid is regarded as a right.

A further source of discrimination is the high cost of divorce proceedings especially since the adoption of the new federal legislation. Similarly the application of reciprocal enforcement of maintenance orders under various provincial legislation, affecting deserted and separated spouses and their children work serious injustices on the poor. These two aspects should be studied carefully and some remedial measures introduced without delay.

As a result of experiences in which they are victimized and bewildered, the poor regard the law not as a protector of their rights but as something to be avoided. They do not understand their rights under the law, nor do they always have the resources to fight for those rights or to protect their interests. Until they have assistance in understanding the law and knowing their rights they will continue, not without reason, to regard the law not as a protector of their rights but as a source of injustice.

The Fiscal System

For many years there has been considerable debate regarding the need for the reform of our tax structure. In its Sixth Annual Review, the Economic Council of Canada in its chapter on Poverty, in discussing the effects of economic stabilization policies, pointed out that under the present tax system "the poor are relatively overtaxed". A study for the Carter Commission on the incidence of taxation concluded that "the schedule of effective tax incidence for the total tax structure is regressive up to an income level of at least $3,000 and possibly $5,000 and mildly progressive beyond." In other words, the poor with incomes up to $3,000, and perhaps those with incomes up to $5,000, are bearing a higher proportional burden of taxation than those with higher incomes. The principle of permitting exemptions from incomes rather than giving tax credits is a contributing factor to this overtaxation of the poor. Another factor in our present system which discriminates against the poor is the lack of provision permitting the deduction for expenses incurred by an employee in earning wages. Nor is a deduction permitted for child-care expenses when both or the only parent is working. In its White Paper on Taxation the Government proposes to make some rectification on both these accounts—not permitting the less regressive tax credit but limited deductions from the incomes of those incurring these expenses.

The poor experience further discrimination in the policies developed for institutions to reduce the risk of income interruption to individuals and the risk of accident and its attendant costs. The Canada Pension Plan¹² and unemployment insurance do not cover the entire population: those who are excluded are predominately the poor.

Access to Information

Information systems constitute one of our social institutions. There are a myriad of such systems of communication, from the mass media to informal conversations over the back garden fence. Some of the information exchanged may be of great interest, but of no great economic or social significance; other pieces are vital to the efficient performance of individuals and families in labour markets, consumer markets or capital markets. Much of this vital information does not reach the poor. Many poor who are ill-educated are inexpert in the use of the language, and experience difficulty in both reading and writing. Many members of ethnic groups whose basic language is neither English or French, have similar disadvantages in the use of one of these languages. As a result, these groups tend not to read daily or weekly newspapers, or to read only newspapers in their native language which may not give much information regarding matters of concern to them in their daily living. Nor do these groups read pamphlets, brochures, etc, published by governments, industries, or voluntary agencies, which provide useful information on a variety of subjects. Lacking facility in reading, the poor are not aware of many occurrences or opportunities which could be helpful to them in their roles as workers, consumers, parents, etc. Since most poor families in Canada have TV and/or radio sets, most of their information comes from these media. Are we failing in our responsibility to the poor by not developing and using these media in a more creative and educational way? Is our tolerance of too much uninformative advertising on TV and radio more costly to the poor than to those of us who have had the education and experience which enables us to evaluate poor advertising? Technological developments in this field will undoubtedly make possible in the near future many new methods of distributing information. It is to be hoped that these systems will give special consideration to the needs of the poor in this regard.

Characteristics of the Poor

The hypothesis of institutional discrimination, if it were still sustained after a more systematic study of the evidence, might help to explain some of the observed characteristics of the poor. The exclusion, the non-participation, the interrupted income, the limited access to information important to them and inadequate consumption patterns may well account for some of the differences between the poor and the remainder of society.

The picture that emerges from the limited evidence above is one of two different Canadas, made different not by virtue of different institutions but by institutions which either operate or appear to operate differently for different users. Canada Major is a country of reasonable optimism and some expectation of security, of rising real standards of living, and of physical and social needs which are likely to be met. In Canada Minor the picture that emerges suggests insecurity, particularly the insecurity associated with unemployment and hence income interruption. There is also fear, and an expectation, of failure rather than success. Physical deprivation and social exclusion are often anticipated and experienced. Optimism in Canada Major and fear and alienation in Canada Minor constitute rational responses to the environment in each country. Citizens transported from one to the other find more than their income altered by the change. If the discrimination is as pervasive as a brief look at the evidence appears to indicate, policies which attempt to change the individuals in Canada Minor without changing the environment in which they function are bound to be expensive. They are, also unlikely to be attended with either substantial or permanent success. They may well impose great personal strain upon the recipients. Furthermore they could also be attempts to convert what is, under the circumstances, rational behaviour into irrational behaviour.

On the basis of limited but rather persuasive evidence, it appears that the current policies of our institutions may be maintaining poverty in Canada or at the very least delaying its elimination. It also appears that to the degree the poor have characteristics which differ from those of the non-poor, some part of this difference is likely to be attributable to the more unpleasant experiences they have accumulated in the environment in which they live. To ask them to change in the absence of environmental change is to ask for irrationality on their part.

Policy Implications

What can be concluded about pervasive discrimination against the poor? First of all, some part of it is undoubtedly inadvertent, and the apparent indifference of Canadians is a product of the fact that they are not aware such discrimination exists. We suspect, for example, that if the highly regressive nature of our tax system at low income levels was widely realized, and if the fact were known that the proposed increases in personal tax exemptions (supposedly on behalf of the poor) are in fact worth more to the rich than to the poor, this would lead to stronger support for a more equitable fiscal system.

Secondly, some part of it is simply short-sighted, a product of institutional policies which are never subjected to more than superficial examination and sometimes are not examined at all with respect to their effect on the poor. While the long-run costs of such short-run insensitivity may not be immediately apparent, they are nonetheless real and substantial.

Thirdly, the fact that discrimination is damaging both to the persons discriminating and to those who are discriminated against does not appear to be well understood, but it is an important one. Both sides lose from discrimination, and would lose even more from complete segregation. Interchanges which should take place, because each has something to offer the other, do not take place. This is true whether the interchange is cultural or an economic one.¹³ The conclusion must be that the interests of the larger society as well as the interests of the poor would be served by the reduction or elimination of discrimination against the poor.¹⁴

Society would also be served in another way. The accelerating pace of social change makes it imperative that we give thought to the kind of society we wish to have in future. An important and perhaps central element in this decision is the degree to which we wish to have power dispersed, to have individuals and families free to make their own decisions about where and how they will live and work, what skills they want to acquire and what vocations and avocations they wish to pursue. This freedom is directly related to the number of alternatives and the range of choices which are available to any person or family at any one time. Some people who have studied social systems and social change believe that systems function more satisfactorily when the power to make decisions is widely diffused, when individuals are as free as possible to decide for themselves where their interests lie.¹⁵ Discrimination, by denying alternatives to the poor, increases their dependency on others.

The elimination of poverty would not, of course, eliminate personal problems, but it would change very drastically the way in which individuals who are now poor can handle their problems. The difficulties of their children at school, the transfer from a dead-end job to one that offers potential for personal development or service, the obtaining of needed information about consumer goods, and the obtaining of justice before the law, can all be handled differently by families having adequate resources.

The dependency of the poor, which is forced upon them by the absence of alternative opportunities, imposes an unnecessary burden of political and administrative decision-making on governments. This burden extends across a spectrum of social welfare and income maintenance policies and embraces as well decisions about taxation. It inevitably imposes rigidities, making the whole social system less flexibly responsive to change. Needed adjustments are made only after a lapse of time, and when made, may be more abrupt or extreme than is desirable.

What does all this imply for anti-poverty policies?

- It implies that they have substantial benefits, benefits extending well beyond the benefits to the poor themselves. These benefits ultimately take the form of a better-functioning democratic social system, as well as a more productive economy.

- It implies that an essential component of anti-poverty policies is institutional change.

- It implies that important anti-poverty policies can be undertaken even at a time when the overall demands on the economy cannot be increased for fear of generating further inflation, because institutional change does not require additional resources so much as it requires the reallocation of existing efforts and the rethinking of existing priorities.

- It implies that job opportunities for the unemployed poor are particularly important, and that these should not be unduly delayed by the current need for restrictive policies. There is, after all, no real cost of employing unemployed resources. Furthermore, the unemployed are not being taken from any alternative which they would not gladly give up.

- The exclusion of the poor from the broader social and economic participation which is open to others is not voluntary on their part.

At this point it must be stressed that the most important factor for the elimination of poverty is the rate of growth of the economy and the provision of jobs through this growth. But the experience of recent years when our economy has grown and expanded indicates that growth alone will not solve the problem of poverty. The majority of Canadian families and individuals have benefited from the increasing affluence of our society, but many members have been left behind in poverty suffering from inadequate incomes and an inadequate standard of living.

We have submitted for debate the hypothesis that the essence of poverty is the exclusion of the poor from the broad social and economic participation in our society which is open to others. In other words because of the pervasive discrimination in the policies of our major institutions, the poor are unable to lift themselves and their families above the poverty line, and so remain in poverty.

1. Need for co-ordination

In recent years, and at the present time, governments at all levels have adopted policies to ease the burden of poverty stricken citizens. Unfortunately, there has not been sufficient co-ordination of these policies. Can there be an effective direction and co-ordination of policy without a central agency?

2. Need for institutional change

The policy of such an organization should be directed to a study in depth of the policies and structures of our institutions to ascertain the extent to which these institutions prevent the poor from pulling themselves out of poverty and developing their full income-earning potential.

3. The right to work

Accepting the thesis that the poor do not lack the motivation to work, we maintain that the most devastating discrimination is the lack of opportunity for regular employment which will provide sufficient earnings to keep a worker's family at an acceptable standard of living. Those who wish to work should have the right to work. This principle has particular importance at the present time when restrictive policies are aiming to secure price stability.¹⁶ The burden of unemployment is falling on those least able to bear it—the unskilled and marginal workers, the old worker and the very young worker. Statistics of unemployment should indicate the level of unemployment among these workers as compared with that of skilled workers.

Are we as citizens fully accepting our responsibilities for the social effects of our economic policies? When jobs disappear, incomes of the unemployed are partially maintained through unemployment insurance payments, or failing these through welfare payments. Are we willing as citizens to continue policies which, discriminate against the large proportion of our population, are costly to us as taxpayers and ignore the opportunity of increasing productivity in areas where we are demanding increased production—such as better services, better housing and other facilities? Is it more costly to society to use human resources productively than to maintain them on welfare payments? Are our welfare policies closely associated with those who could organize the production of services and better public facilities needed by society? Why is there an entrepreneurial gap between the worker and his productive employment? Do we lack the imagination, intelligence, courage and determination to guarantee jobs for all those who desire them? Are government and industry making available sufficient training facilities for workers, whether they need additional basic education or training in work skills, so they will be able to meet the requirements of jobs in productive employment?

4. Assistance for those who cannot earn

Those persons who cannot earn adequate incomes should be assured of security of income tied to fluctuations in the cost of living.

5. Social security policy

The policy on social security to be announced in the near future in a White Paper should be carefully examined to ensure that any recommended action should not continue discrimination of any institution against the poor.

6. Taxation policy

Similar assessment should also be made of future taxation policies especially to ensure the avoidance of any regressive measures burdensome to lower income groups.

The logical conclusion of our thesis is that future policies on poverty must be designed to remove the basic causes of poverty rather than merely to ameliorate the problems of the poor. The elimination of poverty can only be secured through the mobilization of the efforts of all sectors of the community—government and non-government.

Poverty and Young Children:

A Brief Submitted to

The Special Senate Committee on Poverty

Thomas J. Ryan, Ph.D.

This brief has been prepared at the request of the Vanier Institute of the Family for submission to the Special Senate Committee on Poverty. Responsibility for its content rests with the author. The recommendations presented are those of the writer and do not necessarily reflect those of the Board of Directors of the Vanier Institute.

THE CONCEPT

It is necessary to recognize that poverty as a single concept does not exist. In the notes which follow, the concept of poverty is used not only to indicate that a child comes from a home of economically deprived circumstances, but also to indicate that he likely encounters a number of other factors known to be associated with economic deprivation. These factors include social alienation, geographical isolation, low education level of parents, and particular patterns of child rearing. It is to be understood that the data and arguments which are presented below may also be applicable to certain children from high income groups who have experienced particular patterns of child rearing. The main point is, however, that the data and arguments presented below have a greater probability of being applicable to children from lower as compared with those from higher income groups.

CHARACTERISTICS OF DISADVANTAGED CHILDREN

Physical Growth

The consequences of poverty for children seem to be evident even before birth. The probability of a pregnancy ending in abortion or stillbirth is greater the lower the socio-economic status of the mother. The incidence of relatively low birth weight for full-term infants, as well as premature births, is more common amongst women in the low income bracket. Interpretations of these findings bring to focus the fact that "poverty" refers to a complex concept with many facets. For example, women in low as compared with higher income groups:

- (a) tend to have a greater number of children, which may be indicative of lack of information regarding family planning and/or lack of money for birth control procedures;
- (b) tend to be shorter in height, which may be a reflection of the mother's poor nutrition and/or other environmental factors during her own earlier life;
- (c) tend to report for medical care relatively late in pregnancy, which may increase the probability of prenatal complications.

To single out one causal factor for the low birth weight of infants from low socio-economic groups is indeed difficult although it is certain that socio-economic status is in some manner involved.

Nutrition bears special mention. Studies which have most clearly shown the relationship between nutrition during pregnancy and infant birth weight have been those conducted with animals. Of course there is always some uncertainty in generalizing findings from infra-humans to humans. However, cross-cultural studies with human subjects, which have compared infant birth weight between the more and less developed countries have provided supporting evidence for the relationship between nutrition and birth weight. It is known that low infant birth weight is related to infant mortality and morbidity. If it is the case, as the evidence suggests, that nutritional status during pregnancy is less adequate for low than for higher income mothers, the implications are obvious. The fact that the infant mortality rate among Eskimos is more than ten times the infant death rate for the population as a whole may reflect, at least in part, inadequate maternal nutrition. Infant mortality is also relatively high amongst the Indians, although not as severe as for the Eskimos.

Health and physical growth following birth have also been shown to be related to socio-economic status; the role of nutrition again is of major importance. Once more the animal literature provides the most substantive evidence relating physical size as well as longevity to nutritional factors. Simply increasing the number of rats to be suckled from one mother from the first day of life until weaning, has resulted in a decreased growth rate of the infants and also slowed down the time of anatomical, physiological, and biological maturity. For humans, it has been shown that at maturity, the average difference in height between high and low socio-economic groups ranges around an average of 5 per cent of mature height. The shorter stature of children from lower social classes has long been known, whether due to diet or other environmental factors. It has also been established that the average life expectancy for Indians and Eskimos is well below that for the population in general. Unfortunately, similar evidence is not available for other less advantaged groups in Canada. Other studies have shown that an improved economic status of parents who had previously reared children under less favourable circumstances, had a favourable effect on the height of later children. Thus, even with similar hereditary characteristics, an improved economic status and its coincident environmental changes, resulted in a greater height for children.

An important message can be derived from studying the growth curves on the development of height in humans from birth to maturity. These curves portray a very rapid early development, followed by a period of a very slow but steady growth, followed by the adolescent spurt in height growth. The influence on environmental factors on height is most clearly demonstrated when extreme environments are studied and it appears to be the case with both animal and human populations that the effect of the environment is greatest in the period of most rapid normal development. Thus, the implication is that interventions designed to influence physical growth, as well as general physical well-being, in Canadian children should be focused upon early childhood if they are to have optimal effect.

Intellectual Development

It has been known since early in this century that lower socio-economic children perform more poorly than middle and upper economic level children on standard tests of intelligence. Actually, tests of infant development which are heavily loaded in terms of items assessing sensory and motor development, show a slight negative relationship between test scores and socio-economic status. Later, as the tests become more loaded with verbal content, the positive relationship between IQ socio-economic status becomes evident. Furthermore, the size of the discrepancy between the performance levels of children from higher and lower socio-economic conditions increases over the elementary school years. During infancy, especially in the first 12 to 18 months of life when tests are essentially assessments of sensori-motor behaviour, not only is the positive relationship not evident, but there is even a slight negative relationship between test scores and socio-economic status.

There is reason to believe that the environments experienced by disadvantaged children during the first year of life may facilitate sensori-motor development, relative to middle-class children. Consider the following example. In an overcrowded lower-class home (or room), a new infant may experience more varied visual and auditory stimulation simply because of the presence of many people passing by as compared with a middle-class infant conveniently located in his own room in a quiet area of the house. This activity level may well serve to arouse the infant's attention and activity and thereby advance his sensori-motor development. These same environmental conditions may subsequently become detrimental to intellectual development. The previous example may be continued. As the infants grow older, the one from the lower-class home may find that his attempts at locomotion leave him in the way of others, thereby arousing their ire, that his attempts at vocalization are too faint to overcome the high auditory level about him, that his attempts at vocalization are rarely reinforced, that in his one-parent family the mother is too busy to pay any particular attention to him other than what is essential, that the low education level of the parent(s) has not prepared him (them) to provide the adequate stimulation their new infant needs to promote his intellectual development. On the other hand, the middle-class infant is given particular attention at certain times, including a large dose of verbalization on the part of the parent and a considerable amount of reinforcement for his own attempts at vocalizing and engaging in locomotor behaviour. Whether or not his model of the early environments of low and upper-class children is a good one, the fact that children from low socio-economic conditions perform poorly on tests of intellectual development is indisputable.

It is often said that it is unfair to make IQ comparisons between children of upper and lower income groups, or from different ethnic backgrounds, because the items in such tests are culture loaded and thereby mask assessment of "true" intelligence. It is correct to say that the tests are culture loaded. However the illogical nature of the argument stems from the failure to realize the purpose for which intelligence tests were originally developed. These tests were developed in the beginning of the century to predict academic performance. In order to achieve this goal one must employ test items, the content of which is similar to school curriculum. It is a fact that IQ scores are positively related to academic achievement; the tests were constructed to do so. The strongest relationship between IQ and academic achievement occurs during the middle elementary school grades. It is also a fact that children from lower socio-economic conditions perform more poorly in school as compared with children from higher socio-economic levels. The poor performance of lower socio-economic class children on IQ tests as well as in scholastic achievement is a clear-cut state of affairs and the idea of fairness or unfairness of the tests is in one sense irrelevant. Where the notion of culture fairness has some relevance stems from the interpretations and conclusions one makes on the basis of such findings. It is erroneous to conclude that one's intelligence is of a predetermined and/or fixed nature and that some measure of intelligence during the early elementary school grades set some final level of attainment for a child. Intelligence except in certain cases where neurological disorder is evident, is not constant and can be influenced to a great extent by enriched experiences of various sorts, some examples of which will be presented in a later section of this brief. As was the case with height, growth curves of intelligence bear an important message concerning early environmental experiences. In terms of intelligence measured at age 17, about 50 per cent of the development takes place between conception and age four, about 30 per cent between ages four and eight, and about 20 per cent between ages 8 and 17. Thus, a single early measure of intelligence cannot be the basis for a long-term decision about an individual. Furthermore, the changing rate at which intelligence develops is evident from the fact that as much of the development takes place during the first four years of life as in the next 13 years. The crucial fact that the most rapid period of growth in intelligence is during the first four years of life leads to the implication that changes in environmental conditions will produce greater changes in intelligence if introduced in the early years than will equally marked changes in the environment at later periods of development. Keeping in mind the supposed environmental deficiencies of disadvantaged children, it follows that if there are environmental experiences which are essential for intellectual development, their absence during the early years will lead to intellectual deficit.

Language Development

A certain portion of the difference between the IQs of children from various socio-economic conditions is reflected on those parts of the test which assess verbal skills. Beyond this however, are the results of a wide range of studies which have demonstrated unequivocally that children from disadvantaged families are deficient in their ability to use standard English or French to represent and interpret their feelings, their experiences, and the objects in their environment. One should hasten to add that this deficiency is in terms of the use of standard English or French and that disadvantaged children may very well not be deficient in terms of the use of symbols and/or non-standard English or French as a means of communication.

The particular types of language differences shown depend, of course, on the kind of measures employed by given investigators. In this regard, studies have shown that there are more children with retarded speech development among lower as compared with upper economic groups. Tests of speech articulation also show relatively better performance for the higher socio-economic groups. Among young children preparing to enter school, children from lower socio-economic groups are easily a year behind in terms of maturity of speech articulation. They are even deficient in discriminating and mastering speech sounds.

As might be expected, tests of reading readiness given to first grade children show a strong relationship between social class and readiness scores. In fact, one study showed that dividing the children into high and low groups on the basis of reading readiness scores results in very nearly exactly the same two groups as when divided on the basis of social class. Thus, at the grade-one level children from poor socio-economic backgrounds begin school with a deficiency in reading skill, the most important single skill one must possess if he is to attain his potential as a human being.

Further studies indicate the extent to which general language usage is related to socio-economic status. For example, the number of words used per remark, maturity of sentence types, complexities of sentences, and the use of concepts in discussions have all been shown to be in favour of upper socio-economic children. The language of lower-class youths is restricted in form and confines thinking to a relatively low level. These differences in the use of language may have important implications for learning. As lower-class children grow older, they fall further and further behind the middle-class children on those language variables mentioned previously. This cumulative deficit becomes more acute as it affects concept formation and problem-solving abilities. Thus disadvantaged children experience difficulty in abstract thinking and categorizing. Delayed language acquisition may interfere with the transition from concrete to abstract modes of thought. The fact that reasoning in disadvantaged children appears to be dominated by inductive rather than deductive processes may limit the child's ability to make acute generalizations and to transfer knowledge through the utilization of previously learned concepts.

The most important external factors affecting verbal development appear to be certain features of the child's early environment. Reinforcing or rewarding a child's vocalizations has been shown to increase the rate of vocalizing in infants as young as three months of age (vocalization in this case merely refers to making sounds, a necessary forerunner to speech). It has been established that there is less reinforcement given to a child's early vocalizations in the lower-class home along with a lower level of verbal play and verbal interaction. Frequent verbalizing on the part of the mother functions not only to expose a child to new words but also to help shape the child's sounds through differential reinforcement so that speech maturity will be attained. The effect of the lack of exposure to adult verbal stimulation during early life has been shown in studies of children reared in institutions where there were an insufficient number of adults to provide steady verbal stimulation. These studies indicate that institution-reared children vocalize less than children reared in their homes, a difference which shows up as early as six months of age.

A recent, interesting, and important area of research has been concerned with the differences in language styles across different socio-economic groups. The following exemplifies the point. If a child is to be quiet one might say on the one hand, "Shut up". On the other hand, one might say, "Would you please be quiet for a minute? I'd like to make a phone call. If you make a noise, I will not be able to hear very well." In these two approaches to the same problem, the second displays a greater quantity and quality of words, the introduction of a time dimension, and some reasoning. The first expression is merely a two-word imperative, and not a very kindly one at that. It has been shown that these are the kinds of stylistic differences which distinguish between lower and upper socio-economic groups. With this type of model to imitate, it is no wonder that the disadvantaged child arrives at grade one not only deficient in linguistic capabilities but also in terms of his general cognitive functioning.

As for intelligence, there is a need for children from disadvantaged backgrounds to be provided with language experiences during their early life. Although we cannot specify the optimal age for beginning language training with young children, studies have indicated the positive effects of language training for children as young as three months of age and on up through the preschool years. For example, it has been shown that giving verbal reinforcements when human infants make sounds will increase the rate of vocalizing in infants as young as three months of age. Another experiment was conducted with one-year-old infants from lower socio-economic conditions whose mothers typically do little reading to them. The mothers agreed to read to their children for a minimum of 10 minutes per day from the time the babies were about one year old. At 20 months of age the children's speech development was well above that typical for children of their age and socio-economic level. Other studies have shown that language level can be dramatically changed during the preschool years. For example, in one study 11 orphanage children ranging in age from three years seven months to six years ten months were well matched with a control group. The experimental group was given special speech and language training on weekends for a total of 92 hours over seven and a half months. The training consisted of giving help in understanding words and concepts, looking at and discussing pictures, and listening to poems and stories. The experimental group gained significantly relative to the control group in terms of scores on 10 and vocabulary tests. Thus language training of various sorts is effective if introduced in early childhood. Since speech and reading difficulties are so frequently encountered during elementary school by disadvantaged children, it is imperative that further research be conducted on methods of language training as well as on the discovery of the optimal age for language training.

Personality Development

The research findings concerning personality development in disadvantaged children are certainly less well-established as compared with findings concerning his physical, intellectual, and verbal-linguistic attributes. Thus special note is to be made of the urgent need for research in this area.

A child's capacity to engage in fantasy, whether in play or in imagery, is an important feature of normal development. An imaginative capacity seems to have both socially and personally adaptive implications. A developing child possesses a fundamental capacity for tactual, visual, and auditory exploration of novel environments and to assimilate newly found information into his cognitive structure. This results in opportunities for imagination and thought which are perhaps revealed in reverie, dreams and play which in turn, provide the exercise of certain verbal and imagery skills and the development of additional capacities for self-entertainment. A review of the conditions conducive to the development of imaginativeness indicates that such conditions are not advantageous for children from low socio-economic backgrounds. The evidence suggests that fantasy play and daydreaming are enhanced through extended and close contact with an adult who provides consistent attention, frequent verbal interaction, who reads and tells stories to the child, and even engages in imaginative play himself. An opportunity to engage in solitary play is important for the integration of imaginative materials. Firstborn and only children are more likely to have the time, the privacy, and the opportunity for greater contact with adults to permit full development of fantasy play. Large peer-group play structures often impede the development of imaginative play. Certain cultural factors facilitate the development of creative play. These include parental tolerance and encouragement of imaginative play. An opportunity to observe adult models engage in fantasy, and varied toys for the opportunity for complex sensory interaction with varied environments. The cultural milieu of poor persons with limited economic, educational, and general interaction opportunities probably restricts the possibilities of imaginative play amongst poor children. Although television no doubt increases the amount of material exposed to disadvantaged children and thereby arouses interests and desires the lack of privacy and opportunities for fantasy play are not conducive to the development of an imaginative capacity, which later in life can serve as a valuable alternative to impulsive action, poor planning, anti-social behaviour, and extreme motor restlessness. It is to be noted at this point that the suggestion that opportunities for the development of fantasy behaviour are less optimal for children from lower socio-economic groups is a matter in need of immediate research.

One of the key prerequisites to adequate personality development and social functioning is the development of normal dependency (seeking of help or emotional support from others) during infant and early childhood. Children must learn that the attention of others is meaningful to them if they are subsequently to become responsive to the efforts of parents and teachers. Conditions necessary to the development of early attachments include parental responsiveness in some regular manner to an infant's needs. Parental neglect in this regard is an antecedent of weak development of the affectional system in young children. During later childhood, unless affectional behaviour is extended to include age-mates, the chances of academic success and good emotional development are lessened. Parental rejection and its concomitant conditions of neglect and cruelty has been clearly shown to prolong dependence upon adults and to interfere with affectional development. Father absence prior to the age of about six years, prolongs dependence and interferes with adequate sex-typing in boys; for girls, father absence has been shown to lead to inappropriate interpersonal attitudes. Although it is the case that one-parent families are a more frequent occurrence among the economically deprived, the findings referred to above concerning dependency and the development of affectional behaviour have not been obtained from studies with disadvantaged children. Although the implication seems clear that dependency will be prolonged and affectional development will be delayed amongst children from deprived conditions, there is a major gap in this area of research.

Achievement motivation (the tendency to strive for success when one's performance is evaluated against a standard of excellence) has been found to be positively related to socio-economic status among children, as well as among adolescents and adults. In comparison to lower-class mothers, middle-class mothers have been observed to encourage and reward children for verbal efforts, to generally reinforce desirable behaviour more often, and to emphasize the early development of independence and mastery. Furthermore, in crowded lower-class homes, where both parents may be away for a good part of the day and where the parents lack the intellectual sophistication, the child's early efforts at verbal and cognitive mastery are less likely to be rewarded than in middle-class homes, resulting in lower expectations for reward for intellectual effort. When low expectation for reward is coupled with a high expectation for failure to meet adult demands, the development of school anxiety is likely to be a consequence. One further point to be added is the fact that the main difference between the achievement orientations of the poor and the more affluent lies not in their choice of goals but in their expectations of attaining them. Teacher behaviour and expectations are also of importance with respect to this point. A large amount of the responsibility for the academic problems of poor children lies with the teachers and school administrators, because culturally disadvantaged children are not expected to learn. The fact that they do not learn as well as middle-class children is often used as an alibi for educational neglect.

Low self-esteem (an individual's evaluative attitude toward himself or a personal judgment of one's worthiness which reflects the extent to which successes approach expectations in personally valued areas) is also characteristic of disadvantaged children. A person who values academic competence, as appears to be the case for most disadvantaged youth, but who performs poorly is likely to suffer devaluation. For such a person to define himself as successful would require a diminution of the value of education, a lowered expectation of success, or an attack against the school system. Each of these characteristics has been found to occur among disadvantaged youth.

The evidence abounds that persons who live in conditions of family disorganization, financial instability, and social rejections are likely to be lower in self-esteem than their opposites. Nor does self-esteem exist apart from other characteristics. Persons with a low self-esteem tend also to be socially withdrawn and apprehensive, inclined to reject their own perceptions and judgments while accepting those of other persons, lacking the social skills and ease that make for friendships and social participations. They are likely to be self-conscious, with feelings of helplessness and hopelessness. They have high anxiety which is associated with poor performance on academic and vocational tasks. For children, low self-esteem is also associated with an expectation of failure which coincides with their teachers' negative perceptions of them.

One of the most striking findings regarding the families of disadvantaged children is the consistent absence of conditions associated with the formation of high self-esteem. These include acceptance of the child by his parents, clearly defined limits and values, and respect and latitude within the defined limits. For disadvantaged children, their often absent, apathetic, and rejecting parents do not provide good models of how to succeed.

The research summarized above presents a syndrome of personality consequences of disadvantage. The variety of personality consequences associated with disadvantaged backgrounds seem to be somewhat interchangeable in relation to the consequent behaviour and performance. As is the case with intellectual and linguistic development, the effects of disadvantaged conditions upon personality development seem to be cumulative over time. Although sufficient longitudinal data on the development of personality characteristics are sadly lacking, there is a theoretical and an empirical rationale for suggesting that the major development of personality takes place during early childhood. The theoretical basis stems from the implications from psychoanalytic theory that the first five years of life are the most important for personality development. Empirical rationale is derived from longitudinal studies on the development of intellectual interests, dependency and aggression. These studies indicate that by about the age of two at least one-third of the variance, and that by the age of five one-half of the variance at adolescence, in terms of intellectual interests, dependencies and aggression is predictable. If future research corroborates these implications, it will be clear that the major portion of personality as well as intellectual and linguistic development occurs early in life and that any attempts to alter a child's environment would have greater benefits if introduced during those years.

ALTERNATIVES FOR DISADVANTAGED CHILDREN

Having described certain characteristics of disadvantaged children, some thought must be given to the question, "What can we do for them?" One answer to this question has been in the literature for several decades. This is the response that a large proportion (estimates range from 60 per cent to 80 per cent) of intelligence is inherited. The failure of compensatory education programs has recently been cited as evidence for the heritability of IQ. Since selective breeding is not a likely alternative to be chosen at this time, the hereditarians would argue that about all that one can do for disadvantaged children is to be cognizant of the existence of extensive individual differences and to prepare specific educational programs in accordance with the needs and characteristics of the children going to school. Irrespective of whether heritability and/or early experiences are the cause, it is important of course, to be aware of individual differences and not to expect all students to perform and behave comparably. The development of the ungraded and continuous learning program in Canadian schools, which allow an individual to progress at his own pace, has stemmed from such an awareness. Probably in no Canadian school, however, has the focus upon individualized programming been developed to the fullest extent, mostly because this would require the expense of a vastly increased number of teachers.

The estimates regarding heritability of intelligence have been attacked from many sides including:

- (a) the inappropriate statistical techniques employed in arriving at such estimates; and
- (b) the erroneous conclusion regarding the failure of compensatory education programs which,

having been introduced so recently, cannot and have not been fully evaluated.

Actually, whether the environment accounts for 20 per cent, 40 per cent, or 90 per cent of intellectual development is, in a sense, irrelevant. If one can specify the quantitative and qualitative features of environments that lead to changes in subsequent cognitive functioning, then the extent of the heritability of intelligence is not too important. What evidence is there, whether empirical or inferential, that alterations in the early environmental experiences of individuals are related to later cognitive functioning?

The largest body of evidence comes from the animal literature where the timing and types of manipulations of early experiences have been most rigorously controlled. Experiments with rats have been conducted in which the experimental animals were given many opportunities for spontaneous learning, as opposed to formal training, whereas control animals were reared in the normal barren laboratory cages. The "rich" environment of the experimental animals is typically larger in size and includes a wide variety of objects and playthings.

Subsequently, rats in the experimental groups perform much better than the controls in various learning and problem solving tasks. Similarly, rats which were given gentle handling (tactile stimulation) as opposed to no handling during their early life have been found to perform better than the control animals in learning tasks. Rats handled during the first 7 to 10 days of life have a reduced tendency to be fearful, as judged on the basis of urination and defecation in a strange situation, they learn avoidance behaviour more readily, and they survive longer when deprived of food or water. Differences due to early experiences are not exclusively related to behaviour. It has also been shown that rats reared in rich environments have a larger brain and a greater accumulation of the enzyme acetyl-cholinesterase in the cortex as compared with controls. The effect of stimulating environments is more pronounced if introduced within certain time periods, referred to as critical periods, early in the life of the rat.

Social behavioural patterns have also been shown to be related to early experiences in mice, monkeys, and dogs. The most prominently studied social behaviours investigated are aggression and sexual behaviour. Thus learning to fight in mice appears to be related to being reared in groups during the first 10 to 20 days of life; attacking behaviour in fox terriers is reduced if reared in isolation during an early period of development; monkeys reared with "dummy" mothers do not develop normal patterns of sexual behaviour. Normal sex behaviour in monkeys will develop if reared by a monkey mother and/or if allowed 20-minute play periods with other young monkeys during their early life. If monkeys are reared apart from other monkeys beyond the period when they spontaneously play with their peers, then both sexual and maternal behaviour fail to develop normally.

The literature dealing with the effects of early experience upon the intellectual, physical and social development of infra-humans, only a fragment of which has been reviewed above, leaves no doubt as to the important role played by various types and timing of stimulation. Although it is tempting to reflect upon the implications of this research for human development, one is cautioned (a) not to generalize findings too freely from the infra-human to the human level, and (b) to realize that the existence of critical time periods for maximizing human development only has suggestive empirical support, although derivations from certain theories of child development imply the existence of such periods.

If low socio-economic status were taken as a rough index of environmental deprivation, then the poor learning performance of deprived animals can be said to be paralleled by the poor school performance of disadvantaged children. It should be stated at the outset of this particular argument that one of the greatest needs in assessing the effects of various environments upon the subsequent behaviour of humans has to do with the need for developing measures of the environment as has been done in the animal studies. The lack of such measures has partly been responsible for the under-emphasis on the effects of environments in behavioural science. Presently, measures of environments consist of such variables as social class status, socio-economic level, and occupational and educational level of parents. These very general concepts are likely to have only moderate relationships with the more specific environments that influence the development of physical characteristics, intelligence, personality, and general school achievement. The environmental measures needed are ones which can be clearly related to specific individual characteristics. These measures must include aspects of the environment which theory and empirical research suggest are most likely to have some effect on any particular characteristic. Research along these lines is vitally and urgently needed and until done, the point that follows must remain unquantified and therefore tentative.

For the moment, we can say that a low socio-economic status is akin to environmental deprivation realizing full well that this crude index will tend to overlook the tremendous individual variation that exists amongst the daily lives of poor people as well as paying no justice to the known correlates of socio-economic status. The famous Coleman Report which appeared in the United States in 1966, indicated that the deficit in school performance of children from lower income groups was evident by grade one and became worse throughout the elementary school years. Intellectual assessments of children attending Head Start sponsored preschools in the United States indicate that intellectual deficits among children from poor homes are clearly evident by three years of age.

A current longitudinal research program, also in the United States, should provide useful information regarding how early in a young child's life the effects of disadvantage environments can be detected in terms of scales assessing mental and motor development. At the moment, an educated guess is that between 18 to 36 months of age, differences in cognitive development and style begin to appear in favour of upper and middle-class children as compared with children of lower, socio-economic groups. Additional longitudinal research is needed to more clearly isolate a critical time period in this regard. However, the best conclusion on the basis of the available evidence is that attempts to alter the environmental experiences of disadvantaged children should begin by at least three years of age. The fact that experimental manipulations of the environments of infra-humans have their greatest effects when introduced early rather than late in life is in agreement with the above conclusion.

Theoretical analyses of child development also focus upon early life. Psychoanalytic theorists have long argued that the first five years of life are the most important in terms of personality development. This seems to be the most important tenet of psychoanalytic theory which has lasted throughout the decades, while the heavy emphasis upon psychosexual factors in early childhood has fallen by the wayside. A Swiss psychologist, Jean Piaget, has presented a theory of cognitive development which also stresses the importance of early childhood. It is during these years that the foundation is laid for subsequent intellectual functioning. Hunt's book on Intelligence and Experience has served to bring Piaget's notions on intellectual development to North America and to knock from the pedestal proponents of the philosophy that we should leave children alone while they grow and avoid excessive stimulation. In view of conceptual developments and evidence coming from animals learning to learn, from neuropsychology, and from the development of intelligence in children, the assumptions that intelligence is fixed and that its development is predetermined are no longer tenable. It now appears that the counsel from experts on child rearing which was commonly given during the 1930's and 1940's that we should let children be while they grow and to avoid excessive stimulation was highly unfortunate. The problem for managing child development is to determine how to govern the encounters that children have with their environments to foster both an optimally rapid rate of intellectual development and a satisfying life.

An additional and extremely important conceptual analysis of child development is presented in a book by Bloom, Stability and Change in Human Characteristics. This book presents growth curves for physical, intellectual, achievement, and personality characteristics based upon longitudinal studies. From these data approximate curves show the theoretical development of each characteristic over time. These curves of development, although varying from one characteristic to another, lead to the generalization that growth and development are not in equal units per unit of time. For each stable characteristic there is usually a period of very rapid growth as well as periods of very slow growth. It is most likely that the period of rapid growth will be in the early years followed by periods of less and less rapid growth. This differential rate of growth with time is important to note because the importance of the influences which affect the growth of such characteristics is likely to be far greater in the periods of most rapid development of a characteristic than it is, at least quantitatively, in the periods of least rapid development.

INTERVENTION RESEARCH

In the light of the empirical data previously presented and theoretical implications, it is interesting to look at the results of several investigations which have attempted to assess the effects of environmental manipulations during early childhood. One of the most outstanding figures in this regard has been Maria Montessori who, early in this century, undertook to work with neglected and poverty stricken preschool-aged children from the slums of Rome. Among her novel teaching methods were the use of children's spontaneous interests in learning, that is "intrinsic motivation", training the perceptual processes, allowing children to work at whatever interested them for as long as they liked and the non-separation of the three-to-six-year-olds which gave the younger children a variety of novel models for imitation while supplying the older children with an opportunity to teach, a self-rewarding activity. The success of her methods was implied by the subsequent scholastic performance of her pupils. Unfortunately, comparisons with appropriate control groups matched on the basis of early experiences, were not conducted so that the evaluative information on the effects of this early training program remains in part subjective. In Canada the Montessori approach has recently blindly been adopted by our middle-class society, in the absence of evidence suggesting any subsequent benefits for the children. There has been no attempt to put into effect an updated Montessori program for disadvantaged Canadian children.

Until very recently, the most controversial and well-known studies assessing the effect of nursery school experience on intelligence have been the so-called "Iowa" studies of the 1940's. Predominantly middle-class children attending the State University of Iowa Laboratory Preschools were shown to gain moderately, but significantly, in IQ as compared with control groups not attending the preschool. Other studies conducted during the 1940's have not shown comparable gains in intelligence, even though it is difficult to show any obvious differences between schools where gains occurred and schools where gains did not occur. Thus, conclusions concerning the effects of nursery school attendance upon the intellectual development of middle class children must remain somewhat tentative. Two tenable hypotheses to explain these findings are: (a) the kinds of intellectual stimulation provided by the preschools attended by the middle-class children did not differ to a large extent from their home environments; (b) the preschool programs were designed along the lines of developing social skills and creativity through free play rather than to develop intellectual skills.

The results of investigations which have manipulated the early environments of disadvantaged and retarded children present a different and exciting picture, the implications of which can no longer morally be ignored by governmental bodies. A unique investigation covering a span of 30 years was originated during the era of the belief in fixed and predetermined intelligence. The longitudinal results have recently presented some outstanding evidence supporting the important role of early experimental factors. In this study, 13 children all under three years of age, comprised an experimental group who were all mentally retarded at the beginning of the study. The children were living in an over-crowded and under-staffed orphanage. By present standards, diet, sanitation, general care, and basic philosophy of operation were censurable. The early intervention consisted of shifting these children from one institutional environment to another with the major difference between institutions being in the amount of developmental stimulation and the intensity of relationships between the children and mother surrogates. A control group of 12 children, initially higher in intelligence than the experimental group, were maintained in the relatively non-stimulating, orphanage over a prolonged period of time. Over a period of two years the children in the experimental group made an average gain of 28.5 IQ points; children in the control group showed an average loss of 26.2 IQ points. All of the children in this investigation were located in adulthood. All 13 children in the experimental group were self-supporting whereas in the control group of 12 children, one had died in adolescence following continued residence in a state institution for the mentally retarded, four were still wards of institutions, one is in a mental hospital, and the other three are in institutions for the mentally retarded. In education the children in the experimental group completed an average of twelfth grade education; the control group completed an average of less than the third grade. There were also marked differences in the occupational levels of the two groups. In the experimental group all were self-supporting or married and functioning as housewives. This was only true for one of the children from the control group. Eleven of the 13 children in the experimental group were married; nine of the 11 had a total of 28 children, an average of three children per family. In the control group, only two of the subjects had married, one of which had one child and subsequently was divorced. The total cost to the state for subjects in the experimental group was approximately $30,000. Some of this amount will of course be reduced by the income taxes being paid currently by these individuals. Cost to the state for the control group approximated $138,000 and it is estimated that they will continue to cost approximately $10,000 per year for the next 20 to 40 years. Finally, it is postulated that if the children in the control group had been given appropriate environmental stimulation during early childhood, most or all of them would have achieved within the normal range of development as was the case for the experimental subjects.

Another research program of importance, entitled the Early Training Project, was initiated at George Peabody College about four years in advance of the 1965 initiation of Project Head Start in the United States. A specially designed intervention program was prepared to head off the progressive retardation so frequently observed amongst deprived children. The purpose of the program was to develop attitudes conducive to school achievement and to enhance intellectual abilities. There were two experimental groups. One attended a 10-week preschool for three summers and were given weekly meetings with a home visitor when school was not in session over the three-year period; for the other experimental group, conditions were similar except that the preschool experience was only for two summers and the home visiting program only covered two years. There were two control groups, one consisting of children matched on the basis of socio-economic status and living in the same areas as the children from the experimental group, the other a control group in a similar city 60 miles away. The most recent results from this investigation are indeed encouraging. Children from both experimental groups are superior in standard tests of intelligence as compared with children from both control groups. On school achievement tests, children from the experimental groups are significantly above the controls and these gains have been sustained at least until the end of grade two. It should be noted that some of the gain in IQ which the children show throughout the program is eventually lost and that a portion of the difference in intelligence between the experimental and control groups is attributable to the declining IQ scores of the controls. Two conclusions are evident from this research. First, in order to offset the progressive retardation characteristic of disadvantaged children their home conditions must be altered radically in addition to (and possibly even instead of) the introduction of a preschool program. Second, in order to preserve those gains attained through intervention programs it is essential that the elementary schools be adapted to continue those special program features which were introduced in the early childhood programs. The initial gains in intellectual performance shown by disadvantaged children who have been provided with a program of stimulation during early childhood, typically decrease during the early elementary school years. It is suggested that this loss is due to a combination of a relatively unstimulating home environment and a public school system which does not possess those special program features which would continue the type of cognitive stimulation needed by the disadvantaged child.

Without specifying individual programs, the point should be made that other programs designed to provide intellectual stimulation similar to that of the Early Training Project, are being conducted in many centres in North America. Stimulation programs are being put into effect with infants as young as 15 months of age ranging through to programs for preschool-aged children. The programs typically have some combination of home tutoring, and part or full-day attendance in a preschool setting. With the intention of being redundant, it is noted that the beneficial changes in the intellectual performance of these children should be sufficient to arouse the attention of Canadian governmental bodies.

The most publicized attempt at preschool intervention is Project Head Start. Head Start began in the United States in the summer of 1965 as part of the U.S. War on Poverty. This particular program was advocated by many child development specialists. A national program served a half million children during this initial phase. In the beginning, Head Start consisted mainly of a six to eight week summer program. Later, a number of full-year projects were initiated. Unfortunately, the advocates of Head Start offered few and often conflicting guidelines as to the detailed types of programs to be developed. The variety of sponsors, such as school systems, churches, and community action agencies, were given a large degree of local autonomy. A recent evaluation of the impact of Head Start did not present encouraging results. The summer programs appeared to be ineffective in producing any gains in cognitive and personality development that lasted into the early elementary grades. The full-year programs did not appear to be effective in producing any changes in tests of personality development; however, they were effective in producing gains in cognitive development that could be detected in grades one, two and three. Some specific programs were of greater effectiveness than others, an important point which will be returned to below. Finally, Head Start children were, on the average, considerably below national norms on standardized tests of language development and scholastic achievement, while performance on school readiness tests at grade one approached the national norm.

The rather weak support for the effect of Head Start must be reconciled with the case built earlier regarding the important role played by earlier experiences. First, the investigators did not give sufficient attention to the variation within the 104 Head Start centres included in the Study. This is crucial because there are vast differences in the structuring of preschool programs for disadvantaged children. On the one hand, there are programs designed to develop social skills and to stimulate creativity through free play. This is the type of program which is most commonly found amongst the nursery schools run for middle-class children. It is highly likely that with the sense of urgency which accompanied the initiation of Project Head Start, the rapid recruitment of teachers precluded either a specific training program for new teachers as well as a re-training program for experienced teachers. It seems likely that the focus of these preschool programs may have been in terms of socialization rather than in terms of intellectual stimulation. On the other hand, preschool programs may be highly structured in terms of language training and concept training. Of those programs oriented towards the development of cognitive abilities, we have been unable to detect any which have not produced significant changes as assessed by tests of cognitive development.

A second factor concerning the Head Start study and its weak support for the effects of such a program concerns what the study ignored. The Head Start program includes attempts at assessing and aiding the health and nutritional status of the young children. The program is also concerned with the development of community objectives. None of these were evaluated in the study undertaken. Third, the study assessed the children after they had left the Head Start program. These results in terms of intellectual development and academic achievement show not necessarily that the benefits of the program were minimal, but that they would fade out unless some continuing attempt to work with the children was made as they went through elementary school. In the United States, Project Follow Through has recently been initiated to perform in this capacity. A fourth point to be emphasized has been mentioned previously. Unless the parents of disadvantaged children are trained to become more effective teachers of their children, the preschool programs designed to stimulate cognitive development will fall far short of their goal. The fifth and perhaps most important point is to emphasize the need for research on the type and timing of early stimulation programs. We have a long way to go before detailed recommendations can be given with confidence as to when to initiate and what features to include in preschool stimulation programs for individuals from various subcultures. Whether or not similar programming features are desirable for disadvantaged Indian, Eskimo, East Coast Negro, rural Newfoundlanders, or inner-city immigrant children, must remain an empirical question.

CANADIAN INTERVENTION PROGRAMS

Except for a few notable exceptions, research on the effects of altering the early experiences of young children is virtually non-existent in Canada. An extensive program with infants has been developed by Dr. William Fowler of the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education. The primary concern is to develop a comprehensive and optimal day-care environment designed to foster cognitive development. To date this program has consisted largely of infants of middle-class working mothers with only a few infants from disadvantaged families. Furthermore, assessment of infant development as a function of having been in the program has yet to be completed. However, this approach is a commendable example of the type of research needed which will lead to specifications of environmental features which facilitate intellectual development.

In another ambitious program, Dr. Carl Bereiter of the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education has undertaken to teach language-deprived children basic skills and concepts before they reach grade one. In order to do this grade-one teachers' guides and work books were studied to assess the kinds of language children would be expected to use in grade one. The preschool instructional program was designed to systematically prepare the child for the kind of verbalism he would encounter in grade one. Independent assessments of the effects of this program have demonstrated its efficiency rather conclusively.

The Brunswick-Cornwallis Preschool is a program for disadvantaged white and Negro children being run by Dr. Barbara Clark of Dalhousie University. In addition to providing planned experiences to prevent the academic retardation of culturally disadvantaged children, this program provides interracial experiences which hopefully will prevent the development of prejudice. On the one hand, the program has not been successful in increasing the performance of disadvantaged children on tests of reading readiness. In fact it is estimated that about one half of the Halifax area children from lower socio-economic groups will face special difficulties and failure in reading. On the other hand, children with preschool experience showed a gain in 10 after a year in the primary grade, whereas children without the preschool experience showed the characteristic loss or levelling-off of 10. The improvement in intelligence did not attain the level of middle-class children of the same age, perhaps indicating again the need of continuing to work with disadvantaged children beyond the actual time spent in preschool.

The Research Department of the City of Toronto, Board of Education, has provided some interesting data on the effects of having introduced a Junior Kindergarten (preschool or prekindergarten). In terms of school achievement, the Junior Kindergarten benefited certain types of children more than others.

These included children of English-speaking parents who had attended but did not graduate from high school and whose fathers held skilled labour jobs. The beneficial effects of having attended the Junior Kindergarten were no longer evident after three or four years. The fact that not all children were helped by the program and that the effects of the program were only temporary underlines the previously stated need for continued research on the development of early enrichment programs.

Another exemplary project is entitled Early Ventures in Learning, at the School Readiness Centre in Edmonton. This project has assessed and will continue with follow-up research on children who have attended a specially designed Readiness Centre as compared with children who have attended a preschool run by the city of Edmonton and another group whose preschool years were spent at home. The program at the Readiness Centre has tended to focus upon developing children's speaking, thinking, discovering, inquiring and large muscle skills. The data available have not indicated any particular advantages in terms of physical characteristics, and intelligence and language development for the children who had attended the Readiness Centre. Two suggestions in the data, however, will be given further study. One, it seemed that the mothers behaved differently towards their children as a result of involvement in the Readiness program and possibly this alteration of mother-child interactions will be related to subsequent academic performance. Secondly, at the time of the report the children were in the middle of their first year in school and teacher ratings suggested that the pupils were performing generally at an above-average grade one level. Follow-up research will assess the strength of these suggestions.

In Montreal some significant work is being conducted at the Montreal Diet Dispensary where regulation of the protein-calorie intake during pregnancy is shown to be related to birth weight of the infant. The relationship between birth weight and infant mortality and possibly subsequent intellectual development has been presented earlier in this Report.

Numerous additional preschool and day-care programs for disadvantaged children are found throughout the country. These range from the isolated church-basement variety such as the corner nursery school, community projects such as project FRENCH in Hamilton, and nationally organized preschool programs such as those under the direction of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and such as those initiated by the National Council of Jewish Women. Although the development of these programs is to be encouraged, they are lacking in several respects. Many have begun without ready access to professional advice on the designing of programs for children with particular needs. The National Council of Jewish Women has mentioned the lack of availability of highly trained staff as a problem which they have encountered in initiating preschool programs. The National Council of Jewish Women has performed a valuable service in organizing programs for disadvantaged children. Following initiation of these programs, their goal is to persuade local agencies such as school boards, to take over responsibility for continued operation. The good feature of this approach is attested to by the presence of many extra facilities for disadvantaged children; the bad feature is that there has not been any scientific evaluation of the consequences of having been in such programs (one possible exception pertains to an investigation being conducted in Montreal by the Mental Hygiene Institute, a report of which is due sometime later in the year). We strongly feel that given our incomplete state of knowledge, no early stimulation project of any magnitude should be initiated without a rigorous plan for longitudinal evaluation of its effect. The presence of a central body to organize evaluation procedures is needed. Insufficient funds has had the effect of limiting the number of subjects involved in various studies (for example, Project FRENDO) or to effectively follow up the consequences of some short-range social action programs. Other programs, such as the Beechville Preschool Program in Halifax County and the Preschool and Prekindergarten Summer Program for Indian Children on Vancouver Island, are in too early a stage of development to have collected evaluation data.

This brief survey of research-oriented service programs for disadvantaged children, as well as non-research-oriented programs, reveals the fact that financial support is being provided from a variety of sources with no attempt on any part of co-ordinating such an important undertaking. Each research program stands on its own when without too much effort an integrated program of research, making better use of present resources, could relatively quickly garner a valuable body of research information. Integrating the sources of financial support would facilitate the development of a research policy as well as promote the development of urgently needed longitudinal research projects. We can no longer allow the provision of early childhood experiences and the evaluation of their effects to proceed in a haphazard manner.

Although it is easy to present a long series of recommendations for plans of action, I intend to present recommendations which I believe (a) would not be difficult to implement, and (b) would have the greatest likelihood of payoff.

First, it is considered essential that the Federal Government become heavily involved in matters pertaining to child development. This should be conceived in a broader basis than the more limited type of federal office suggested by the Economic Council in the last Annual Review to provide information and to co-ordinate research on poverty. The functions of such an office would be heavily concentrated on poverty problems especially as they affect children. Many government programs exist as aids to individuals and communities in dealing with poverty and community problems. The tendency is for existing services to be largely focused upon the physical needs of children and it is urged that there be developed a greater concern with influences affecting the psychological development of children.

(a) It would be a clearing-house for information on matters pertaining to child development. The need for this service is readily evident as judged by the number of agencies, teachers' groups, and parents' groups currently planning to start early training programs for disadvantaged children but not having adequate access to the necessary and available information. Information would also be provided to those programs already in existence.

(b) It would also serve as an advisory bureau in several capacities. For example, research programs could be initiated in those centres where research has not yet been undertaken. In some cases, providing advice on research procedures would be sufficient, whereas in others it would be perhaps necessary to actually carry out the entire research function. This Office would undertake to assess current research programs in terms of their scientific rigour and to provide advice on research strategy where indicated. Assessment of on-going preschool programs for disadvantaged children would be made and advice would be given on altering programs in terms of latest research findings. It is easy to visualize how the concerns of the Federal Government would expand beyond matters pertaining solely to the provision of early experience programs for disadvantaged children, but the initial primary function should be in this regard. Another important function would be to assess the services currently provided by various agencies such as Visiting Homemakers and Public Health Nursing. It seems advisable that the functions of such existing organizations should be expanded to include home tutoring in terms of those child rearing procedures known to promote cognitive and personality development. To date we have focused too much concern on physical development and none on psychological development of young children.

(c) The development of research policy would also be a major function. This role could be fulfilled by making money available for specified research projects having to do with disadvantaged children. Thus, the additional information still needed on the effects of poor nutrition upon physical and intellectual growth, on other factors pertaining to the development of intelligence, language, and personality in disadvantaged children, and on the assessment of programs designed to help disadvantaged children could be given proper emphasis. The encouragement of badly needed longitudinal research amongst disadvantaged populations would also be given prime emphasis. In addition, money for research concerning disadvantaged children would also be made available with no particular specifications as to the content of the research. The research problem would be developed in a grant proposal and this procedure would hopefully allow for the development of new ideas beyond those stimulated by the research policy of the Federal Government.

Secondly, the establishment of a key university-based Child Development Centre is advocated. This centre, staffed with highly trained research personnel would experiment with new programs for disadvantaged children and thus become the basic research centre for the development of new techniques. This centre would in effect, become a research and service centre assessing such problems as the effects of home tutoring as opposed to actual attendance in preschools, the effects of beginning intervention programs at different ages, and the effects of different types of programs. It is highly likely that this centre could take over responsibility for much of the research function currently not being performed in the isolated church-basement preschools, which are actually untapped but certainly accessible and useful laboratories.

Another important result of establishing a Child Development Centre would be to stimulate the development of urgently needed specialized graduate training in child development if only because graduate students would be needed for the necessary field work and aid in collection of research data. Institutes of Child Behaviour and Development abound in the United States but for some reason this is not the case in Canada. For the most part, the best a Canadian graduate student can hope for is the opportunity to conduct his Ph.D. dissertation with children as subjects with perhaps one or two courses in child development thrown in the "complete" his training. Early childhood training centres, school boards, hospitals, and out-patient clinics, and universities need persons with advanced training in child development beyond the numbers available and this need will continue to rise unless training programs are established.

The scope of a Child Development Centre could also easily expand beyond a concern for children from disadvantaged socio-economic backgrounds. And so it should, but again the initial primary concern would be with our current poverty products.

Third, municipal governments, in collaboration with provincial governments, should be encouraged to aid in providing more half-day and full-day preschool programs for infants as well as for the more typical preschools for two-to-five-year-olds. It is urged that the need for facilities not be ascertained by undertaking costly and time-consuming studies to assess such factors as the number of working women, the number and age of their children, the amount of square footage already available, etc. The money directed to these endeavours would be more wisely spent in setting up exploratory programs of various types. The kinds of programs to be set up might include the following:

(a) Half-day and full-day preschool centres are needed for children ranging in age from two months to five years. The term "day care" is purposely avoided in favour of the term "preschool" or "nursery" because of the welfare stigma attached to the day care terminology. It is still the case however, that subsidies would be needed in certain cases but the centres should be set up so as to avoid separation of welfare and non-welfare recipients as much as possible.

(b) We should explore the need for and the feasibility of establishing some "corner nurseries". The corner nursery is one which would have a very small number of children (six to eight) and would serve the people within a few city blocks. This is based on the fact that the extra time needed, the problem of transporting children to one area of the city and then traveling to a job in another locale, is just too burdensome and in some cases the cost of transporting children to nursery centres is just too great to allow maximum use of existing centres. The costs of training the home operator and effecting minor renovations to the homes would be minimal.

(c) Large industries should be encouraged to conduct a cost-benefit analysis on the setting up of half-day, full-day and possibly full-night nursery centres. If female staff can be retained on a more long-term basis, the costs of staff turnover may well be reduced if adequate facilities for young children are made available within the industry.

(d) Municipalities should initiate programs of home tutoring, perhaps in conjunction with and as an extension to, those agencies which currently visit homes. This program would be designed to bring the stimulating features of preschool programs into homes where parents have no access to or are not willing or not able to make use of existing facilities.

(e) Rural municipalities should put into operation, on an exploratory basis, some mobile nursery schools. These would be intended to serve those areas where preschool children are few in number and/or travelling distances to preschool centres would not make permanent centres a feasible undertaking. Thus a program of early childhood stimulation could be brought to rural children on a part-time but regular basis.

ORDERS OF REFERENCE

Extract from the Minutes of Proceedings of the Senate of Tuesday, October 28, 1969:

"The Honourable Senator Croll moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Roebuck:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to investigate and report upon all aspects of poverty in Canada, whether urban, rural regional or otherwise, to define and elucidate the problem of poverty in Canada, and to recommend appropriate action to ensure the establishment of a more effective structure of remedial measures;

That the Committee have power to engage the services of such counsel, staff and technical advisors as may be necessary for the purpose of the inquiry;

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, and to report from time to time;

That the Committee be authorized to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee, to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate, and to adjourn from place to place;

That the evidence taken on the subject during the preceding session be referred to the Committee; and

After debate,

In amendment, the Honourable Senator McDonald moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Burchill, that the motion be not now adopted, but that it be amended by striking out paragraph 4 thereof and substituting therefor the following:—

"That the Committee be authorized to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee, to adjourn from place to place, and notwithstanding Rule 76 (4), to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate."

After debate, and—

The question being put on the motion in amendment, it was—
Resolved in the affirmative.

The question being put on the motion of the Honourable Senator Croll, seconded by the Honourable Senator Roebuck, as amended it was—
Resolved in the affirmative."

Extract from the Minutes of Proceedings of the Senate of Wednesday, October 29, 1969.

"With leave of the Senate,

The Honourable Senator McDonald moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Smith:

That the names of the Honourable Senators Connolly (Halifax North) and MacDonald (Queens) be added to the list of Senators serving on the Special Committee of the Senate appointed to investigate and report all aspects of poverty in Canada; and

That the name of the Honourable Senator Nichol be removed from the list of Senators serving on the said Special Committee.

The question being put on the motion, it was—
Resolved in the affirmative.”

ROBERT FORTIER,
Clerk of the Senate.

MINUTES OF PROCEEDINGS

THURSDAY, February 19, 1970.

Pursuant to adjournment and notice the Special Senate Committee on Poverty met this day at 9.00 a.m.

Present: The Honourable Senators Croll (Chairman), Carter, Connolly (Halifax North), Fergusson, Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche), Inman, Lefrançois, McGrand, Pearson and Quart—(10).

In attendance: Mr. Frederick J. Joyce, Director.

The following witness, representing The Canadian Home and School and Parent-Teacher Federation, was heard:

Mrs. J. M. Priddle, Vice-President (ex officio), and President of the Ontario Federation of Home and School Associations.

At 10.30 a.m. the Committee adjourned until 11.00 a.m.

At 11.00 a.m. the Committee met with The Royal Commission on the Status of Women (in camera).

The Members of the Royal Commission present were:

Mrs. John Bird (Anne Francis), Chairman;

Mrs. L. M. Lange, Commissioner;

Miss Jeanne Lapointe, Commissioner;

Miss E. G. MacGill, P.Eng., Commissioner;

Mrs. Robert Ogilvie, Commissioner;

Dr. Jacques Henripin, Commissioner;

Dr. J. P. Humphrey, Commissioner.

The brief of The Canadian Home and School and Parent-Teacher Federation was ordered to be printed as appendix "A" to these proceedings.

At 12.30 p.m. the Committee adjourned until 9.30 a.m. Tuesday, February 24, 1970.

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Thursday, February 19, 1970.

The Special Senate Committee on Poverty met this day at 9 a.m.

Senator David A. Croll (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators today we have a brief from the Canadian Home and School and Parent-Teacher Federation. We will hear from Mrs. J. M. Priddle, Vice-President of that association, and President of the Ontario Federation of Home and School Associations. She will present the brief. You have the curriculum vitae with her brief, so you know who she is. She has a statement to make to the committee.

Mrs. J. M. Priddle, Vice-President, The Canadian Home and School and Parent-Teacher Association: Mr. Chairman, honourable senators, may I begin by saying that it is a very pleasant duty and privilege to appear before this Special Committee of the Senate on Poverty, to examine the very complex problems of poverty in Canada. As requested, 50 copies of our submission were forwarded to this committee in advance, and 10 copies were provided for distribution to the press.

My organization is very grateful to be here this morning to commend to the attention of this committee the recommendations submitted, and to speak briefly to them. Our major concern, you will have noted, relates to the persistent and debilitating effects of poverty on children, its attendant deprivation for the growing child and the deficiencies and inadequacies that often remain with him throughout his life, resulting in a perpetuation of the poverty cycle. Early childhood environment and experience have a profound and sometimes irreversible effect on the child's future life, and although it is possible that these effects can be overcome in later years in some instances, they do have very serious consequences and contribute to the perpetuation of poverty. We therefore urge that efforts be exerted to alleviate the effects of poverty on children, particularly, at an early age. Indeed, it is on behalf of the children of Canada that this brief is presented.

Our brief stresses three main areas in which poverty creates hardship and lasting effect on children: health, education and self-concept. We have stressed these three areas, not because we believe they are all-inclusive, but primarily because they relate to and emphasize three objectives of our organization: the promotion of the welfare of children, the promotion and attainment of adequate legislation for their protection and care, and the ensuring of every child's right to fulfilment of the physical, mental, social and spiritual needs. We think these are the human rights of a child. The effect of early childhood and nutrition on health, of course, has been well established over the years. However, it should be noted that recent studies reveal a greater prevalence of malnutrition in Canada than previously was suspected. This condition is not absolutely coincident with poverty, but it is more common in the homes of the poor.

A summary of the section on education might be to state that statistics have indicated early termination of formal education is much more probable with children of poor families than for their more affluent neighbours. We have stressed this aspect because education, although it must be a long-term goal, would seem to be the key. No matter what else we do it must certainly be the key to long-term success in this field.

Poverty not only hampers the pursuit of formal education, but research indicates that intellectual deprivation in the early years produces effects which are almost impossible to eradicate, and that lack of stimulation and mental sluggishness go hand in hand. Indeed, many psychologists suggest that the fulfillment of adult potential depends on rich appropriate early intellectual stimulation, and that mental development can be impeded very often and also impaired before a child even begins his school life.

Even if some of the results of early deprivation can be counteracted, the seeds of the continuing poverty cycle, a treadmill of inadequate school facilities and staffs which can vary from community to community, students leaving before graduation, early marriage and child-bearing, restricted occupational opportunities, low income, large families and family instability, all become entangled in a pattern leading to the sustenance of the conditions of poverty, not only during the life of a particular family unit, but projecting itself into the next generation.

The poverty cycle is perpetuated, in our view, not only by physical limitations, but also by attitudes and concepts. We would suggest that this is perhaps the most insidious effect of all. Occasionally the child of a poor family will overcome the obstacles imposed by poverty and we could all cite examples of this, but you would also agree that this demands a great encouragement, determination and certainly vision far beyond his years. He must first overcome the sense of futility, insecurity and worthlessness which is the constant companion of the poor. Respect for learning and a desire for it is in proportion to the motivation provided, and parental influence plays a major role in this regard as supportive assistance to the school's efforts. Again, I would suggest that this is true in any family, but it applies equally to the poor and sometimes their parents are less equipped to give this support.

Children living in poverty are often thwarted in the development of initiative. If his plans and goals are treated with contempt, he may carry them out in fantasy rather than risk ridicule in the real world of his home and also in his school. If his parents cannot convey to a child a sense of his own worth and an expectation of success he often concludes he cannot succeed and has no worthwhile contribution to offer to his world, and his initiative will be weakened and stifled.

Ladies and gentlemen, our recommendations are general in nature, dealing, as I said before, with attitudes and concepts rather than with specific recommendations and they recognize that poverty is a very complex problem, requiring extensive and co-ordinated consideration. In the final analysis, the attack on poverty may possibly become a mammoth project conducted on a very grand scale, but such action could well benefit from experience gained through smaller projects of a pilot nature in a variety of localities across Canada under carefully controlled conditions and followed by very frank and open evaluation. Therefore, I submit to you our three recommendations:

First, educational opportunities must be truly equalized throughout our country and this particular recommendation stems from resolutions which have been supported for many years by our organization. The possibility of a child's developing to the full extent of his intellectual potential must not be governed by his place of residence, the wealth of his province or municipality and neither should this be determined by the income, social status or ethnic origin of his parents. We suggest five possible measures which might contribute to the accomplishment of this goal, such as federal sharing in educational cost. This stems from a resolution which we have supported for some time with respect to the establishment of a federal office of education and free university tuition. This, too, stems from a resolution which has been supported by all provincial federations: the provision of adequate vocational guidance and counselling services. This is included, not because these do not exist anywhere, but rather they are often unknown to children whose families are not in good economic circumstances or they consider perhaps that they are not available to them and do not apply. Here again, self-concept is such that they do not even look into this. More ready access to scholarships and bursaries, income tax allowances for parents' contributions to post-secondary education. This would perhaps have the greatest effect on the families who are not in the poverty cycle, but who are on the fringe.

Our second recommendation is income replacement and supplement programs must be so constructed and administered as to counteract the self-perpetuation nature of poverty and particularly the effect of poverty on children. Admittedly, this is a generalized concept and one difficult of implementation, but a number of specific measures could be suggested. The dispensing of money should be integrated with an educational program designed to optimize the spending of that money, particularly for such items as food, clothing and shelter. Because of education, surely these other things must go along with it. The conditions for payment of income or placement of supplements should be such as to encourage individual initiative rather than to stifle it, and finally, allowing for a high degree of administrative flexibility with regard to the balance between earnings and income supplement until a family has become reasonably self-sufficient. It is redundant to add that this latter point will require a great deal of public support and it includes a good many grey areas. A great deal of judgment would be required on an individual basis. Generalized regulations would surely not apply equitably to all families.

Income replacement programs for persons seeking educational or occupational upgrading should be sufficiently generous and accessible to encourage self-improvement. Flexibility in administrative decisions should replace rigid, nationally-applicable limitations. The dangers implicit in these suggestions are obvious and the integrity and good judgment of those administering such programs must be of high calibre.

Third, anti-poverty measures must avoid the patronizing, de-humanizing effects which have traditionally been associated with poor relief and more recently with welfare. How children can be protected from the debilitating effects of being on relief is difficult to conceive. The solution lies first of all in the attitudes and practices of those who administer the programs at first and the actual contact with these families. Secondly, in the nature of the programs themselves and finally, but perhaps most important of all, in the hearts and minds of the Canadian people. Surely this cannot succeed unless the public is willing for it to happen.

Our federation is well aware of the strictures imposed on the federal and provincial governments by the British North America Act. However, although poverty in Canada—approximately 30 per cent of the population—is rapidly approaching a state of national emergency, our federation expresses the hope that federal and provincial governments can reach agreement through consultation on ways and means to combat, rather than through the medium of a formal declaration of national emergency which implies imposition of national regulations to deal with a situation which should be readily recognized by all.

Ladies and gentlemen, this submission is based on the policies of the federation as set forth in resolutions adopted at its annual meetings, and on resolutions adopted at annual meetings of its affiliated provincial federations and in briefs related to this subject prepared by the federation in the past. Extensive poverty in the midst of plenty is a dilemma of our age. However, we are confident that despite this very complex problem this committee's deliberations and reflections will be governed by wisdom and moderation and will lead to positive and practical action which will alleviate this very grave and urgent problem, and we express our appreciation to you for the time and thought and effort which you are bringing to bear on this entire problem. Thank you.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Mr. Chairman, this very interesting brief opens many doors for consideration and possible questions. Much has been said about public support for various causes, and I should like to deal with one aspect only. First, would you agree that university tuition should be entirely free?

Mrs. Priddle: The brief does not speak to that subject, but my own view would be that at the moment Canada is not in a position to give across-the-board free university tuition. Perhaps at some time in the future it might be. However, if we are dealing with poverty, surely we would deal with only those who are in need and who cannot do things for themselves. Across-the-board measures would not perhaps alleviate that condition.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): I see your point, and I agree with you. Within the last two or three days we have been discussing in the Senate matters concerning loans to students and so forth and the question of free university tuition was raised. Apparently many people are in favour of it. I doubt whether such a course would have public support, owing to the way students seem to be behaving these days. Personally, I am ready to support students who want to go to school to learn, but I am not ready to support them to go there and become revolutionaries, who will not accept authority but simply expect universities to feed their needs and demands. Surely it should be a question of ability and not a question of making student life easy.

Mrs. Priddle: Do you not feel that this would be governed in the terms of reference established for such support because of certain requirements that would be built in?

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): These groups will not listen to any recommendations. They just want it their own way. They are just looking for trouble. They will not follow rules, even if you write them in gold leaf. My concern is that if we have across-the-board free university tuition, then a lot of the university boys who are being held down today, because their parents have to pay and have to make sacrifices to keep their children in university, would thus be set free and could just jump on the bandwagon and become revolutionaries too. That is why I say we must be very careful.

Another aspect that I am concerned with is our public support for welfare programs. The people across Canada are getting a little bit nervous about the abuses of the welfare programs which have become almost uncontrollable. I have never at any time objected to giving welfare support to needy people. But the question is who are the needy? That is the problem. There are a lot of persons today living on welfare who are experts at doing so and in finding ways and means of getting welfare support although they are quite capable of holding down jobs. They take welfare because they make a better living that way. There are people who have ability and have trades—and I can go so far as to name railroad trainmen and brakemen, and those are very good jobs—but they find ways and means of keeping away from their jobs because they can do just as well on welfare. That is only one example. Where are we going with these people?

Mrs. Priddle: It is a difficult problem and we are almost entirely dependent on the people administering locally, are we not, as to how this problem is handled? Our research facilities are not such that I could give you a definitive conclusion, and it would be just talking off the top of my head if I were to try to do so. I know your point is well taken and that all of these things must be looked into very carefully because of injustices which create havoc for those who can little afford it. I am thinking of those who pay for the welfare programs. Sometimes they are hard pressed to pay for them.

On the other hand, I am not prepared at this stage to say that if you do thus and so such will happen, because I just don't know. Because of our lack of research facilities and access to research facilities we have confined our recommendations to the concept aspect of how we see it. It is not that we know the mechanics of how it is done or would presume to tell you.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): We appreciate that, because we do not believe you do have the answers. We have asked the same questions of other people and have been told they don't know. Nobody has the answers at this moment. We have to keep this point in mind, however, because some day, sooner or later, we will have to face the problem very seriously, and it is going to be a most difficult one.

Senator Pearson: I have just two or three questions. In your recommendation No. 28 you say that educational opportunities must be truly equalized throughout the country. Can you explain that a little further?

Mrs. Priddle: Very often, when we consider equal educational opportunities we see that a municipality within a given provincial Department of Education is not as well able to provide facilities as another one. For example, I can specify the difference between someone in an isolated section of Manitoba and someone in the city of Winnipeg. We hear of cases in which different kinds of systems exist within a large city, and that, because the parents of a certain section of the city know what is available and know the value of it and demand it, they have it; whereas in other sections of the city, parents do not know of this, or do not realize they could inquire and have a right to have the same educational opportunities, they do not get them. So that, even within a given board of education, there can be differences. We are not concerned in this instance with anything quite that local, but rather to ensure that no matter where a child lives in Canada he will have an opportunity to achieve his own intellectual potential, whatever that may be. That does not mean he would have the same educational system. It might not be suitable in northern Alberta to have the same kind of thing as would be necessary in Scarborough.

Senator Pearson: I agree with you there. When you mention Manitoba it brings to mind a trade school that was there at one time run by a chap named Musker. He was the principal of the school. You may not have heard of Mr. Musker, but he said that in many cases the pupils who came to his vocational school from the country areas did better than those who came from the city. The chaps from the country areas did not know all the fine points of education, and thus were more amenable and more able to learn quickly than those who went to schools in Winnipeg, where they had manual training and a little bit of shops and such like, because those fellows thought they knew everything and when they came down to the vocational school that is the attitude they adopted. These pupils thought they knew everything when they came to the vocational school; they said, "Pooh-pooh, we know this. We know how to weld and how to solder" and such like. They felt they knew it all. He therefore figured that our educational system was brushing over the surface instead of getting down to the facts, getting the pupil down to where he thinks for himself.

There was one other question I wanted to ask. In paragraph 30, recommendation number 2, what do you mean by "income replacement"?

Mrs. Priddle: Income replacement refers to someone taking additional training. These are income replacement and supplement programs that permit people to take compensating retraining, job retraining, in order to make themselves marketable when their jobs go out of existence and new jobs occur. In the mean time they have to live. As you know, some of these are going on now. This brief suggests that this replacement be done in such a way that it will indeed contribute to getting poor families out of the cycle.

Senator Pearson: Do you anticipate an outright grant or a loan?

Mrs. Priddle: I would not presume to suggest. As has been mentioned this morning, human beings being what they are, very careful thought has to be given to the mechanics of administration, because there are those who will attempt to get something for nothing and often deprive those who really need help and should have it. Again I would say that we have surely come to the stage at which we cannot give things across the board. We must seek out those who really need help and be sure they are adequately provided for rather than giving to those who really do not need it. We have attempted to give welfare to everybody, whether they need it or not, but then no one gets very much, and certainly those who really need it get very little.

Senator Pearson: I agree with you there. As you say in your brief, poor children who are not very bright in school feel inferior to the others, and they have this inferiority built into them throughout their lives. Would it not be possible to evolve an approach by which those children could achieve something that the others cannot, whether it be athletics, mechanical work or anything else; when they are young, could they not be built up educationally in some direction in which they could be better than the others, even better than the bright students, so that they could become more confident?

Mrs. Priddle: I agree, certainly nothing succeeds like success. If something in which they excelled could be found and of which they could be proud, this would spur them on to do other things. It was interesting to me to have the privilege of working with emotionally disturbed children in a training school on a voluntary basis. Granted, emotional disturbance is not confined to poor families, but it does appear there very often. One of the first steps was to find something that the child did well, about which he could be praised, even how well he cleaned the blackboard and telling him what a big help it was, in order to bolster his self-confidence. However, it became evident that, whether the child came from a poor family or a well-to-do family, there is very little that can be done to break the cycle completely unless one also works with the parents. This is why I mentioned pilot projects.

The brief does not speak to this, but I would like to make this suggestion. Perhaps a few young families with parents of not much over 30, having young children at perhaps pre-school and elementary school level, could be taken through every aspect of living, the father being given additional training, and the mother also given additional training, because she might have to earn a living; also give the mother the basics of nutrition and hygiene, how to keep house, how to shop, marketing and consumer information; give some information on child care at the stages the children are going through, what they do at a given time. If we worked with them on that control basis for a year or two, perhaps one of the most outstanding members of the group could be put out into the community to see how they fared.

I am not suggesting that this is something that should be imposed, that they should be taken away from their community; they should remain within the community, being given not elaborate but adequate housing. If that were done with a small group for a couple of years, I am wondering whether it would point the way to something that could be done on a larger scale. I am not sure it would, but it seems to me that there are so many ifs, ands and buts that in some way or other we have to try something along these lines in a small way before we could begin to suggest any large-scale operation.

In my view, certainly the parents have a great bearing on how these children react. Some of these children can be most unattractive, and it takes a lot to love them. I recall speaking to one teacher, who was busy with very many little children, and had a lot of problems. One little boy in particular she was troubled over; he was particularly dirty—he was everything he shouldn't be. After talking with the boy, I was able to tell the teacher, "It is little wonder he is dirty. When he came to school yesterday he said, 'Guess what. Mummy had another burner fixed on the stove. Now we've got two burners she can cook dinner and heat water too.'" It is no wonder he was dirty if she had to heat all the water and cook on one burner. The old wood stoves years ago certainly had it over these modern stoves. These things create problems which we must understand. What are these parents coping with? The mother of that boy was conscientious; she was poor, but she was trying.

Senator Carter: I see from the dossier attached to the brief that you have had a lot of experience with parent-teacher clubs and groups of various kinds. Have you ever been a teacher?

Mrs. Priddle: Only on the basis of working with emotionally disturbed children. I have never taught in a regular classroom.

Senator Carter: In the home and school associations or parent-teacher associations with which you have been associated, have poor parents taken part, been members?

Mrs. Priddle: This is a problem. It depends a lot on the officers and members of the association whether or not these poor people will feel welcome. They will come once, and if they are not made welcome they will, like any other human being, not come again. I remember attending a Christmas meeting in Toronto, in an area containing a great many new Canadians. They were not particularly poor families, but they were people who sometimes feel a little inadequate because of language difficulties at first. I do not know when I have attended a more enthusiastic meeting. The principal, the teachers and the parents had a marvellous rapport with one another. The atmosphere depends first of all on the principal of the school and on those operating the organization. At this meeting, whole families came with their babies. They did not have anywhere to leave them—it was marvellous. The principal and the teachers had an opportunity to get to know the whole family.

Senator Carter: I take it that this is an exception.

Mrs. Priddle: It depends so much on people, human beings and what they are. I really felt that I should not have gone into some of the other associations. I went into one and the atmosphere was cold and dead. At an appointed hour the executive marched in from the teachers room. I wondered if they really wanted us to come. This is hospitality and warmth of individuals. Some people have it and some do not.

Senator Carter: Your brief parallels very closely the one that we had on Tuesday from the Vanier Institute.

Mrs. Priddle: I am pleased to hear that.

Senator Carter: They stressed two main points. One was the effect of poverty on the child, the child and the family to become imprisoned, and the other was the importance of attitudes. I believe you stressed the same points. You did the same as they, not only in regard to attitudes of people in the community or officials of the institutions, but the attitudes of Canadians as a whole. They maintained that unless we can change these attitudes we could not expect to make much impact on the problem of poverty. Is that your conclusion as well?

Mrs. Priddle: I believe that surely anything that is going to happen on a large-scale basis in any democratic country has to be accepted by the people or it just will not come off.

Senator Carter: Being accepted by people is quite a different thing than having the right attitudes. A person may accept something but his attitude towards that particular person or that particular group may still be negative. Have you thought this thing through? Do you see any way in which we can make an impact on the attitude of the public at large?

Mrs. Priddle: I feel, from what I have seen on television and the mass media, that it is possible to sell anything. I think this can be sold too if it is handled well and if it becomes the in thing to do. That is a dreadful way of putting it. We now see anything sold and some pretty weird ideas too.

Senator Carter: With respect to your parent-teacher home school programs are they geared mainly to the child, mainly to the school facilities or to the school system? You have mentioned the school systems.

Mrs. Priddle: First of all, our efforts are primarily to attempt to make parents aware of what the school is doing, what it is trying to do and how it is trying to do it in order to provide acceptance and support at home.

Number two, our programs attempt to provide parents with background knowledge on the development of children, how they grow and develop and how they aspire—this sort of thing. This is done through study discussion courses. Ontario has three of them, one for the pre-school age and one for the adolescent group. These are the main areas: the school, how the home relates to the school and how the home must support the school and also an expression of opinion as to how parents feel about what the school is trying to do. We insist that they do not attempt at a local level to change the curriculum, because the curriculum is not established there. That is why we have resolutions coming forward to the provincial federation, which are subsequently discussed with the department. It does not preclude parents voicing their objection to the given program but it does impose restrictions on how they are going to do it. They cannot do it to the principal of the school who has a curriculum to administer and must do so. He is not the one to talk to.

Senator Carter: I am not quite clear on that. You say you try to explain to the parents what the school is trying to do.

Mrs. Priddle: We feel that parent and teacher interviews are necessary for their own purpose, but we do not feel that the teacher is the one to explain on this subject. If we are going to discuss the teaching of the new math, to give an example, we would hope that the association would have someone from the supervisory level who is an expert in that field come and discuss this. I know two or three gentlemen in this city who have done this on a continuing basis and some of them have conducted courses for parents in the new math so that they have a better understanding of it.

Senator Carter: These are outside specialists?

Mrs. Priddle: Yes, they are educators, they are working in the administrative end of the Board of Education.

Senator Carter: You have indicated in your brief that the school systems leave a great deal to be desired.

Mrs. Priddle: Where did I say that?

Senator Carter: People lack opportunity, you said.

Mrs. Priddle: Yes, due to economic factors. Very often, the municipality does not have the funds. I think you will agree that in Ontario this is changing, with our larger school units.

Senator Carter: But you go outside Ontario in your recommendation No. 1, that "educational opportunities must be truly equalized throughout our country"—unless the country is Ontario?

Mrs. Priddle: I am sorry, sir, I did not intend that at all. The country is Canada. I happen to live in Ontario and where I give examples it is so because they are more familiar to me.

Senator Carter: Then you agree that there are many unequal opportunities.

Mrs. Priddle: Yes, I believe so.

Senator Connolly (Halifax North): Senator Carter, how is the free university education working out in Newfoundland?

Senator Carter: It died, I think. I do not think it lived too long.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): It almost ruined the province.

Mrs. Priddle: Was it that it was too expensive?

Senator Carter: I am not competent to give an opinion as I do not know all the details, but I have a general impression that it was a little too much for the provincial budget to carry and so it was restricted to certain groups, it was not on a total basis as it started out to be. I think it was restricted to certain year groups, fourth year, third year, but at the beginning the idea was that everybody would get it free. Not only that—it was intended they would get not only free education but that they would get paid for going.

The Chairman: You have indicated that the situation at the moment in Memorial University.

Senator Carter: Dr. Ryan of the Vanier Institute was before us on Tuesday. He is an expert in child education. I said I had read that a child learns as much in his first nine years of life as in all the rest of his life. I asked if he would confirm that and he replied that he would not only confirm that but that the scientific fact is that the child has his greatest capacity for learning before the age of five. He went on to tell how these children were handicapped because of their environment. You refer to that here in regard to stimulating the working class home by books and so on. The environment sometimes is a tremendous handicap to the child. Has your organization given any consideration to what society can do to get into the homes or get into the environment to offset that?

Mrs. Priddle: This is why I suggested this pilot project, where we would work with families and parents. My experience has been that unless you work with the parents as well as with the children you do not get very far, because anything you can do during the day is undone at night through lethargy, apathy or reversal.

Senator Fergusson: The Vanier Institute of the Family had some suggestions on this point and I wondered if your organization had anything like this in mind, such as nursery schools. They even suggested mobile nursery schools.

Mrs. Priddle: We have not the facilities to promote it. We have suggested that preparatory work be done before the children come to school, to introduce them to materials and so on. Many schools try to get this done from kindergarten up, by taking them, for example, to a railway yard, to give them an enrichment of the world around them. Our preschool study course tries to point out this to parents. We find this course cannot be given in the evenings because many parents are on shift work. Sometimes it is given in the morning where we get half a dozen people to sit down and talk it over.

Senator Fergusson: You will find half a dozen willing to do this?

Mrs. Priddle: Yes. In a given locality you must find workers to meet these people and invite them to their homes for coffee and a talk. Sometimes one thing leads to another. If you structure it and formalize it for a course at a special time, they do not like to turn up, but if it sounds like something that is going to benefit them and they find it interesting they will be willing. They become interested when they find that their children will benefit from it.

Senator Fergusson: I gather from what you said that the home life discourages children in the lower poverty stratum to continue in high school. I know there are many reasons for that. How could we combat that and provide an incentive to those children?

Another thing I should like to ask in connection with that is whether, in your experience, you find that nowadays many children in the high school age group drop out of school before they finish, in order to help provide some financial assistance for the family?

Mrs. Priddle: I honestly think this is often said or given as the reason when in fact it is not the real reason. I question that it is the real reason because you will recall that many people kept children in school during the thirties when they certainly did not have adequate means. There could have been a lot of factors involved; for instance, they might not have dropped out simply because there were no jobs available to them, but there is no question that people who did not have adequate means nevertheless kept their children in school. So I question that the real reason that students drop out is that they want to help support the family. I think sometimes it is to escape from a family situation which they find intolerable. If they become self-sufficient they can get away from that situation.

Senator Fergusson: How do you think an incentive can be provided for those children who don't naturally receive encouragement at home?

Mrs. Priddle: It is a long-term process. It is necessary to work with the families, because the school can only do so much in providing opportunities and opening doors. If the student goes home to an attitude of ridicule for even suggesting that he might rise above his circumstances, what are we to expect? And this happens. There is often the immediate reaction that, "He is getting too big for his britches. This won't do. We'll have to put him down." This happens. We have all heard it. Therefore, surely, it is necessary to work with these parents in order to help them see that they have young people who do have potential. Some will have more potential than others, but whatever that potential is it should be developed and the students should be permitted to try to rise above their circumstances.

Senator Fergusson: It must be heartbreaking for the child who has become interested.

Mrs. Priddle: Except for the very few who have tremendous inner drive, and there are not many of them.

Senator Fergusson: We were discussing free education a while ago. I agree with you that Canada probably cannot afford to give free university education, but do you not think the principle of providing free university tuition is sound? What is the difference between providing free education for elementary and high schools and doing so for universities? I know that, practically, we cannot afford it today; and personally I think that is the reason there was trouble in Newfoundland. Newfoundland tried to do something it could not afford at the time. But do you not agree with the principle?

I don't agree with Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche) who says the only thing revolutionaries is that their parents have to raise the money to send them to college. I don't think our young people are like that. I don't think that is the only thing that holds them back at all. I think there are thousands of young people who would not behave badly at all irrespective of free education.

Mrs. Priddle: I feel that way too. But I would take a position somewhere between the two of you, because it seems to me that although the principle of free university tuition is in order, nevertheless, it is going to depend on whether you say to the student that he may have free university education or he shall have it. It seems to me that we have to make it a privilege, even though it is free, and that therefore there are certain regulations and if the student adheres to those regulations, which suit and accommodate the majority of people going there, then he can stay. Many of the kind of person Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche) mentioned are denying the mass of students the opportunity to go to school, which surely is not a very democratic approach. I have two sons myself, one is a teenager and the other is a young man in his early twenties. One day when they were talking to some boys in my home I overheard them discussing their concern with the situation at Ottawa University, which had a bit of a problem, and they were hoping that it would not go on too long because they were worried about what would happen to their school year. They were there to get an education.

Senator Fergusson: I did not suggest at all that you "shall" have to take university.

Mrs. Priddle: It shall even be available to you. It is available to you under certain conditions.

Senator Fergusson: I think that is reasonable.

Mrs. Priddle: Perhaps the fault lies in our lack of enforcement of regulations. We have to be firm enough to take a stand.

The Chairman: There are no regulations in the universities, except as to loans. All students qualify for loans in the same way. That is the only regulation there is. If the student cannot pay his way to university, but has the capacity and passes the examination and obtains the loan, then he enters to university.

Senator Fergusson: Do you think there should be a regulation saying that somebody who gets a loan, for instance, and joins a picket line or does something like that should lose his loan?

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): You have to have something to control them.

Mrs. Priddle: I don't think you can generalize on this. I think you have to set up regulations. You may say that there is to be no disruption of classes; that the classes are going to go on. You may say that the students know what the regulations are when they come to the university and they accept them in order to get into the university, and after having got into the university that is not the time for them to start throwing the regulations out the window. They knew when they came in what the regulations were. If they did not like them why didn't they go to another university. That is just common sense, isn't it?

The Chairman: Isn't this a matter really for discipline at the university level? Each university applies its own discipline in its own way to fit the students. It seems to be working out. Although we had some problems, I don't see any insurmountable ones in the country at the present time in any of the universities.

Senator Inman: Just dealing with the younger child for a moment. Mrs. Priddle, on page 2 of your brief, in paragraph 3, you mention about a child not having clothes to go to school and being ashamed of what he has to wear. I know from personal experience in my own home-town that this sort of thing happens in any case. What would your opinion be of having uniforms for children supplied by schools so that all students would be dressed alike? I know that in this age of affluence children have more than they used to, but do you think school uniforms would be a good idea?

Mrs. Priddle: Whether schools could supply uniforms would depend on the budget of the school board, I presume. I do not think anyone would really object to the uniform.

Senator Inman: It would be a good idea, wouldn't it?

Mrs. Priddle: It would certainly cut out a lot of hurt feelings.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Would you use mini skirts or maxi skirts?

Senator Inman: At the present time I would go for maxis.

Another aspect of poverty that I wish to mention is that the children of the poor are very often suspect. I know that to be true. Is that the fault of the probation officers or the officers of the law? The fact that children of poor families are suspect makes them self-conscious.

Mrs. Priddle: It also makes them turn against those people in society who should be their closest allies.

Senator Inman: Yes, that is true. What can be done about that situation? I know from experience that policemen do go around to the houses of the poor and ask where their children were the previous night and that sort of thing, and the fact that they are suspect makes them self-conscious.

Mrs. Priddle: There is going to have to be a broad-scale educational program reaching everyone who works with children. It must not reach just the parents and the teachers but it must reach everyone who has anything to do with children. Anyone working in a public office, be it municipal, provincial or federal, is going to have to take this into very careful consideration. It must be an educational program. Frankly, I don't know why they do it.

Senator Inman: It certainly has a bad effect on young children, on young juvenile delinquents.

Mrs. Priddle: So much of it is a question of attitude. I recall working with one little boy. When I arrived at the school the principal told me that this little boy lied and lied and did not know what the truth was. After a few weeks—and it takes quite a time to find things out, because these things come out only little by little—I discovered that two or three of his little friends in his classroom had been speaking of their summer cottages. He had a picture of a lovely suburban bungalow, with a nice car in front, father and mother there and it was a picture of his mother and father. To the teacher it was another of his lies, but it was only wishful thinking, and really heartbreaking. Instead of saying to him, "You know, that is not true and you must not do this sort of thing anymore", I got him a notebook and told him it was a wonderful story, that wonderful stories, although they were not true, could be written down, that these stories should be written into a notebook; that we got true things, factual things, out of arithmetic books and history books, but that a story that was a fun thing should be written down. This he could understand.

Senator Inman: In paragraph 22 you speak about inadequate pre-natal care for children living in poverty. Of course, we have medicare. Would compulsory pre-natal care education help? I know that some doctors like women to come to them for advice at different stages of pregnancy. Is there some way in which these women could be reached for that sort of education?

Senator McGrand: Most of these women do get pre-natal care now.

Mrs. Priddle: There are baby health centres to which women can go, but these are not for pre-natal care. We must ensure that these people know that such courses exist.

Senator Inman: This is what I mean. Is there some way to get to these people?

Mrs. Priddle: It might be done through the public health service. It is difficult to reach these people, and it would be difficult to enforce. The most that could be done would be to let them know of the availability of such things. Whether they could be forced to come in is another matter.

Senator Inman: Could it be done through the schools?

Mrs. Priddle: You could reach some of them in that way, I should think.

Senator Inman: Perhaps in most cases the school could inform the Public Health Service.

Mrs. Priddle: Some school boards are now appointing social workers as staff members, one per board, through such social workers these people might be persuaded to come in for classes; the neighbourhood school would be the ideal spot.

Senator McGrand: In paragraph 7 on page 3 you cite the quotation, "A family's inability to invest in itself". I think that expression "invest in itself," is very important. This has often been mentioned to the committee, very recently by The Vanier Institute. Different people assess it in different ways. Would you give me your interpretation of "the inability to invest in themselves"? Go as far as you want to, in depth.

Mrs. Priddle: Let me just think for a moment. I am sure you do not mean money only. That is only aspect.

Senator McGrand: No, the family investing in itself, psychologically as well as materially.

Mrs. Priddle: Perhaps we could begin with a good home. A good home is a good place for children. One in which the parents understand the various needs of children and the development stages through which they pass; one in which the parents get on reasonably well together and are grown up enough to attempt to satisfy the children's needs. Some parents are not grown up enough to be able to do that. If they are to invest in themselves, it means that every member of the family has to contribute emotionally, spiritually and physically. They will be a bulwark for one another, so that the home becomes a haven, not so much in the sense that they are protected from the outside world when things get rough, but in which when they go home other members of the family may see their faults but still let them feel they are part of that family and accepted no matter what happens.

Senator McGrand: This is something that must be discussed by every group. It is discussed all the time. Do you find that those who discuss this, sociologists and psychologists, really have a very clear picture of what they want? In this concept of the family investing in itself, one thing that should be stressed is personal thrift. There is a tendency to talk about welfare and giving these people more money. Welfare is often a give-away scheme in order to get people through an emergency situation, but it becomes permanent. Do you not agree with me?

Mrs. Priddle: It is a stop-gap.

Senator McGrand: But it is no longer a stop-gap; it is something that is permanent. If this sort of thing is to be corrected we must have more and more ways of getting a family to invest in itself. Is that not right?

Mrs. Priddle: I think so.

Senator McGrand: You agree with me?

Mrs. Priddle: I do.

Senator McGrand: I would like to have this investigated in depth as a project, because I think part of the answer lies there. Senator Fergusson asked about children leaving school in order to support the family, and we have heard that quite often. I know that used to be so, but I was under the impression that very few drop out of school to help their families today. Do you agree with that?

Mrs. Priddle: I kind of think it is used as an excuse now.

Senator McGrand: This has been discussed here. It goes back to the freer education, free university courses. In my opinion, most people care little or nothing about something they get for nothing. I am sure those at the Sir George Williams University who destroyed the computer were not paying very much for their education. Is that not right?

Senator Fergusson: That is true.

The Chairman: We must not misunderstand one another. I think it is clear that this morning we are talking about free tuition, are we not?

Senator Fergusson: Yes.

The Chairman: Free tuition is quite another matter. The discussion was on free tuition at universities. Is that not correct?

Senator McGrand: Yes.

Senator Connolly (Halifax North): I assume free tuition means for those who are entitled to university training?

The Chairman: Yes, those who qualify.

Senator Connolly (Halifax North): Who prove their entitlement?

The Chairman: Yes. That is a term of reference.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): There is something that I would like to clarify. The other day Dr. Ryan mentioned in committee, and Senator Carter referred to it yesterday in his long speech in the Senate and it was mentioned again this morning, that the first child learns more in the first nine years than he does during the rest of his life. I just cannot accept that. No doubt the child is learning a lot, perhaps even two languages. He has learned the ways and means to travel around, but I find it difficult to accept the statement made by the expert Dr. Ryan that a child learns more in his first nine years. I cannot understand this. I would like an explanation of this. Possibly you could clarify it. Some people go to school most of their lives. I would agree that the ability to learn...

The Chairman: That is what he said.

Senator Carter: That is what I said.

The Chairman: That is what Dr. Ryan said.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): He said "the ability to learn"?

The Chairman: That is what he said and that is what I understood Senator Carter to say.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): I agree with that.

The Chairman: That was a very important point. Is there anyone else who would like to ask a question? Am I to believe—I do not think it is overly important—that in this day and age boys and girls from ten to sixteen years of age would accept the wearing of school uniforms?

Senator Fergusson: At what age?

The Chairman: Well, starting at eight, nine or 10. I have grandchildren of that age, and I see how they dress. That was my question.

Mrs. Priddle: I think eight- and nine-year olds could be talked into it, and if they started they probably would continue throughout the 15- and 16-year old level. You might have difficulty if you started with 15- or 16-year olds.

The Chairman: You mean you could get 15- or 16-year old girls to wear a uniform?

Mrs. Priddle: In some schools they do wear uniforms.

The Chairman: In private schools, yes.

Mrs. Priddle: They do not object. I do not think you would solve the cost of dressing them by giving them a school uniform, but it would solve their feeling of inadequacy while in school.

Senator Inman: I recall a case of a youngster going to Sunday School in a frayed coat and the teacher asked him in front of the other children, "Have you nothing better than that to wear?" The youngster was so embarrassed he never returned. I am just giving that as an example. I do know of cases where children have been supplied with clothes, because they would not go to school in rags.

Senator Fergusson: I am sure that in other countries school children do not object to wearing school uniforms. I saw this in Japan, and just recently in Antigua. I noticed that the girls, particularly, no matter what school they went to, wore the same uniform. They might be of different colours, because they were for different schools. The children were perfectly happy about it, and I am sure some of them were quite poor. I am also sure that the children got along better when there was no difference between the clothing they were wearing. I don't know why it would not work in Canada.

Senator McGrand: I know that in some communities the children wear uniforms in the home ec classes. It is part of their training in dressmaking to make their own uniform, and it saves costs. I wonder if they do that in Antigua or Japan.

Senator Fergusson: I did not ask if they made them, but I saw them wearing them.

The Chairman: Both boys and girls wear uniforms in Japan, do they not?

Senator Fergusson: Yes.

Senator Carter: I would like to ask the witness if she, or her organization, has become aware of a survey that was carried out in the United States in the last three or four years which more or less contradicts the theory about the handicap of economic poverty. I am speaking from memory, and I may not have all the details correct. This survey, as I recall it, studied low income groups and people who were around what you would call the poverty level. They studied different groups, such as the Jewish community, ethnic groups coming to the United States. They studied the white group of the same income bracket and also the Negroes. They found that despite the economic handicaps the children from the Jewish families were very successful. They had a tremendous record of getting ahead and obtaining an education, although economically they were no better off than the others.

The next best group was made up of orientals—the Japanese and the Chinese. The third group was the whites and the fourth group, the lowest on the scale, was the Negro. There was a direct correlation between the type of homes and the values stressed in the homes of these groups. That was the important factor. The Jewish group had the highest concentration of values in the home and these went into the character of the child before it went to school and it carried on and more or less offset the handicap of economic poverty. The same was true, although not to such a great extent, of orientals. The survey found that the family atmosphere in the white group was totally different. There was a corresponding drop in the educational attainment. The Negro situation was worst of all because there was a lot of desertion and broken homes among them, and family ties were lost. Have you ever come across this report?

Mrs. Priddle: I have not seen that particular study, but certainly it is our view and this is the reason for this paragraph which is the family's ability to invest in itself in depth. You see, the parents instill these values and open doors and provide aspirations. This is why I have been saying that you have got to work with the families who have not got these inner resources. It has not anything to do with money, which helps the next generation to get out of that poverty cycle. Unless the parents are doing this—or, indeed, if they are doing the direct opposite and ridiculing and pulling down the attempt the child makes—he just goes on.

Senator Carter: The report says the white people get it and they are not doing it in the United States. I suppose it is the same in Canada. The problem is how to get it in Canada.

Mrs. Priddle: This is going to be a long-term educational project.

Senator McGrand: I understand that the most densely populated area in the United States is Chinatown in New York, and that it has practically the lowest incidence of crime. It is not being crowded together that brings out crime and violence and delinquency, it is something else. If you go back to the Negro being the lowest, that is probably true, because the home life of the Negro did not exist on this continent in the days of slavery. Homes were broken up at any time, and that pattern has been followed. So the cure is not just a case of handing out more money.

Mrs. Priddle: Not necessarily. It is attitudes and concepts, and this is what we have stressed. I do not believe it will be achieved by imposing regulations and telling people, "Do this and you will be all right." It will take the churches, the schools and everybody working on this.

The Chairman: You have been connected with this for many years and are very knowledgeable and convincing. You say we have to get the churches and schools and well-meaning people together. Where have all the people in these organizations been all this time? You say there are so many below the poverty line now. Where have you been all this time?

Mrs. Priddle: I wonder if it is possible for something to exist within society and it has to get to a certain degree before people suddenly wake up and realize they have a problem.

The Chairman: We have been in political life and we have been part of the face of Canada. We knew that there was a problem. In our own way, we have attempted at various stages to try to help the poor people. We have done that within our confines. What have people like you and others been doing, churches and organizations. We do not recall hearing from them in the sense that we are hearing from them. I do not recall hearing from your organization. This is no reflection. I have known your organization for years and years. I do not recall hearing from it or from similar organizations. Do you mean to tell me they could have been unaware of the problem, of poverty particularly at the home-school level?

Mrs. Priddle: I do not think so at all. People were trying to deal with this problem locally and some of it on a local basis for individual people. Everyone sitting around this table has been faced with families in trouble, doing what they can to help individually, sometimes through the school or the church. It has not worked out and has got out of hand. Now they feel it is something beyond their facilities and their resources. When you attempt to get things done on a voluntary basis you are in trouble nowadays and it is becoming increasingly difficult to find voluntary workers. At the same time it is amazing how much they can do and they are doing now, but it is not doing it quickly enough. I think this is the answer. Private organizations have not the facilities to do it, even with people giving money to them.

Senator McGrand: Mr. Chairman, we lived with poverty and now we are taking a different look at it. We lived with pollution and now we are taking a different look at pollution. We are becoming aware of the danger in pollution and also becoming aware of poverty. Is that not it? The churches are becoming very much aware of it and are talking about the renewal of the churches, because they have to grapple with these problems. I think we are doing fairly well.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): We are in line with the rest of the world.

Senator Fergusson: We always accepted the idea that there had to be a certain amount of poverty and now we have a new concept, that there does not have to be this poverty.

Senator McGrand: The poor are always with us.

Senator Fergusson: Yes, "the poor we will always have with us".

Senator Inman: The poor people themselves accepted this in the past but now they do not accept it so well.

The Chairman: That is all right, so long as we understand each other, because that is the purpose of the inquiry. Are there any other questions? Mrs. Priddle, this has been a very useful and informative morning for us. You are most knowledgeable on the subject and have been of great help to us. This is a matter which is of vital concern and when you speak of education you put your finger on one of the most important aspects, next to income. On behalf of the committee I wish to express our thanks to you for coming this morning.

Mrs. Priddle: Thank you, Mr. Chairman and honourable senators, it has been a pleasure to be here.

Whereupon the committee went into Camera.

APPENDIX "A"

THE CANADIAN HOME AND SCHOOL AND

PARENT-TEACHER FEDERATION

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

in behalf of

SUMMARY

With respect to this brief, the major concern of the Canadian Home and School and Parent-Teacher Federation is about the persistent and debilitating effects that poverty has on children. Evidence is submitted to demonstrate that poverty and its attendant deprivations can produce, in the growing child, deficiencies and inadequacies that remain with him throughout life and frequently result in the perpetration of the poverty cycle.

The recommendations are general in nature in keeping with the conviction that poverty is a complex problem requiring extensive and coordinated consideration. In the efforts to reduce and eliminate poverty, it is recommended (1) that educational opportunity in Canada be truly equalized, (2) that anti-poverty programs be devised in such a way as to interrupt the poverty cycle and reduce the impact of poverty on children, and (3) that the need to maintain human dignity and self-respect be constantly recognized.

The Canadian Home and School and Parent-Teacher Federation

1. The Canadian Home & School and Parent-Teacher Federation is pleased to be able to present this brief to the Special Senate Committee on Poverty on behalf of the children of Canada. Our organization exists to promote the welfare of children and youth and it is on behalf of those Canadian children who are suffering the effects of poverty that we make this submission.

2. There are Home & School and Parent-Teacher Associations in every province of Canada, in the Yukon and in the Northwest Territories. Among the objects of our organization, those which relate particularly to the subject in hand are (1) to promote the welfare of children and youth, (2) to promote and secure adequate legislation for the care and protection of children and youth, and (3) to obtain the best for each child according to his physical, mental, social and spiritual needs.

A Child's View of Poverty

3. It is our conviction that poverty encompasses a great deal more than simply inadequate income. From a child's point of view, poverty means being self-conscious and sometimes ashamed of the clothes he has to wear to school; it means having to stand back and watch his friend play with toys that he cannot have; it means not being able to go to the party or the dance because he will look too conspicuous.

4. To the child, poverty means that he probably won't be able to go very far in school; it means that if the local store has been broken into, the police will be around to ask him where he was last night; it probably means that both his father, if he has one, and his mother are out working and he has to get his own meals; it means that he will grow up with a feeling of inadequacy about himself and may, consequently, never realize his full potential.

Poverty's Impact on Children

5. It is about these matters—the devastating effects of poverty upon children—that we, as representatives of the parents and teachers of Canada, are most vitally concerned. If the continuing cycle of poverty is to be broken at any point, it is most important that it be broken during the formative years of a person's life. Studies of the early development of children indicate that some 50% to 80% of the behaviour characteristic of late adolescence already is structured between the ages of 5 and 8. "Damage and deprivation experienced before school entrance are difficult to overcome, even under the most intensely positive school conditions". (Goodlad, 1969)

6. "Extreme environments that are sustained long enough are likely to have powerful effects on all individuals in them. The effect of these extreme environments is especially dramatic on young children since such children are unable to effect any physical or psychological escape from these over-powering environments". (Bloom, 1964)

7. "A family's inability to invest in itself is likely to have particularly serious consequences on young children whose potential abilities are largely shaped in the years of early childhood". (Baetz, 1969)

8. What is clear from these statements is that early childhood environment and experiences have a profound and sometimes irreversible effect on the child's future life. It is probably extreme to say that the effects of poverty in childhood cannot be overcome in later years, but is certainly obvious that these effects have serious consequences and contribute in a great measure to the perpetuation of poverty. The conclusion is also obvious that if poverty is to be reduced or eliminated, careful attention must be given to ameliorating the effects of poverty on children at as early an age as possible.

Three Major Areas of Concern

9. While these effects of poverty are operative in every aspect of a child's life, it is on three areas in particular that we wish to concentrate. These are: (1) health, (2) education and (3) self-concept. We choose these three areas, not because they are all-inclusive, nor because they are necessarily the most significant, but primarily because they are illustrative of the major emphasis we wish to make.

Health in Relation to Poverty

10. The relationship between early childhood nutrition and health in later years is too well established to require repetition here. Canadian government have revealed a much wider prevalence of malnutrition among Canadian children than heretofore suspected. While this condition is not completely coincident with poverty, it is more common in the homes of the poor.

11. This malnutrition is not related only to inadequate income. Poor budgetary and home management practices, inadequate attention, and a sense of futility in poverty-stricken homes, all contribute to unbalanced diets and consequent conditions of malnutrition.

12. There is accumulating evidence to suggest that children of low income families in Canada are most unlikely to have adequate access to needed resources in their early years. Even the possibility of significant child nutrition problems, seemingly so improbable in this country, must be taken seriously.

13. "It is now well established that malnutrition in the early months of life, will not only impair physical growth, but also may damage mental development". (Baetz, 1969)

14. "Evidence is cumulative and impressive that severe undernutrition during the first two years of life when brain growth is most active, results in a permanent reduction of brain size and a restricted intellectual development". (Stoch and Smythe, 1968)

Education as Affected by Poverty

15. There is no evidence that intelligence is less uniformly distributed among the poor than among the middle-class, but it is confirmed by statistics from many sources that early termination of formal education is much more probable for children of poor families than for their more well-to-do neighbours.

16. "Poverty prevails in two out of three families whose head completed less than nine years of formal schooling; a child growing up in a family of $12,000 income as contrasted with one in a family of $3,000 income has four times the chances of attending college—In the last decade, jobs for high school graduates rose by 40% while jobs for those who failed to complete high school dropped by 10%". (Goodlad, 1969)

17. Not only does poverty alter the chances of pursuing education, but research indicates that intellectual deprivation in the early years produces effects which are difficult, if not impossible, to eradicate.

18. "It is becoming increasingly clear that human awareness comes earlier in life than we once believed; that lack of stimulation and mental sluggishness go hand in hand; that mental development often is impeded and impaired long before the child embarks on the school road. Most psychologists in the cognitive field believe that attainment of a full adult potential depends on rich appropriate early intellectual stimulation". (Goodlad, 1969)

19. "Deprivation of any kind carries the possibility of serious damage. The earlier it is removed or compensated for, the less danger of lasting ill-effects. How optimistic we can be beyond this assumption, it is hard to say". (Law, 1966)

Poverty as Self-Perpetuating

20. Even if some of the results of early deprivation can be counteracted, the seeds of the continuing poverty cycle have already been sown and are difficult to uproot. "An examination of the cycle of poverty in which the poor are caught may clarify the connections between social institutions and the life of the poor. Inadequate school facilities and staffs, school leaving before graduation, early marriage and child-bearing, restricted occupational opportunities, low income, large family size and family instability become entangled in the pattern which both leads to and sustains the conditions of poverty. This pattern—the cycle of poverty—is self-sustaining during the life of a family unit—and is perpetuated in the next generation". (Glazer and Creedon, 1969)

Personal Effects of Poverty

21. It is probable that this continuing cycle of poverty is perpetuated as much by attitudes and concepts as it is by physical limitations. Occasionally, the child of a poor family will, through courage, determination, or vision overcome the obstacles placed in his path by the burden of poverty. But such a child has first to overcome the sense of worthlessness, powerlessness, and futility that is the constant companion of the poor.

22. "The disadvantage child begins to experience the cycle of poverty even before birth. He may experience inadequate prenatal care and after birth be exposed to material and often emotional deprivations which generate a feeling of powerlessness". (Glazer and Creedon, 1969)

23. "Children living in poverty especially may experience relationships which block the development of initiative. If the child's plans and goals are treated with contempt, the child may carry them out in fantasy, rather than risk attempting them in a real world. If later he finds the classroom frustrating, he may retreat into fantasy rather than engage in problem solving. If parents are unable to convey to the child a sense of his own worth and the expectation that he will succeed, he may believe that there is no place for him in the world and his initiative will be weakened". (Glazer and Creedon, 1969)

24. "Prolonged delays in gratification and meager supplies of food, warmth, comfort, and love lead to basic distrust". (Glazer and Creedon, 1969)

Conclusion and Recommendations

25. Using examples and comment from the three areas of health, education, and self-concept, we have endeavoured to illustrate how serious and long lasting are the effects of poverty on children. It is our hope that we have established that anti-poverty programs, to be effective, must be so constructed and administered as to relieve children of these debilitating influences.

26. In expressing this hope we are well aware of the administrative difficulties associated with the division of authority and responsibility between the Federal government and Provincial governments. Provincially operated programs in child welfare and education must be coordinated with federally funded poverty and training programs. The child must not be caught between the upper and nether millstones of the British North America Act.

27. It will be clear from our presentation thus far that we view poverty as a complex problem that will not be corrected by unitary measures. The architects of the plan to reduce poverty must adopt a systems approach and a global viewpoint. It is because of our certainty that the attack on poverty must be made on a grand scale that our recommendations are more in the nature of attitudes or concepts than as specific remedies.

28. Recommendation No. 1—Educational opportunities must be truly equalized throughout our country. The possibility of a child's developing to the full extent of his intellectual potential must not be controlled by his place of residence or wealth of the province or municipality in which he lives. Neither should this be determined by the income, social status, or ethnic origin of his parents.

29. Among measures which could contribute to this ideal are: (1) federal sharing in educational cost, (2) free university tuition, (3) the provision of adequate vocational guidance and counselling services, (4) more ready access to scholarships and bursaries, and (5) income tax allowance for parents' contributions to post-secondary education.

30. Recommendation No. 2—Income replacement and supplement programs must be so constructed and administered as to counteract the self-perpetuation nature of poverty and particularly the effect of poverty on children. This, admittedly, is a generalized concept and one difficult of implementation, but a number of specific measures could be suggested.

31. The dispensing of money should be integrated with an educational program designed to optimize the spending of that money, particularly, for such items as food, clothing and shelter.

32. The conditions for payment of income replacement or supplement should be such as to encourage individual initiative rather than to stifle it. There should be allowance for a high degree of administrative flexibility with regard to the balance between earnings and income supplement until a family has become reasonably self-sufficient.

33. Income replacement programs for persons seeking educational or occupational upgrading should be sufficiently generous and accessible as to encourage self-improvement.

Flexibility in administrative decisions should replace rigid, nationally-applicable limitations.

34. Recommendation No. 3—Anti-poverty measures must avoid the patronizing, de-humanizing effects which have traditionally been associated with "poor relief" and more recently with "welfare". How children can be portected from the debilitating effects of being "on relief" is difficult to conceive. The solution lies first of all in the attitudes and practices of those who administer the programs, secondly in the nature of the programs themselves; and, finally, in the hearts and minds of the Canadian people.

35. In conclusion, we wish to thank the Committee for granting us time in their busy schedule to express our views. We hope our ideas will be of some assistance in achieving the objectives of the Committee and we proffer the assistance and co-operation of our members from coast to coast if we can, at any time, be helpful.

ORDERS OF REFERENCE

Extract from the Minutes of Proceedings of the Senate of Tuesday, October 28, 1969:

"The Honourable Senator Croll moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Roebuck:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to investigate and report upon all aspects of poverty in Canada, whether urban, rural, regional or otherwise, to define and elucidate the problem of poverty in Canada, and to recommend appropriate action to ensure the establishment of a more effective structure of remedial measures;

That the Committee have power to engage the services of such counsel, staff and technical advisors as may be necessary for the purpose of the inquiry;

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, and to report from time to time;

That the Committee be authorized to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee, to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate, and to adjourn from place to place;

That the evidence taken on the subject during the preceding session be referred to the Committee; and

After debate,

In amendment, the Honourable Senator McDonald moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Burchill, that the motion be not now adopted, but that it be amended by striking out paragraph 4 thereof and substituting therefor the following:—

"That the Committee be authorized to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee, to adjourn from place to place, and notwithstanding Rule 76 (4), to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate."

After debate, and—

The question being put on the motion in amendment, it was—
Resolved in the affirmative.

The question being put on the motion of the Honourable Senator Croll, seconded by the Honourable Senator Roebuck, as amended it was—

Resolved in the affirmative."

ROBERT FORTIER,
Clerk of the Senate.

Extract from the Minutes of Proceedings of the Senate of Wednesday, October 29, 1969.

“With leave of the Senate,

The Honourable Senator McDonald moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Smith:

That the names of the Honourable Senators Connolly (Halifax North) and MacDonald (Queens) be added to the list of Senators serving on the Special Committee of the Senate appointed to investigate and report all aspects of poverty in Canada; and

That the name of the Honourable Senator Nichol be removed from the list of Senators serving on the said Special Committee.

The question being put on the motion, it was—

Resolved in the affirmative.”

ROBERT FORTIER,
Clerk of the Senate.

MINUTES OF PROCEEDINGS

TUESDAY, February 24, 1970.

Pursuant to adjournment and notice the Special Senate Committee on Poverty met this day at 9.30 a.m.

Present: The Honorable Senators: Croll, (Chairman); Carter, Eudes, Inman, MacDonald (Queens) and McGrand. (6)

In attendance: Mr. Frederick J. Joyce, Director.

The following witness was heard:

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE:

Dr. Joseph W. Willard, Deputy Minister.

At 12.50 p.m. the Committee adjourned until Thursday, February 26, 1970, at 9.30 a.m.

THURSDAY, February 26, 1970.

At 9.30 a.m. the Committee resumed its hearings.

Present: The Honourable Senators: Croll, (Chairman); Carter, Eudes, Fergusson, Inman, MacDonald (Queens) and Quart. (7)

The following witnesses were heard:

Dr. Joseph W. Willard, Deputy Minister;

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Ontario, February 24, 1970

The Special Senate Committee on Poverty met this day at 9.30 a.m.

Senator David A. Croll (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: This morning we have a brief from the Department of National Health and Welfare. You have a biographical sketch of all these gentlemen whose names I will mention. Sitting to my right is Dr. Joseph Willard, Deputy Minister of National Welfare, Department of National Health and Welfare, and next to him are departmental officials: Mr. John Osborne, Director of Research and Statistics, Mr. J. Albert Blais, Director General of Income Security, Mr. Norman Cragg, Director of the Canada Assistance Plan, and Mr. Brian Iverson, Director of the National Welfare Grants program. The deputy minister will start the meeting.

Dr. Joseph W. Willard, Deputy Minister of National Welfare, Department of National Health and Welfare: Mr. Chairman and honourable senators, it is a pleasure to be here. The topic you have had under consideration over the last several months, relating to poverty, is a special concern to the Department of National Health and Welfare. The minister, the Honourable John Munro, endorsed the document which we have placed before you. In this document we have endeavoured to discuss the various programs in the Department of National Health and Welfare which have a bearing on poverty. Mr. Chairman, I understand that if it is agreeable, we will deal with matters relating to welfare and income security today and that next Thursday morning we can complete any outstanding questions in these areas, together with any aspect affecting the health branch of the department. As I mentioned, the departmental brief has been developed in relation to the departmental programs, in the field of income security, health and welfare services. The brief does not contain any proposals with respect to new programs or approaches, or to the improvement of existing programs because such matters relate to Government policy. It should be noted, however, that the Government did indicate in the Speech from the Throne that it proposed to issue a White Paper on Social Security.

Your chairman has asked me to make a few introductory remarks. In the development of income security in Canada every technique that has been used or discussed in various countries of the world has been tried in Canada. In the early period of the development of social security the social insurance technique and the social assistance technique were the ones that were predominantly used as a means of providing income support for persons who, through one reason or another, had their income flow stopped or discontinued. The development of social insurance, starting back with Bismarck in Germany in the 1880s, was picked up and advocated by the International Labour Organization in the 1920s, 1930s and 1940s; it has been one of the main approaches used by modern industrial nations in efforts to provide adequate income support. The social insurance technique has been applied in many different ways. In Canada we have applied it through unemployment insurance and the Canada Pension Plan. Allied with it is another type of program that relates to compensation; in Canada the provincial Workmen's Compensation programs and the federal War Pension programs are examples. Under the social assistance technique Canada has had the history of the Poor Law in England and of private and church charity throughout the years. The approaches that were in vogue in France and Britain were transferred to the New World in the early colonies and in the early period of Confederation. Local assistance or relief gradually developed.

It was not until 1927 that a definite attempt to deal with assistance on a different basis was attempted in Canada through the old age pension legislation. So, under the social assistance technique the introduction of a means test was the new development.

Canada being a federal state, the use of the conditional grant or grant in aid was the method adopted for federal participation. Actually, the means test old age pension had been developed in Denmark as early as 1892, in New Zealand in 1898, in the United Kingdom and Australia in 1908. So, when Canada came along in 1927 it was, as you can see, quite some decades later and the approach was not new.

The means test approach was extended to blind persons allowances in 1937 and to disabled persons allowances in 1954. The technique here, of course, involved a ceiling and a certain amount of an allowable income with a ceiling on it. So there was no provision to meet the actual need of the individual recipient. The original benefit started at $20 a month, it was increased in time and in the postwar period it was moved up to $40 a month; and in due course it was raised as high as $75 a month.

This means that if the assistance recipient needed $125 a month to get along on, that program would yield only $75 a month. The means test, in other words, provided a ceiling and one that was applied right across the whole of Canada.

The first attempt on the national scale to move away from the means test approach under the assistance technique was in 1956 with the implementation of unemployment assistance. Under that program a needs test approach was introduced along with in some instances a means test. But with the implementation of the Canada Assistance Plan in 1966 the needs test became the dominant approach accepted by federal-provincial governments across Canada as a more adequate method of compensating people in need than the means test approach. The method being used generally under the needs test is for individuals to indicate the resources that they have on the one hand, and their budgetary expenditures on the other, and the gap between these two, that is required to meet normal budgetary expenditures, makes up the assistance payment. This is called a "budgetary deficit method".

Over the years a pattern in the development of the social assistance technique has been followed which has gone from total dependence on local relief, provided either by municipalities or voluntary agencies, to intervention of government at federal-provincial level on a means test basis, and then finally intervention of federal-provincial government through a system on the needs test basis.

The big step ahead in the introduction of the Canada Assistance Plan, looking at it from the point of view of the federal Government, was that for the first time the federal Government agreed to share the cost of services for people in need. Up to that point, under the means test, the federal Government was only sharing on the cost of an assistance payment. Thus, built into the Canada Assistance Plan costs today you have the cost of services.

Under that provision a complete range of health services has been provided for. Hospital care was of course covered under the hospital insurance program. Medical care at that stage was not covered under the new Medicare program, so that the Assistance Plan included medical care. It included drugs, prosthetic appliances, eye glasses, dentures, everything that a person on assistance might need in terms of health services. The Plan includes these services in the sense that the federal Government shares the cost of any of these items. It also includes the range of welfare services for people in need.

Under the legislation another new feature was very important. Under the old means test program, the federal Government did not share the cost of administration. One of the great difficulties in the development of assistance programs in Canada was the inadequacy in the staffing of assistance programs. So, it was provided that any extension of cost arising from the strengthening of administration would be shared.

Through the addition of health and welfare services to assistance payments it is possible to provide a complete rehabilitation program for a person on assistance, if the province or the municipality decides to approach its assistance program in this way.

Another new element under this legislation was the provision of sharing for work activity projects. There was need for some kind of program that would fit in between the services that are provided by manpower services under the normal situation where an individual requires, perhaps, some retraining and placement services and perhaps a mobility grant and the services that are required by a person who may have been out of the labour market for a long time and who needs pre-employment training and needs motivational stimulation. This person often needs some special kind of work situation in order to make it possible to return to the labour market.

Another feature of the Canada Assistance Plan which has been quite important is one that was carried over from the Unemployment Assistance Act. So far as the federal Government is concerned, there is no limit on the rates of benefit that the federal Government will share on. Under the means test program there was an arbitrary ceiling set. If the federal Government raised the benefit by, say, $10 and the pension maximum was $75 a month, that was all that the federal Government would share on; so that, if the province wanted to go over and above that rate of benefit, there was no federal sharing. Therefore, under the Canada Assistance Plan the federal Government has been prepared to do two things; one is to have no ceiling on the amount of assistance payment so far as its shareable arrangements are concerned; and, secondly, if a person is on a program such as old age security and needs supplementation over and above old age security and the guaranteed supplement, the federal Government will share on any further supplementation provided by the province.

Thus, if a person is on, shall we say, unemployment insurance and the benefit is inadequate, then the Canada Assistance Plan will, if the province wishes to use it for that purpose, supplement the benefit.

The Plan may also be used for federal sharing in the case of persons in need of supplementation to remain off assistance. The situation envisaged here is where an individual might be getting a fairly low wage, either on a part-time basis or even on a full-time basis, and where if the individual continues in that situation then he or she will be unable to adequately maintain himself, herself, or his or her family. In other words, where the income is insufficient and the situation is unstable, then in that situation it might be worthwhile for the province or the municipality, depending on whom the assistance is administered by in the particular province, to provide some assistance payment to supplement the actual income from wages, and, in these instances, thereby prevent the assistance recipient from dropping down into a situation of complete unemployment where no earnings are coming into the household.

Those are a few of the more important features of the Canada Assistance Plan which accompanied this shift from the means test to the needs test. The program is, of course, only as good and as effective as the provinces make it within their own jurisdictions.

Throughout the development of social security in Canada, social assistance has always been under the administration of the provinces, with the exception of war veterans' allowances provided by the Department of Veterans Affairs and social assistance provided to Indians by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. As a result, the different provincial jurisdictions have approached assistance generally on the same basis but with variations in rates and other details of application. At the time the question of the Canada Assistance Plan was under consideration, there was a great deal of discussion, on the part of the provinces in particular, about the need for a federal instrument to provide flexibility. It should take into account the special circumstances within each province, owing to the fact that the problems faced by a highly industrial province, such as Ontario, shall we say, might not be completely the same as those problems faced by a province such as Newfoundland or Prince Edward Island. So that an effort was made to have a minimum of federal restrictions on the operation of the legislation within the provinces.

This developed partly as a heritage of annoyances and concern about the means test programs that went before, in that they had been inflexible and had required very extensive federal regulations; the provinces could do very little on their own initiative because they had to operate within these regulations that applied to the country as a whole. Consequently, in this stage of development Canada ended up, so far as its national instrument or its federal legislation was concerned, with much more flexible legislation than had applied under the means test approach.

Canada has pioneered in some areas in the use of other social security techniques. It was one of the first countries and one of the few countries to try out the demogrant or universal benefit. This started with family allowances back in 1944, when the legislation was passed. A joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons in 1950—of which Senator Croll, as I recall, was a member—recommended the universal demogrant for old age security. At that time everybody 70 years of age and over would receive a pension of $40 a month. Only two countries in the world had tried that approach at that time. Those countries were Sweden and New Zealand.

The new pattern in the case of old age security was widely accepted on the basis of the testimony, briefs and evidence put before that committee. As time went on and it was realized that there were many other priorities within our country, including things such as health care and education, to mention only a few, the pressure on the possibilities of expansion or, let us say, increasing the basic rates of benefit under those universal programs was considerable. So many people were covered that an increase of even a modest amount in the rate of benefit would raise the cost tremendously.

Therefore, in recent years, when all governments in Canada have been very pressed in terms of expenditures and have pushed up taxes in response to those needs, the search has gone on for other approaches that might be less expensive than the demogrant yet might be more selective in terms of the people that would be helped.

The Senate Committee on Aging, as you all know, proposed a type of income tested payment which would provide a guaranteed income up to a specified level. A few years back, following that report, the federal Government took action in this field. In addition to the recommendation from the Senate Committee on Aging, there was also the recommendation from the Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons dealing with the Canada Pension Plan. That committee was among other things concerned specifically with the people who were 65 years of age and over and who would receive nothing under the Canada Pension Plan, and with the group from 55 to 65 years of age who would only receive partial payments under the Canada Pension Plan. So one of the recommendations of that committee was that something should be done to try to assist this particular group. Of course, the alternatives posed were to continue with the basic approach of the demogrant recommended by the joint parliamentary committee in 1950 or to try a selective approach such as ultimately did emerge in the government legislation for the guaranteed income supplement.

In the development of this legislation, Canada has been out front. There have been some other efforts in this area but in a modest way. Our program in Canada has provided the kind of experience that shows what can be done with the application of an income test when it is applied to a group of people who are by and large out of the labour market. It does not face under these circumstances, of course, some of the difficulties that the guaranteed annual income approach faces when you are dealing with people in the working age group and the questions that some people raise concerning incentives to work.

So, we have then, in the field of income security in Canada over the years, tried out the whole range of techniques, and we are fortunate in that we have been able to learn from the application of these techniques the advantages and disadvantages of each one.

The Canadian development has been a little different from that of the United States. The situation there is quite often brought up and comparisons are made. The United States went into old-age survivors and disability insurance in 1935 and Canada waited until 1966. The United States did not go in for the demogrant approach. It has not adopted family allowances. It has not adopted a universal, flat-rate old-age pension. The United States has not tried a guaranteed income approach such as we have adopted for the aged.

Canada has the edge in the health field as far as people in poverty in Canada are concerned. We have a universal hospital program while in the United States the program is limited to those of 65 years of age and older who are in hospital. The implementation of medical care across the board in Canada will, of course, be of tremendous help to people in poverty. Many of the people in need require a disproportionate share of health services. Thus in many cases the developments in Canada and the United States have not been paralleled. Canada has allocated a higher proportion of expenditures to income maintenance, health and welfare services in relation to Gross National Product than has the United States. The Canadian ratio has consistently been at a much higher level.

In the field of assistance which was of special concern to those in poverty, the Canada Assistance Plan shares the cost for assistance for all people in need. The federal legislation in the United States does not cover the unemployed; in other words, the unemployment assistance is entirely a State matter. As a result the pattern of protection in the United States is much less satisfactory than the kind of protection Canada has provided. The fact that we have been able to develop at the federal level under the federal legislation a comprehensive approach to assistance has in fact meant a much more satisfactory level of assistance in relation to our capacity and a much greater integration of the provision of assistance and services, I believe, than has occurred in the United States. The fact that we have family allowances in Canada has been particularly important to the families with low incomes and with a large number of children. This has been very important as well in low-income areas in the country in terms of a redistribution of income in their favour.

The development in Canada in the last few years has of course been affected by the general concern that social security as such has not been reaching the poverty problem in the way that many people had expected and hoped for. This of course has resulted in very considerable discussion and consideration both within this country, the United States, the United Kingdom and a number of other countries as to how improvements can be achieved and as to identification of the weak points of the system as it is. What programs should be restructured? Is there a sufficient allocation of resources? Do we have the right kind of redistribution techniques? Have we the right balance in the social security system? Have we gone too far with demogants and not enough with income tested benefits and so forth? These are some of the basic questions before us today with regard to our social security system.

In addition, the whole question of participation on the part of assistance recipients has been a matter that has, within our department, certainly received a great deal of attention. The National Council on Welfare has been restructured. Formerly it included the ten provincial deputy ministers of welfare and was chaired by the Federal Deputy Minister. It also had ten people from outside of government to represent professional and lay leaders drawn from the welfare system. The new council is quite different. It has no representative from government. But it has persons from disadvantaged groups such as black, Indian, Metis and others; it has recipients of social assistance represented, as well as those who are professionals in the social service and social work education systems. This type of representation is very helpful in bringing directly to the attention of the minister the day-to-day problems of the poor and the inadequacies which may exist in our response to these problems.

The departmental branch responsible for Indian health services working with the Indian Brotherhood has formed a committee with which the department can consult on health services. It started its second meeting yesterday in Ottawa, and is meeting again today. This arrangement enables the minister to have representatives of the Indian community from across the country meet with our Indian Health officials to discuss health services, their inadequacies and how they can be improved and to have views of Indian leaders first hand. Communication between consumers and providers of service is provided through this mechanism. This has already proven to be very fruitful indeed.

Another approach to communication and involvement has been to provide funds to Indian groups in various provinces in order that they can employ Indian liaison personnel. They report on a regular basis to the Minister with respect to Indian public health services, nursing services and hospital and medical care and how these services are responding to community health needs.

Another dimension that is worth mentioning relates to the national welfare grants. Part of the grant program has been set up as a demonstration type of grant, whereby on a flexible basis the Department can deal with demonstration projects which involve community development and various disadvantaged groups. This encourages efforts of these groups to respond to social problems and their ability to identify specific problems. These are discussed with the various agencies in the field of housing, manpower, welfare and health services to see what improvements can be achieved.

In many cases in the past the individual assistance recipients have faced only the immediate public servants with whom they deal. When things were unsatisfactory to these and other disadvantaged groups there was no way of bringing about a change in order to make the provision of service more responsive.

These projects have reached down into the inner core of metropolitan cities. Grants are provided with a minimum number of strings, much less than those required when we have been dealing with more usual type of social agency. Part of this arises out of a general distrust of our efforts to work with these people. We seek to discover what some of the basic problems are when looked at from their point of view rather than from that of the administrators in the social security system.

One of the great difficulties when working at federal and provincial levels of government is to keep in mind that individuals and people are involved. In a program where the case load may be one million six hundred thousand people, such as in the case of Old Age Security recipients, it must be constantly kept in mind that each individual applicant wants to be sure that the benefit is provided promptly and in the right amount. They must be dealt with as human beings. The fact that we have to deal with so many people should not result in the administration becoming bureaucratic.

We have tried by various ways and means to ensure that the people covered by our income security programs and in our discussions with the provinces in terms of the people with whom they are dealing under cost-sharing programs do not get alienated by the system. This is a very important aspect of the whole problem of poverty. Under assistance programs, not only in Canada but in most countries, the inclination has been to develop procedures that are quite complicated and sometimes require much more information than is absolutely necessary. In the United States they have been experimenting with simplified declaration forms. In co-operation with the provinces we have established a task force on the developmental approach to social assistance. These procedures are being examined to see if they can be simplified. The screening out of long term cases from short term cases so as to determine whether the procedures for the former can be simplified and be subject to fewer periodic reviews. Many of these developments are part of the normal process of improvement which has been taking place in the last several years consequent upon objections to the nature of some procedures. The department has been very active in studying this whole question through a task force in co-operation with the provinces. This group was initiated by a Federal-Provincial Conference of Ministers. The deputy ministers meet twice a year and the ministers once a year for further consideration and discussion of the task Force reports.

Through the same federal-provincial mechanism two other task forces have been established. One is on the question of alienation in the social assistance system. We have been very concerned within the department about alienation generally as a social phenomenon.

We have been interested both through projects under the welfare grants and through the joint discussions with the provinces in endeavouring to understand the phenomenon better and in taking action to minimize it in the social assistance program. We hope that we will have a number of studies under way very soon which will give us greater insights as to where the social assistance system is weak, where it can be improved and what are the causes of alienation that exist.

The third task force that was set up is related to cost. The Department has been concerned about the rapid rise of expenditures under shared cost programs. This has been especially true in the field of hospital insurance, but there has been concern also about medicare that is now coming in as well as about social assistance costs. The nature of our concern in the case of assistance is not in regard to the levels or rates of benefits, but rather the efficiency of the system. Because costs have been increasing, there has been of course considerable criticism. We have left that we should, through the task force mechanism that involves provincial governments and the federal Government, try to have a better understanding of the delivery system, as a whole, of where the costs are rising due to improvement of benefits for people to inefficiency, to inflation or to other factors. Allied with this of course, is the general question of social assistance statistics. We have not been as successful as I would have hoped, in getting a picture of the social assistance caseload in Canada from many points of view so that it would be more helpful to us, not only in policy development, but also in being able to demonstrate to those that are critical of the level of expenditure how or why the certain increases in cost have taken place.

Of course, one of the purposes of the Canada Assistance Plan was to increase costs. The fact that benefit rates were not as satisfactory as they might have been was of concern to the people working in the assistance field who could see the dire poverty in the case of families and individuals. When the act was brought into effect we expected that costs would rise. In fact, they did because in the three-year period the costs increased by about 44 per cent. That would be the period from 1965-66 to 1968-69. One of the objectives was to extend coverage to many people that were poor and who were unable to get assistance. Another was to improve the rates of benefit and I think, in a very considerable measure, this has been achieved.

Mr. Chairman, I didn't make any notes, as I did not expect to say anything as an introduction, but I have and now feel that the officials, along with myself, would be ready to answer any questions you might have in regard to the brief.

Senator Carter: Mr. Chairman, I should like to compliment Dr. Willard on this very comprehensive brief and again on his presentation this morning. He has given us a thumbnail sketch of the historical development of social assistance from private and church charities up through social insurance and then on to social assistance in two stages, one stage with the means test and a second stage with a more modern concept, the needs test. I wonder if he could look into the future and tell us what he considers to be the next progressive step.

Dr. Willard: Mr. Chairman, this is perhaps a difficult question, but I might approach it in this way. In my opinion, in order to meet the basic objectives of a modern industrial society, we will probably need to employ all the techniques that we have used to date in order to provide income support and health and welfare services. For instance, universality in the case of hospital care and medical care is not only of interest to the poverty group, but it is also of interest to everybody in the country. In the case of Old Age Security, the demogrant technique has been adopted. The question which comes up in the case of Old Age Security and Family Allowances is to whether or not we continue with a demogrant; is it an important part of the system. You could come out with different answers in case of Family Allowances than in the case of Old Age Security. For example, in the case of Old Age Security most, or a large number of, Canadians have developed their saving plans for their provision for their old age on the basis that that flat rate grant would be there. Private pension plans have been developed with it as part of their total package. Therefore this is a consideration. Secondly, the approach to Old Age Security in Canada has really followed a two-deck system, the lower part being the flat rate demogrant and the upper part being the graduated or earnings-related portion provided by the Canada-Quebec Plan. These programs help low income groups but in addition for many of the people who are in the middle income higher groups and who will be fortunate enough not to drop down into the poverty net, this kind of protection is also very important. You have a place in the system for demogrant and earnings-related benefit which is a basic objective of the old social insurance approach.

I would think that when you come to the guaranteed income supplement approach it is a technique which could certainly be applied on a broader basis than at the present time. There are many technical problems and many difficulties, in the guaranteed income approach, but I think this program has demonstrated that certainly within the context that it has been applied to date it will work. So that I think, looking to the future, that is a technique that we undoubtedly are going to use and that it will receive more attention than the demogrant.

I think that the social assistance technique will be with us in the future. One of the reasons it will be with us is that, whether you had a demogrant in the form of a universal payment to everybody, or whether you have a guaranteed annual income or guaranteed income supplement, under these approaches, it is necessary to draw lines or maximum levels of benefit. And in a country such as Canada, when you draw a line somebody does not get enough and somebody may get too much. As long as you have that, you are going to have some mechanism to taper income support off, and the mechanism to taper it off for those who do not get enough will be the needs test. It will ascertain what is the short-fall between budgetary requirements and available resources. Therefore, the social assistance technique using the needs test will be with us in the future as well. Whether it is improved and becomes a technique that is relied upon in conjunction with social insurance and the demogrant, or whether it is the technique that is relied upon along with the guaranteed annual income it will be there in any case.

Looking to the future, you are really into a question of what will be the change in the balance, in the use of those different techniques.

Senator Carter: I am rather surprised to hear you say that, Dr. Willard. I would grant that we have medicare and we have hospital services and welfare services—dentures, eye glasses, prosthetics, things like that—but I had thought that, taking these for granted, when you come just to purely income maintenance with a guaranteed annual income, that is at a certain level, what we consider above the poverty level, tied to inflation or cost of living or whatever way you would put it, would eliminate the necessity for these other social assistance programs.

Dr. Willard: Let us take unemployment insurance. Really the question you pose is whether, with the introduction of guaranteed annual income, would unemployment insurance disappear entirely or would there be integration.

The decision that you have to face then relates to the kind of compensation that you give—remember that the objective of unemployment insurance is to look after short-term unemployment—and remember that the kind of people that you are dealing with in the present society in many cases carry a great deal of current debt. When they become unemployed for six weeks or so that loss of income is very critical in terms of their overall budgeting, basic maintenance, and whole family situation. You could have many people who become unemployed for six weeks or six months who might not fall down into the poverty net in the sense that they would qualify for a guaranteed annual income payment but who would still feel that they very much need this short-term protection.

Senator Carter: We have different concepts, have we not?

Dr. Willard: This is where the question comes up, do you integrate with social insurance or do you eliminate it? If you bring the guaranteed annual income in as a floor, underneath, so that anybody who has an inadequate or no unemployment benefit is brought up to a minimum level, then you continue to carry on with the social insurance technique. I think these are the decisions that would have to be made.

Senator Carter: I suppose that if you just look at the income from the aggregate for a year, then you can say that this fellow is out of work a short time and he is going to make it up by and by. But that is only a method of applying the principle. I was thinking more in terms of the principle.

If a person, being out of work, short-term unemployed, in nine cases out of ten he is out employment, he is out of a job, because the Government put him out of that job because of Government policy, a cut-back here and a cut-back there. So the Government has a duty and an obligation, I would say, to compensate that man, so that his income for that month or that week or the six weeks or the six months is not impaired regardless of what he earns in the balance of the year. I was thinking more in terms of the general principle rather than how it could be applied.

I was most interested in what you said about the Canada Assistance Plan. I remember when that was introduced into the house we thought it was the answer to our prayers and the answer to all our problems. It has not turned out that way. As a matter of fact, as far as I am concerned I can only speak for the way it has been applied in my own province—I have really been very disappointed in it. And from our hearings here, it has not been too satisfactory in other provinces as well, even in Ontario.

One of the reasons—not all of the reasons, but one of them—is that although we talk about the needs test we left it up to the province to decide what the needs test would be and in most cases they defined it in terms of a means test by another name. Actually, we have not changed the means test, we have not got away from the means test at all.

You spoke about that in your argument against this annual income. Unless you have a guaranteed annual income, how are you going to get over this interpretation or this definition of the means test which remains under provincial jurisdiction?

Dr. Willard: Mr. Chairman, I think part of the problem Senator Carter is raising really gets back to a jurisdictional or constitutional question. While the federal Government has taken the lead in many areas in relation to income security, and old age security is certainly one example and unemployment insurance is another, in both cases where constitutional amendments were concerned—in the field of social assistance and services it has been generally accepted that the provinces are responsible for the kind of assistance and services that are provided.

Now, if they are inadequate, then I suppose it is a matter that can and in some ways should be worked out in the provincial legislatures. There are some instances, however, where it could be said that the amount of money available or the funds available to provincial governments make it very difficult for them to implement the Canada Assistance Plan the way they themselves would like to do it. Of course, this is especially true in the case of some of the Atlantic provinces. The question, therefore, that the Atlantic provinces have raised is whether the federal sharing of 50-50 in the case of a very low-income province is satisfactory. But when you come to other provinces that have fairly high levels of income and financially are able to raise their rates to a more adequate level then, really, the responsibility does rest with them. I believe that is about the way it stands.

Part of the difficulty in some cases is that, for the able-bodied unemployed who are on assistance, there is the problem that the assistance payments, particularly if there are a large number of children in the family, are higher than what an unskilled worker would receive; or are higher, say, than the minimum wage. This is the conflict that arises in many cases particularly in high-income provinces. Sometimes in cities where there are very high costs the inclination, therefore, if you are trying adequately to meet the needs of recipients of assistance, is to push the rates up so that they can have sufficient food and clothing and shelter and the other needs that a family or an individual should have.

Senator Carter: When we brought in the Canada Assistance Plan, one implication of it, if I recall correctly, was that if a person was receiving an old age pension of $75 a month and it was not enough for his needs, he would be eligible under the Canada Assistance Plan for a supplementary payment of which the federal Government would pay half the cost. Yet, somehow, we discarded that because we found it was not working and we found it necessary to pay a supplement to the old age pension of $30 a month, which normally, as I understood it, would have been taken care of out of the Canada Assistance Plan. Now, perhaps that is an admission of failure of the Canada Assistance Plan, but I certainly don't know the theory behind it.

The Chairman: When was the Canada Assistance Plan brought in?

Dr. Willard: The Canada Assistance Plan was brought in in 1966 and a little later that year the guaranteed income supplement was brought in.

Just a few days ago one province announced increases in its rates of assistance. As I understand the increase as it applies in the case of an old age pensioner who would, say, be getting the maximum under the guaranteed income supplement, or about $111 under the combined old age security and guaranteed income supplement, the province will supplement up to $150 a month. In other words, the province is raising the maximum benefit available from $111 to $150. The supplement is on needs test basis, and the federal Government will be sharing half the cost.

Senator Carter: In addition to this $111 you are still getting from the Canada Assistance Plan another payment?

Dr. Willard: Yes.

Senator Carter: How many provinces are doing that?

The Chairman: Just one. Incidentally, according to information I have, welfare allowances for one to four children are all below what we consider at the moment to be the economic poverty level and are all below the minimum wage that they will draw in many provinces. Even the Dominion of Canada minimum wage is $1.50.

Dr. Willard: Mr. Chairman, we can check those figures for you, if you like. On page A31, at the bottom of the page, is the following statement:

In any case, it is clear that the minimum wage provides less for most families than is considered adequate by provincial budget standards for welfare recipients. It must be borne in mind, however, that the budget standards set by the provinces for welfare recipients often do not correspond to the actual amounts paid, which may be subject to a specified ceiling or limited to amounts considered reasonable in the community.

The assistance rates for the different provinces have been set out in the Appendix.

The Chairman: But the point is: are our welfare allowances not geared to something below the minimum wage, or is it just a coincidence?

Dr. Willard: The suggestion here is that in general the minimum wage is less for most families. Of course, you would expect that to be the case because minimum wages have not been geared to the number of children.

Senator McGrand: Dr. Willard, you have had one or two years to study the Canada Assistance Plan. You must have some idea what it can do for people therefore. To what extent can this plan meet the needs of the poor, of those below the poverty level, and, when it has done all it can do, how big will the gap be between that and what the poor should get?

Dr. Willard: Mr. Chairman, there is no doubt in my mind that the Canada Assistance Plan can meet the needs of the poor. I suppose the question is as to whether it will meet them adequately.

Senator McGrand: How wide is the gap?

Dr. Willard: We have about 1.2 million people covered under the Canada Assistance Plan. It is the program of last resort for the whole social security structure and therefore we have to depend on it and improve it unless something else takes its place. The steps we have taken in terms of these task forces have been designed to try to improve the welfare delivery system. As to the adequacy of benefits, this is a matter that rests entirely with the provincial legislatures and governments. If the feeling is that the benefits are not sufficient, then the recourse is of course in each province to the provincial legislature and government. The approach to the application of the needs test is to many people unsatisfactory. For those who are concerned that the income should fit the particular circumstances it is difficult with social insurance to determine whether the benefit is inadequate. With the means test approach or with a guaranteed income approach the question is as to whether it can fit the need of individual persons or families as is done through the budget deficit system when the needs test technique is used. If the social stigma grows around the Canada Assistance Plan the way it developed around the means test, perhaps as a major piece of legislation in the social assistance field, it may be supplanted, but at the present time it is the bulwark, as it were, for those who cannot get sufficient income support through the social insurance, the demogrants and the other sources. I would think, as I mentioned before, that no matter what other techniques are used, whether it is the social insurance, the demogrant, or the guaranteed income approach, you will have to have social assistance as a program of last resort.

Senator McGrand: Tell me this—if Canada were to adopt the guaranteed annual income, or any income adequate to meet the needs of the poor, and I know you have given this a great deal of thought, have you any idea how much money it would take to give a guaranteed annual income to those who live below the poverty line? Different estimates have been given to me ranging from $200 million to $2 billion.

Dr. Willard: Mr. Chairman, this is the difficulty. The reason we have had so many estimates is partly because unless you work out an entire system to determine how much integration there will be with existing programs and whether you will wipe out this or that program and unless you make a whole series of value judgments, you really cannot get down to an adequate figure or net cost; so that you would have to work out a specific system. The added difficulty is a technical one and that is that we have not had satisfactory income information about the lower income sector of our community, which is, of course, vital, when you come to make estimates of a technique such as a guaranteed annual income. It is to be hoped that as we go along this type of social data with regard to income and expenditure of these people will be improved, and we will be in a better position to make meaningful estimates.

Senator McGrand: Of course the problem varies according to regions. Is there any region in Canada where the Canada Assistance Plan would be adequate to meet the needs of those below the poverty level? Is there any one region where what we now have is adequate to meet their needs?

Dr. Willard: Well, Mr. Chairman, I think that is difficult for me to answer because it does raise the subjective question of what is adequacy and this, of course, is what this whole debate is all about. Some people in our society complain that people on assistance get too much, and other people on assistance complain they are not getting enough. Provincial authorities try to design their various budgets as to the needs for short-term and long-term cases; they are striving for something that is reasonably acceptable, having regard of course to the financial resources they have. I think it depends very much on a value judgment as to what is adequate within the context of the Canadian society.

The Chairman: In your brief you have given us a study of Toronto and Montreal. In the light of Senator McGrand's question, what is the purpose in giving us that particular study? Was it for the purpose of telling us that it was applicable, could be applied, or was inadequate. It is on pages A17 and A18.

Dr. Willard: The purpose, Mr. Chairman, was to show the process through which the family budgets are developed, and in so doing I think it illustrates the point I am making about the value judgments that are needed.

Here are two different groups in different communities approaching the same problem and with different value judgments. On page A 17 you will see the comparison. They have come up with different budgets; The Toronto budget coming up with $359.39—leaving out some items here for the moment—and the other shows $274.81 on the same items. The Toronto plan adds in certain other items; and you can see that if those items were included what would be the total monthly cost of providing this kind of income for a family of four with two children, a boy aged 4 and a girl aged 5. I think it shows you the great difficulty of developing budgets and the kind of value judgments that have to be made. There are some technical problems involved, for instance how to approach the question of rent and decide what amount should be put in for that item. In one case you have rent at $150 a month in Toronto and in the other at $101 in Montreal. This not only reflects the difference of rental levels in the two cities, but also the difference in the techniques or approach. It was hoped that this would give you an insight into the approach which can be taken by various provincial governments and municipalities in the determination of levels of assistance. Depending upon your point of view it may lead you to the opinion that certain assistance levels in some provinces are adequate and in others are not.

Senator Carter: Is this a composite budget of the average of a number of cases? Was it compiled from the budgets of two actual families?

The Chairman: No, they are composite, but prepared by careful people and well worked out.

Senator Carter: Are they geared to income? Either the same accommodation is available in Montreal for $100 per month as is available in Toronto for $150, or else the person is living there not by choice, but because some other factors force him to do so.

The Chairman: The amount indicated on page A-17 is approximately $1,800 more than would be received in the province of Ontario for a family of four. Multiplying the $360 by 12 results in an annual figure of about $1,200 less, without the inclusion of the additional amount of $45.

Senator McGrand: It may be unfair to ask you this question, but I would like to have some information. We have a fairly accurate idea of the percentage of people who are below the poverty line and those above it. It seems that there are a good number of people in the middle class who are reaching the upper middle class in income. Those in the upper middle class are reaching the upper class. The gap between them is narrowing as salaries increase. In order to provide a guaranteed income to those below the poverty line, the money has to be provided from some other group. In the growth of those emerging into the more affluent class adequate to provide those below the poverty line with sufficient income to bring them above it? That question has to be answered some day by someone.

Dr. Willard: We do need more income distribution studies.

The Chairman: The answer to that question lies in the middle of page 31 of your brief. It is an important question and the answer appears in the middle of the fourth paragraph on page 31:

The gross national product was $11.9 billion in 1946 and $71.5 billion in 1968.

Just turn that over in your mind.

When the program was in full operation in 1946, the average weekly industrial wage in Canada was approximately $32.50 per week; it is now $120 per week. The cost of living has risen by 111 per cent since 1946. By contrast, the average monthly family allowance payment per family between March, 1947, and March, 1969, has increased by 15 per cent; the average payment per child went up 12 per cent.

You ask whether we are capable of meeting the need. These figures indicate that we have been capable of meeting a great number of needs and have not done so.

Senator McGrand: You can increase the national product solely by inflation. If inflation can be used to increase the national product it is the same thing that makes the poor poorer, so that is not the answer. I know it is a tough question.

Senator Inman: Mr. Chairman, this is a very big brief, so I have only read parts of it. Dr. Willard, I must say that what I have read is very impressive.

The first paragraph of page 7 appears to imply that all that is required to solve our problem of poverty is a massive input of services, which you suggest means more money and more people for the same purpose. Can you be sure that this approach will succeed when we are still faced with a severe operating problem? I have been connected with the social assistance program long enough to know its strengths and weaknesses, yet it is still with us. We seem to have failed to do much about poverty.

Dr. Willard: The purpose of this discussion is to emphasize that when discussing income support we must not forget that in the society which exists and in that which we can look forward to in the future there is a greater need for services. While we certainly consider income maintenance to be basic, we have tended quite often to think that it solves everything.

There are many community development projects that we need in large metropolitan cities, in particular in their inner cores. We need services such as day care centres, counselling and community health services. More attention must be paid to the questions of involvement and the problems of social change. The services of people are required in all these matters. This is an indication that the provision of adequate income security will not brush away many of the social problems that are growing very quickly, such as alienation, drug abuse, and so on. The increasing number of women in the labour force creates a need for community services and day care centres. We need day care centres with the increasing number of women in the labour force and so forth. This is a part of our society that we must remember is very real and must be thought of in terms of the social development. By paying people cash benefits we don't get it into the streams that develop these services.

Senator Inman: It seems to me that sometimes there is an overlapping of services.

Dr. Willard: I would think that is true. It has occurred in Canada, and in most countries where there has been voluntary and public services trying to develop in the same field and where there has been no general planning. Over the years with the development of the United Appeal and public welfare planning bodies in various cities, this has been a force which has tended to co-ordinate and cut down in overlapping. I agree that still some occurs and that there is always room for improvement in this area.

Senator Inman: Mr. Chairman, there is another question I have put perhaps this is not the place to bring it up. I have heard people comment about Family Allowances. We have been speaking of means or needs tests here today. What is your thinking of having a needs or means test for Family Allowances? I have heard some people suggest that perhaps families whose income is below a certain level should get the Family Allowance but not if they are above a certain income.

Dr. Willard: There has been some discussion in the press and elsewhere that Family Allowances should have an income test. In this case it might be similar to the guaranteed income supplement, but as with most major policy matters of this type, there are arguments for and against. The question is to examine the basic objectives of the program as to what they were when the program was introduced and they are still the objectives that are important now. Some people react very strongly to the idea of the imposition of any test and think that the Family Allowances should be paid, as they are now, and that all children should be treated alike. Other people take the point of view and say that above a certain level of income the Family Allowance payment is an extra; that any money given to people who are above that level of income might better be redistributed and given to those at lower income levels. We have a very divided opinion on this question and of course it is a policy matter that governments will have to face.

Senator Inman: I believe it was our province, Prince Edward Island, where that was first used as a pilot project.

Dr. Willard: That is correct. When Family Allowances were introduced they tried them out first in Prince Edward Island.

The Chairman: As I recall, in Family Allowance, there were two reasons which were given publicly. One of the reasons was to try to increase consumer spending immediately after the war. The second one was to attempt to equalize between two people doing the same job, one having one child and the other one having four children. Does Family Allowance do that trick today? Does it answer that purpose?

Dr. Willard: It is a matter of degree. It does not do it nearly as much as it did when it was introduced. As I mentioned earlier, in the case of a large family with a low income you can see that it can make a tremendous difference in terms of their total income. This is the place where the program is mainly effective.

The effectiveness has receded over the years and I think the brief brings this point out.

The Chairman: Like the rest of you, I have read the brief with a great deal of interest. I am going to take a little time to look over these notes. In the meantime, you may break in any time you wish. I think you started out by saying that there were approximately four million of what we call poorly stricken. You broke them up into the Canada Assistance Plan and in the Old Age Security, which had about two million and the working poor had about two million persons. Do your statistics indicate where those four million people are, in what provinces they are living by numbers or percentage?

Dr. Willard: Senator Croll, I think we can try to get these data on a provincial basis, but I do not have them with me now. Miss J. R. Podoluk's study from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics on Income Distribution, Poverty in Canada, 1967, which was put out in October of last year does give some very useful data on a regional basis. If you accept the poverty line or low income cut-out line that has been used in this study, which as you know is $1,740 for an unattached individual, $2,900 for a family with two, and so on, you then get some results like this: for the families in the Atlantic Provinces 33.7 per cent were below the poverty line; for the unattached individuals, it was 52.5 per cent. On the other hand, if you take a province such as Ontario, you get a situation like this: the percentage below the poverty line in case of families was 12.4 per cent, and in the case of unattached individuals, it was 32.5 per cent. These figures are available and I think they are very useful because they bring out the regional income distribution and the disparities that are present in terms of the percentage below poverty lines in each region. The percentages are very high in the Atlantic Provinces and relatively low in Ontario. For families in Quebec it was 20.3 per cent, the Prairie Provinces, 23 per cent and British Columbia, 16.2 per cent. The pattern for unattached individuals is a little different. The percentages of those below the poverty line who are unattached individuals is affected tremendously by the aged and by the growing number of unattached young people. A new pattern is developing in the case of young people.

The Chairman: I was raising the point to give some indication that poverty exists in every province in considerable percentage and considerable number.

Dr. Willard: That is right.

The Chairman: This business of looking to the Atlantic Provinces and saying that the problem people are only there is entirely wrong.

Dr. Willard: You have a higher percentage in relation to their total number of families, and to their total number of unattached persons residing, say, in the Atlantic Provinces. But when you come to a province such as Ontario the really serious problem is in the large metropolitan areas, the very large cities. This is where one needs to pay attention.

The Chairman: My figures—they may be wrong, they are some of the statistics that our staff study reached—indicate that if you took Metropolitan Toronto and include Hamilton and Oshawa, outside limits, you would find as many people below the poverty line there as you would in the Maritime Provinces.

Senator Carter: You mean, in number?

The Chairman: Yes, I said "people".

Dr. Willard: This is a very important consideration; you have the large concentrations of people particularly in large metropolitan cities. As we know, from all the projections and estimates of future population trends, these very large cities are going to keep getting proportionately larger. This is going to be one of the most serious problem areas.

The Chairman: I as—I am saying as of now. It is well to get that across the country because there are many of the matters that they do not understand about poverty and this is one of them.

Senator Carter: Does not that cloud the whole issue, that we think of it in terms of regions, instead of numbers, that we think of poverty and really not of say Indians, Metis, seasonal workers, in the Maritimes. When you think of numbers of people, it is just as acute in Ontario as it is in Newfoundland.

The Chairman: Senator Carter, that is exactly the point I am trying to get across to the public somehow. Let me deal with something. On page 4 of your brief you say:

The social security system is blamed for its "failure" to eliminate poverty, when in fact it is the private sector of the economy that has been unable to perform in accordance with public expectations.

This is no reflection on you, because if there is anybody entitled to blame for the social security measures, members of the Senate are entitled to blame—and the chairman, particularly, he has been longer at it than you have.

In my view and in the view of a great number of other people there is a lack of confidence in the welfare system. There is a credibility gap, there is an alienation. The gap seems to be growing wider all the time. We have to admit, whether we want to or not, that in the eyes of the public it is a failure. Let us admit that for a moment. On the other hand, we also say that what we would have expected from the public sector, has been a failure. Where does a man go? Where does he turn to?

Senator McGrand: Mr. Chairman, let me ask you a question. Who do you mean? I tried to write it down. Who do you mean when you say there is a public feeling that the welfare system is a failure? Whom do you mean by public?

The Chairman: I mean by people.

Senator McGrand: What class of people?

The Chairman: The recipients and the people who pay for it—they all feel it is not working out well at all. Where does a man turn to, in just that sort of a situation?

Dr. Willard: Mr. Chairman, first of all I would like to add a word about the quote, for fear that the paragraphs in the document might have been misunderstood.

The Chairman: If I have not quoted it all, go ahead.

Dr. Willard: That is all right. I think one of the difficulties we face is that the industrial system does not respond easily to social objectives. This does not necessarily mean there is a reflection on the private sector. But even when government and everybody else tries to create the right climate and public policies are developed so that there will be a maximum growth in the economic field, and thereby, we hope generate a high level of employment, even with all this, we find a situation whereby the private sector is still not providing sufficient jobs, and this backs up into the whole system.

As a result of there being insufficient jobs, people complain about Manpower Services, that they are not placing people, that they are not training people. Sometimes there are not enough jobs for Manpower to train them for, so the question comes up whether it is economic in terms of the training program.

The social security system is considered inadequate under these circumstances, firstly by the people who get into it who want jobs rather than being on social assistance. Generally speaking, individuals and the people as a whole tend to criticize the social security system for part of the ills because there is a back-up in terms of insufficient jobs being created. That was the only point of this paragraph. For instance, in regions of slow economic growth we have very high levels of people on social assistance. A large percentage of those people do not want to be on social assistance. They are not particularly very happy with it and they naturally blame the social security system.

In areas where you have, say, a high level of economic growth, I think your point is that the people are still unhappy with the social security system. All we can do under these circumstances is see what are the techniques through which one can provide income support and various types of ancillary services, health and welfare services, rehabilitation services, preventive efforts, and so forth and where the system falls down. Have we enough of involvement of the people concerned in certain systems? Are we responding enough to the basic needs of people? At what point should economic development, as it were, receive a higher priority in terms of social development?

You get back to these very basic questions—(a) the allocation of resources to social development and social security programs; and (b) within the social security system, are we using the proper techniques.

There are no others now being used; no others in France, Britain, the United States; there are no others that we have not tried. We know community development techniques in this country. We have community development projects. We have tried a guaranteed income approach. We have tried all the different income security methods. Whether we have the will to pursue them, and whether we are prepared to put in sufficient resources to pursue them effectively, is perhaps the basic question.

The Chairman: What we are doing now—and we have to discuss this—what we have been doing is patching and band aiding here and there to try and keep the welfare system going.

A few minutes ago Senator Carter asked you a question concerning the future. What of the future? Where do we go from here?

In my view, one of the most troublesome programs we have had in this country was the old age security from 1927 to 1966, and yet today it is one of the most successful programs and least troublesome. The greatest type of complaint seems to be why a cheque is $78.51 instead of $79. But the cheque comes in and there it is. Since 1966 old age security has had a good effect upon older people the like of which we hardly anticipated. That is an innovation. Despite the fact that you give us the credit for it, it is your department that has really made it work by adding the supplement to it, which was an intelligent approach and one that worked very well. In doing that you broke new ground, and my question is, don't we learn anything at all from these experiences and can't we take an example from something that works?

Dr. Willard: I am sure we do.

Senator Carter: There were two points that you made, Mr. Chairman. Dr. Willard concentrated on one of them, namely, that even in Toronto, with its economic growth, people were still not satisfied—neither the security recipients nor those who pay. But the other point that you emphasized was that this backup which has occurred in Toronto has occurred in an area of economic growth, so that economic growth by itself is not the answer. And economic growth is our new philosophy now.

The Chairman: No, no, Senator Carter. I think in the course of the brief Dr. Willard covers himself there a bit.

Senator Carter: I am not too sure about that. I want to make sure that he does.

The Chairman: I will tell you why. Dr. Willard starts talking about the redistributive effect later on his brief, saying, in effect, that it has not taken place in this country since 1952.

Senator Carter: That is only part of it. The point is that we are still going to have poverty, even if we have economic growth. Poverty is as much a phenomenon of the future as it is of the present and past so that we may as well accept it as a fact of life and see how we are going to deal with it. The ways in which we have been dealing with it up to now have not been too effective. We must break new ground somewhere. We must not work on the premise that somehow or other we are going to have economic growth some day somewhere and that poverty is going to disappear. It is just not going to happen that way. We have to look for the answer. That is the point.

Dr. Willard: That is a very good point, Mr. Chairman, because we all know that technological advances are tending to make it more difficult for many people to have continuous employment within our society. As you know, there is a great argument raging among those who write about cybernetics, and who talk about the computer and the automated machine, as to whether, together, they are going to result in massive amounts of unemployment. There is the argument that we will have to re-arrange our approach to work in terms of the length of the work week and in terms of how we will employ people and, finally, in terms of how we will support them. In the future, if this comes to pass, we may have to be prepared to give income maintenance to people who, under present circumstances, we would say should be working, but where, in the future, there may not be jobs. That is one line of argument.

Immediately after World War II there was great deal of discussion about automation and whether it would result in high levels of unemployment and replacement of people, but we still seem in this modern industrial society to be able to maintain a fairly high level of employment. Innovations and new developments keep coming along and to create new employment opportunities. That is another line of argument, and it says that the worst that will happen under the developments of the future is that the situation will deteriorate vis-à-vis the unskilled worker.

These are the types of argument being pursued now, but the core of the question is not only whether it will or will not happen, but how soon it may happen. Therefore, I think the point you make is quite valid, Senator Carter, that, even if we are going to have a high level of economic growth, we may still expect to have poverty problems accompanying it, just as in the past.

The Chairman: In my opinion one of the very best social measures acts ever put on the statute books of this country is the Canada Assistance Act. Naturally it has deficiencies, as all acts have, but would it be possible for us to use that act, with some slight amendments, as a complete umbrella for the delivery of services? As a matter of fact, isn't everything under it now.

Dr. Willard: Mr. Chairman, let us take for example the field of health. The tendency in that area in the past has been to develop universal services. Whether that will be the approach in the future is one question I cannot answer, but it is worth thinking about. Under the one approach, you foresee the kind of situation we have for hospital insurance and medical care extended to dental care, to visiting nursing services, to drugs and so forth. Under the other approach, which we now follow, these are made available on a selective basis rather than on a universal basis. In other words, so far as the federal Government is concerned, we will share the cost of all these health services to people in need. Thus, this is one kind of decision that will have to be made in the future: are we going to be selective about the remaining health services that are not covered on a universal basis? If we are going to be selective, is it going to be on a needs test basis, as under the Canada Assistance Plan, or will it be on an income basis, as under OMSIP, as it was in Ontario several months ago? These are the kinds of decisions in that health service system that are going to have to be made.

The Chairman: There are really two questions involved here: hasn't everything been brought under the umbrella of the Canada Assistance Act already; and couldn't that act be used in the future as a vehicle of delivery of services?

Dr. Willard: I think, Mr. Chairman, this is a possibility. In other words, it is possible to experiment with the kinds of test you have for eligibility within this approach. You might be able to say in certain types of cases, long-term cases, that an income test is sufficient up to a certain income level and then a needs test might be applied. There are possibilities through the procedures under the assistance approach or technique whereby improvements can take place. Indeed, as I mentioned earlier, one of the purposes of the task force on the developmental approach to assistance is to look at the whole question of how to test eligibility. There are ways in which testing could be carried out that would be less offensive and would not carry as much social stigma. If you could solve this problem on the one hand, then the only other difficulty you face is the adequacy of benefit. Presumably for those on assistance or receiving this type of income support, if you could solve these two problems, then the main difficulties would be over.

I would add, however, that one of the problems of our day is not only the people who are on assistance, and we have spent a lot of time talking about those, but the numbers of people in employment who have been designated by some people as the working poor. There you have the difficulty of how through a needs test technique do you reach these people, except in individual cases as we now provide for under the Canada Assistance Plan. Many of these are people who are likely to fall into the assistance net unless some action is taken to give them some supplementary income support. I think the whole issue that comes to the fore these days in the discussion of income maintenance programs involves such questions as—how does the level of benefit, if it is going to be adequate for social assistance, but up against the minimum wage and against the kind of remuneration that the working poor are getting. That is one thing. The second question is—how about the working poor themselves, the people who are not on assistance?

The Chairman: Naturally we had to come to this at some time, and you have come to it now. The question of the working poor is half our problem. I think I have made it clear to you that our thinking the Pudolok definition of poverty is more acceptable than the Orshansky. In talking about the working poor in these terms, there are at least three provinces in Canada that extend assistance to the working poor. In order to keep them off relief, they subsidize them. Now, these are not the rich provinces. Is not this information passed on to the rich provinces and some indication given to them that these things are happening in other parts of the country?

Senator McGrand: What provinces are these?

The Chairman: The two western provinces and the two maritime provinces.

Dr. Willard: Mr. Chairman, certainly at the federal-provincial conferences of ministers, deputy ministers and officials, these are the kinds of matters that are discussed.

The Chairman: But the usual argument presented is that if you subsidize these working poor, you will keep wages low. That was the original argument and it has been used over the years. It was, perhaps, a good one before we had minimum wages but now we have minimum wages which are enforced fairly carefully.

Dr. Willard: Mr. Chairman, the fact that that provision is in the Canada Assistance Act indicates our support in pursuing it. I think the fact that some provinces have, as it were, put their foot in the stream to try to see how the water feels, is an indication that they are trying it out. The problem they face is, of course, that once they start supplementing wages, if they are not careful the trade unions object. You face certain difficulties. Does it involve subsidizing inefficiency and so on? That is one of the reasons, perhaps, why the provinces have not been more active in this area. However, I would think that if the experience in this field proves to be successful, the trend would naturally be to use this provision under the Canada Assistance Plan more and more.

The Chairman: My next question has to deal with what the Americans are doing, I am sure you are aware of what is happening there with respect to incentives for the working poor and no doubt you have read the latest reports on it. The latest report I have read on it says this, and I quote:

There is no evidence that work effort declined among those receiving income support payments... On the contrary, there is an indication that the work effort of participants receiving payments increased relative to the efforts of those not receiving payments.

They are talking about the experiments now being carried on in New Jersey. To me, these are very welcome words since they indicate that the experiment is working successfully there. I am sure you have read all the literature on this and you have read about the system whereby they exempt the first $60. Apparently they are finding that in the main it is not lowering wages or keeping wages down, but that it is in fact having a very good effect.

Dr. Willard: I think that is a very useful experiment which is now being carried out in New Jersey. In effect they have taken a control group under ordinary assistance arrangements as well as those they are studying to see what is the effect of the application of different techniques and formulae. They are trying to see what the situation would be in groups where the amount of assistance is 50 per cent, 75 per cent or 100 per cent of their budgetary needs on the one hand, and on the other hand they are trying to study the other variables. They have graduated the rate of reduction of benefit according to the amount of outside income so that they can see what are the effects of all incentives. This is the information that we really need. That is why this is probably one of the more important experiments being carried out.

The Chairman: I gain the impression from reading your brief that you say in effect that in so far as the disadvantaged are concerned provision for them should be made on the basis of a reasonable income, perhaps similar to but more adequate than that provided under the Old Age Security.

Dr. Willard: Mr. Chairman, I did not see those words. I am interested that you have gained that impression.

The Chairman: I will point out the statements in the brief.

Dr. Willard: I will accept your word, Mr. Chairman. It is a question of what was intentional or unintentional.

The Chairman: You cannot be more intentional than at the bottom of page 10:

Yet as noted earlier, the social security system is blamed for the failure of the private industrial sector to meet the problem of poverty due to unemployment in a period of rapid technological change when the structure of family relationships has weakened considerably. In periods of full employment, the people who are on social assistance will be the aged, the disabled, mothers with small children, and the unemployable. These people really need help; they are not on the assistance rolls due to any lack of individual motivation.

If that does not mean what I said it does. I do not know what it means.

Dr. Willard: I think it means exactly what it says.

The Chairman: I will continue reading from your brief:

In our complex industrial society which seems unable to provide a high level of employment, there are also a large number of unemployed persons on the assistance rolls. These people are there through no fault of their own—they need income support, and the kind of society we have developed makes it hard for them to obtain income in any other way.

Are you still not convinced that my interpretation is correct?

Dr. Willard: No, I quite agree that these people need income support; there is no question about that. I do not think that in the brief we have particularly favoured any approach or technique.

The Chairman: Then if you did not favour any system or technique you spent pages 81 to 88 of the brief, which I found particularly interesting.

Dr. Willard: We referred to this, Mr. Chairman, because it is a new development and Canada is one of the few countries that has followed it. The proposal was recommended by a Senate committee and we considered that it warranted that kind of attention.

The Chairman: I am, of course, delighted to see it, but the interpretation I arrived at is exactly the one that you now give us. Moreover, I read into it the fact that you are saying, if you are looking for anyone who knows anything about guaranteed income, we are the boys who know more about it than anyone else; we have been through the drill.

The point I am making, and I read these statements together, is that we have these disadvantaged people who are not in the main stream and who are not able to look after themselves. What is the difference between a blind, old or crippled person? They are all in the same category of being unfortunate. What can you do for them? Maintenance income, yet they have been left hanging on the limit. That is what puts the system into disrepute. All of us understand that you do not have to explain this to a politician. Every man on the street understands it. What sort of system is it which deals with one group of people in one way and a like group in another way? These people I am talking about now are immersed in poverty and constitute about one-third of our problem.

It does no good for you to shake your head and for me to do all the talking, that is not going to get us any place.

Senator Inman: I am interested in what appears at the bottom of page 26. The brief makes a big issue of incentive, and so on. Mention is made of a massive expenditure of public funds which would be required to bring all Canadians up to a level of basic adequacy.

What is basic adequacy and how much money is massive expenditure?

The Chairman: Senator Inman, that question was asked by Dr. McGrand. We are taking it for granted at the moment that the Economic Council line of poverty would be something that we would recognize as being adequate, subject to some variations.

Senator Carter: With reference to the blind persons' allowances and disabled persons' pensions, have any provinces replaced these payments and brought them in under the Canada Assistance Plan?

Dr. Willard: Yes, a number of provinces have taken action, particularly with respect to new cases. There are several provinces where new cases are put right on the general assistance program rather than on disability and blind persons' allowances. Saskatchewan was the first province to shift the existing cases over. The provision under the Canada Assistance Plan is that any individual must not be worse off if changes are made. The case load under the disability allowances program, which is the bigger one, has dropped from 53,000 to about 30,000 in the last few years as a result of this change of policy.

Senator Carter: Why is there a distinction made between new and old cases?

Dr. Willard: It is simpler when new people apply to have them apply under the new program. Since the blind and disabled persons' allowances ceiling has remained at $75 they can be better provided for under the Canada Assistance Plan arrangements. In many cases they could be getting say, $100 or $150, depending upon their particular circumstances.

In some instances where the question of assets makes it more favourable for the person to stay under those programs they remain there.

Senator Carter: Do you mean the means test?

Dr. Willard: Yes under the present means test. There are some instances where it is to their advantage.

Senator Carter: That is what bothers me. Your system now mixes up the means test and a needs test. Surely that is very unfair to some people?

Dr. Willard: The legislative provision was made so that no individual would suffer. The provinces so far have been very careful to respect this. That is why there has not been a sudden shift of all cases. You see, they can leave them under the means test programs up to the maximum of $75 but they could still supplement under a needs test shared under C.A.P. What is really happening is that the provinces are finding out what is the best situation for the individual; they are not just shifting them over automatically.

Senator Carter: There must be savings in administration. There are two points here, because you mentioned about the Canada Assistance Plan being an umbrella. It is being used as one and they are phasing out where they can.

Dr. Willard: The phasing out and the impact that this has upon administration is quite important. As you know, the blind persons and disabled persons allowance legislation is quite complex and there are very lengthy regulations. It means that along with Old age Assistance, we had 36 sets of regulations and when unemployment assistance came along it increased to 48. What we have done is to write to the provinces to advise that where the caseload under the blind or disabled persons allowances becomes very small we will have a person on our staff who is specialized in this field available to work with them on a periodic basis so that they do not have to have any specialized people limited to this area of their total assistance operation.

Senator Carter: Is there a uniform definition of a blind person all across Canada?

Dr. Willard: Yes.

Senator Carter: In every province?

Dr. Willard: Yes.

Senator Carter: What about a disabled person?

Dr. Willard: Well, the test for disability is a little more difficult to administer because there are many different disabling conditions. As you know, in the case of the blind you have one test that is applied by the Rehabilitation Services Division of the department. That division deals with the disability test under the Blind Persons Act, and all of the examinations are carried out by ophthalmologists across Canada. The results of these examinations are sent in and adjudicated, and decisions on eligibility are then made. In the case of disability allowances, assessment under the disability test is in most cases carried out by a team consisting of a provincial doctor, a federal doctor and a welfare officer. In one or two provinces the assessment is done by the provincial doctor first and then sent on for the federal doctor to consider. When one takes into account the many varying kinds of disabling conditions and degrees of disability, one appreciates the difficulty in achieving uniformity. The development of guidelines for assessment, which doctors themselves have worked out to try to get equity of treatment of people in the application of this test have been helpful but nevertheless there is still a variation in the proportion of disabled people across the country. This reflects, in part, the difference in the application of the disability test and I think this is inevitable. It has also happened in the various States of the United States under their permanent and total disability program. However, we have tried to minimize it. The other factors, affecting the numbers and proportions in different provinces are the different income levels within the provinces which have a very direct effect on this matter and the administration of the programs generally.

The Chairman: This paragraph on page 10 may have been overlooked in your brief. I think it deserves to go on the record because it says a great deal. I shall read it as follows:

At the same time, full employment policies failed to solve the problem of poverty. Rapid economic growth generally meant that various areas and groups, both rural and urban, were increasingly left behind by economic progress elsewhere, thus increasing their "relative poverty". Wage levels for relatively unskilled work failed to keep pace with other sectors of the labour force, thus highlighting the phenomenon of the "working poor". The influx of rural residents and immigrants into urban areas created many new problems and pressures, which tended to push vulnerable individuals and families into crisis poverty and long-term dependency. The available structures of health, welfare and educational services and of income support measures (despite changes and improvements) seemed increasingly inadequate to cope with the problems.

I do not think that I have seen it expressed better in any place and I feel it should be on the record. By the way, I do not wish to pass the afternoon without telling you that in reading your brief, one of the things that really gave me a lift was to see what you were doing in the way of having citizens' groups participating. You have demonstration projects and about eight out of 15 are in that line. These activists, in my opinion, in time will build a fire under you even more than we can build. I think that was very good.

In reading your brief, you spoke about preventive services. I think there is only one province that is doing anything at all by way of prevention. It is not really a great expense compared to the amount of money that the province has received under the Canada Assistance Act which they would not have received otherwise. Why didn't more of them invest in that sort of work? Wasn't it attractive to them?

Dr. Willard: I think so, Mr. Chairman. The provinces have been slow to develop their staffs in this area. Federal money did come in on a shared basis. The costs of the program generally increased with increases in the rates of benefit. They have been pushing the rates benefit up partly in response to the inflationary pressure and partly because of the fact that they appreciated the inadequacy of the rates. There was much to be done to improve the benefit rates and this an opportunity was provided when new federal money came in. The fact that federal sharing was provided for on a comprehensive basis for health and welfare services has been important, particularly in the kind of situation where they are needed for a family or for an individual to put a total program together either for rehabilitation or to prevent further breakdown. In some cases, to rehabilitate is to prevent complete breakdown with the result, long-term dependency. I think that the fact that they could bring together comprehensive family health and welfare services has been constructive. I would agree with you that certainly much more needs to be done and I am not sure why there has not been a greater response.

The Chairman: I am going to read from your brief, Page 13, the bottom of the first paragraph:

If an adequate minimum living standard is to be achieved, either sufficient cash payments must be made to large numbers of unemployed persons, or work opportunities must be provided by government serving directly as the "employer of last resort". For those who are long-term dependency cases unable to work, cash income maintenance is the only approach left open. This is the distributive strategy.

You raise a point that is very dear to my heart and dear to the hearts of some members around this table for a long time. The "employer of last resort". Let us talk about that for a few minutes.

Dr. Willard: Mr. Chairman, as I mentioned, you get into the situation where it is a matter of degree. During the depression, the Government ended up as an "employer of last resort". Public works programs were undertaken; federal, provincial and municipal governments entered into them.

Most governments would prefer—whether at the federal, provincial or municipal levels—to see the situation where the private economy generates sufficient employment opportunities. This is generally accepted.

On the other hand, if you reach a situation where you have chronic unemployment, or you have slow growth, the question of government intervention does arise. There are different techniques through which this may be achieved.

The Regional Economic Expansion Department is pursuing efforts in this way. They are not pursuing it in the way of government as employer of last resort but they are pursuing it in a way which endeavours to stimulate and develop the economy in a particular region.

The idea of "employer of last resort" is one tool that, under certain circumstances, may indeed have to be used. Some people who are concerned about the levels of employment and the numbers of people on assistance, would argue that it would be better if the government could give those people jobs and that it would be better for the unemployed if they could do something more constructive. It is generally conceded that as far as the individual is concerned, he would probably prefer to receive his income in this way, the way in which other people in the community on the whole are getting their income.

On the other hand, all the difficulties that were encountered with public works and other direct intervention by government are still there. How do you phase in and phase out public works projects when the economic activity declines and then steps up. How do you have projects of the right kind, size and location on the shelf that are ready to be shoved in at the appropriate time. Nor once you get them going can they be just turned off whenever you want. There is a whole series of problems, that we had to deal with in this country, in the United States and elsewhere, during the 30s, in relation to that.

Therefore, it is little wonder that governments do think of it as a last resort. But it is really the only alternative that is not being used when you get into very high levels of unemployment, other than income maintenance payments.

Income maintenance payments are a somewhat less expensive method. Usually, in public works projects you are concerned with a large kind of expenditure that is more expensive than direct payments. Also, when you get the Government carrying out public works projects you get the Government competing with private industry.

If part of the strategy or part of the purpose is to prime the pump of the economy in a particular region—or in the country as a whole, as it was during the 30s—then it has a dual purpose of an economic as well as social nature.

The Chairman: You know from the record that we have had a considerable amount of evidence before us with respect to the creation of jobs and the expense entailed. We think, of course, the creation of jobs is preferable to anything else that can be done. At the same time, it is expensive. Nevertheless we support your views.

On page 68, in the third paragraph, you refer to something I said earlier. I do not think you disagreed with it, but you say it here. You speak of the National Council of Welfare and you say:

The creation of this Council with its special mandate to seek out the views of the poor reflects an awareness that the social service system, while designed to service those in need, has historically failed to involve the people it sought to serve in the definition of their needs and the development of programs to meet these needs.

What troubles me is, why did it take you so long to come to the conclusion? We knew it at the municipal level, that we had to involve people; we knew it at the provincial level years back. Why has it held back? Why have we not involved people, a long time ago? It was inexpensive. It was not a matter of cost.

Dr. Willard: Mr. Chairman, I think that part of the answer lies in the approach to the establishment of advisory committees. As in the case of many Government departments, the department has followed a standard procedure, of having representatives of labour, management and the professional groups involved. This was the approach the I.L.O. proposed for advisory committees for social insurance. Up to this time the Government has followed this pattern. The National Welfare Council which was set up in 1962, followed the pattern which had been used in the case of the Dominion Council of Health which had been established away back in 1919; it had seemed to work well for health matters. The National Council of Welfare involved the public sector and the private sector—the public sector through the deputy ministers and the private sector through lay people involved in the welfare system, and finally professionals working in the welfare system. This composition grew out of this kind of environment.

The second point is quite important. The kind of problems you get in a federal department such as National Health and Welfare in relation to many of its programs are not at the grass roots, because the provinces in fact are administering those programs. This relates to a program relating to social assistance and welfare services.

Therefore, the tendency has been to think in terms of the national role as one of social policy and general planning and that federal-provincial discussions would be needed to provide the experience of the provinces. The provinces would tell us what their needs and problems were and that input would work through this system. So the tendency in Canada has been to use the federal-provincial mechanism as one of the main inputs to the federal department in terms of how things should be done. Of course, we still continue to use this consultation as the main vehicle because we are in shared cost programs.

But the new dimension really developed more recently in response to, I suppose, changes that have been developing within our society. The Department adjusted its welfare grants program to provide demonstration projects in this area as society seemed to indicate the need for a new types of projects; the Department adjusted the kinds of representation on the National Advisory Council as our society seemed to be demanding a greater input from those that are experiencing first-hand the problems of poverty.

Senator Carter: Along that line, would you say, Dr. Willard, that slowness to involve the poor and the needy, the recipients of welfare, has been in large measure due to the attitude of paternalism which has bedevilled the philosophy behind our welfare system?

Dr. Willard: Mr. Chairman, there may have been an element of this that, over the years, has been experienced in policy development in this field. But I don't think, for instance, that when old age security was brought in the members of Parliament who sat on the joint committee of the House and Senate were particularly paternalistic. They felt that they knew their constituents and that they knew what their needs were; they felt that the means test was unsatisfactory and that, in fact, they were speaking for the people. They reviewed the experience of the old age pension means tested program in Canada and they reviewed the programs in the United States, New Zealand, Australia, Sweden, Switzerland, France and the U.K. They went into them in great depth. Then, following that, they heard briefs from all the major organizations across Canada. They heard no welfare rights groups because there weren't any at that time. I don't think any recipients appeared before that committee to make representations either, but that is the way the world seemed to be under those circumstances. The members of Parliament represented the people, not the disadvantaged or any specific group. They made certain recommendations that Canada should have a flat rate demogrant instead of a means test pension. Subsequently, the Government considered and adopted their recommendation.

Things have changed since then.

The Chairman: In other words, Senator Carter, we have failed miserably in this. How could we have taken it upon ourselves to tell persons on welfare what kind of food they should eat or what kind of clothes they should buy and how much they should spend on food and how much on clothing; but we did. In doing so we deprived them immediately of their liberty. Nevertheless, we sat by while all this was done. I often question myself about it.

Senator Carter: Yes, but it did not dawn on us.

The Chairman: That is the point.

Senator Carter: But why? In fact, it wouldn't have dawned on us even now, if there had not been a general rebellion against this paternalism; and that rebellion is only a recent phenomenon.

The Chairman: We should have been in the front of that rebellion.

Senator Carter: Yes, we should have.

The Chairman: Dr. Willard, in talking about demogrant, and universality, selectivity and income tested benefits, it seems to me that selectivity means discrimination, administrative complexity, minimum flexibility, some paternalism and a definite loss of dignity to the user. That is my own view, with which you may not agree at all; but using that view as a basis, can you tell us in non-technical language what are the advantages and disadvantages of the guaranteed income?

Dr. Willard: Let us take the guaranteed income supplement as a sample and look at that. There was an advantage there, in that for a given allocation of resources you could get more money to the people who needed it, whereas, if you had given that same amount of money in a demogrant, it would have been dissipated throughout the whole system. That is an obvious advantage. Secondly, once you leave the demogrant and go to an eligibility test, the question is whether you can get a test that minimizes the problem of stigma, of dealing with some differently from the rest.

Here you get into a whole range of arguments. Some people will argue in favour of the income test which, as it is applied under that program, is relatively simple. It is based on the income tax, but it is set out in very simple form. But it does not ask any more of a poor individual than of the well-to-do person who is filing an income tax. Therefore, in terms of stigma, it should be as acceptable to the poor person as it is to the rich person to provide that information.

On this basis the test is considered to be more acceptable than either the means test or the needs test. First of all, the means test and needs test do require more detailed information and investigation; and, secondly, those in the society that have to provide this kind of information in the case of the means and needs test would be only the disadvantaged, the low-income people, whereas in the case of the income test, the kind of information supplied would apply to well-to-do as well as to poor people.

One concern that some people have is that when you apply this income test approach to a total system you end up having a whole section of the society that must get its income support through this kind of system. They ask the question: will the people who get an income-tested benefit feel any different from the people on assistance? Will they feel that it is only low income groups which receive guaranteed payment cheques associated with low income? Will they in turn feel that some kind of stigma is attached to these payments which will in time separate the poor from those who are not poor within our society? This is a sociological question that some people pose.

When the guaranteed income supplement was brought into the House of Commons, there were some who said that it was just a disguised means test. There is this feeling that an income test is not Simon pure and certainly cannot be taken as an alternative for the demogrant. On the other hand, you get to the question of cost; obviously, if you have to compromise because of cost and you have to institute a test it is better to have an income test than a means or needs test. If you want to have social solidarity and togetherness, the demogrant is the best choice. If you cannot afford that much social solidarity and you want greater adequacy of benefit, then the income test is better than the means test or the needs test.

The question as to the of benefit and how to determine it, is, of course, one of the basic problems of the guaranteed income supplement or the guaranteed annual income, and how do you do this in a country such as Canada? Then if you develop techniques for determining a poverty line, you get back to the question of who is above the poverty line and who is not. But if you have to say "this is to be your income floor" as is the case with the G.I.S., the question then is what about those who because of individual circumstances it is insufficient or those who are in areas of very high cost as compared to others and who do not fit into the general standard. This general level that has been drawn where there are no special circumstances and where a high cost area is not involved. In other words, you can have insufficient benefit for some and adequate benefit for others. It is conceivable that you can think of many people whose income, under the guaranteed income supplement, because of special circumstances or because there are living in a high cost area in Canada, would be absolutely insufficient while for other people in other circumstances and other areas it would be quite adequate, and they could get along very nicely. You are forced to the conclusion that if you are going to have to draw up a line, then you will have to determine whether the line is going to be an average that leaves some people inadequate benefit while it takes care of the others satisfactorily. You have to decide whether you are going to keep that line moving so that the proportion of people that find it inadequate never becomes too large. In any case, once that line is drawn, you face the difference between the average, as it were, that has been determined for the income support level for the covered population as a whole as compared with the individual circumstances where it is inadequate. At that point you need some kind of system to take care of the individual needs. You need something not only to take care of the shortfall that may not be provided for under the general G.I.S. system, but you also need to take some kind of system that takes into account not just cash benefit but services as well. This is where the Canada Assistance Plan approach, if it is given support as a supplementary benefit by the provinces, would solve this problem. You could adjust G.I.S. on a regular basis to make sure that you minimize the number of people for whom it is inadequate and taper off through supplementation with the needs test assistance program.

The Chairman: But surely, in principle, without talking about adequacy, the four most successful programs on the Canadian scene today are the old age security program, family allowances, unemployment insurance and the Canada Pension Plan. And they operate all across the board. Now some people may keen a little more while others keen a little less, but nevertheless these have been the most successful programs, broadly speaking, that we have. It seems to me that we are thinking of retreating from that principle. I do not mean you, but in the general discussion it seems that we are thinking of abandoning from that principle. Maybe I am an old fogey and hanging on to something that belongs to yesterday, but I have a hard time abandoning that principle.

Dr. Willard: Those are some of the points. I can mention some others; there is the problem of integration, but I think that can be solved. We have integrated the G.I.S., and it becomes, as it were, a supplement to old age security. The big question and one where difficulties arise is this; should you cut back existing programs in order to generate funds with which to finance the income tested type of plan. For instance, if you said in the case of the G.I.S. "we are going to get some of the money to finance this by cutting back or eliminating old age security" you would have the problem of people who had contributed to that program saying "I contributed so much to this fund; it was taken off my personal income tax each year for the last ten years or so and I have counted on it for my retirement." A lot of people say "close out all the existing social security programs; there are so many billions of dollars now being spent on them and out of that one can finance a guaranteed annual income plan."

The Chairman: Not me. I have never said that, and I have never heard that sentiment expressed around this table.

Dr. Willard: The guaranteed income supplement in respect to old age security really posed the Government with that decision. Another problem you have to face is the question of incentives. For some of the people who are working and who are covered under G.I.S., the question comes up—what should be done for part-time earnings or full-time earnings? Full-time earnings would, of course, put them out of coverage; but for part-time earnings should every $2 of income be reduced by $1 in benefit or should every $3 of income be reduced by $1 in benefit or should it be dollar for dollar? In other words, if we do not have a progressive scale which provides for an incentive for part time employment we lose a lot.

The Chairman: I am with Mr. Stanfield.

Dr. Willard: If we had this type of program applied down at the level where the great bulk of the population is involved in the labour force, the question of incentives would become crucial. Here is where you have the arguments pro and con. Some say that the effect on incentives would be a serious one, others argue to the contrary. There are jurisdictional questions, administrative aspects, and the question of acceptability by the population generally

It is a change in the whole ball game in terms of the approach to income support. Some find it very hard to see how working poor would get income except through the guaranteed annual income. Some argue that over time, with the pressure of cybernetics, the views of people who now oppose might change. The level of acceptability at this point is an area of controversy. It is asserted by some that the present assistance program is too generous; those with this view would believe the guaranteed income approach to be even more generous.

The Chairman: Through our experience, yours, Senator Carter's, mine, and that of others, we have always heard this. When the Old Age Security was increased from $40 we heard it, and a couple of years later this assistance was not enough. We have somehow or another been able to survive this.

At the bottom of page 44 of your brief it is stated:

...to encourage the recognition of assistance as a right, under specified statutory conditions, and to remove any barriers in the form of provincial residence requirements.

Does the federal Government say that where the provinces in their judgment subsidize or assist a man who is working part or full time it is his right?

Dr. Willard: Yes, he is likely to be in need if he does not receive this support. The act says either in need or likely to be in need. This is a case where he is likely to be in need.

The Chairman: He is earning $50 less than he would have received on assistance. They say keep your job and we will make this up for you and you may keep a certain percentage, of anything you earn above that figure. If they do that they are on all fours with the act, need or likely need.

Dr. Willard: The important point is that under previous legislation we had no right of appeal. Now we have agreements with the provinces which indicate they will carry out this particular policy to persons who are applicants or occupants for assistance. They have agreed to establish appeals machinery for occasions when the applicant does not obtain the social assistance to which he feels he is entitled. That is a key point in making it a right. If there were no right of appeal then, of course, the decision of the bureaucrat would be final.

The Chairman: Judging from our experience and what we have been told, that right of appeal is the most useless right a man ever had. We could not find a single case where it had been exercised. In Ontario, for instance, there is a right of appeal, but it takes three months. They never heard about it in British Columbia, Manitoba or any of the other places. When I mentioned it in Quebec they thought I was speaking a third language; they did not know what I was talking about.

It is there and it is a very important right, but why does not someone, who is a signaling to the agreement make sure that there will be an appeal?

Dr. Willard: This has been an area of considerable concern to us. We have written to the provincial deputy ministers and have discussed this provision of the legislation and the agreement under it. We have made it the subject of discussion at Federal-Provincial Conferences. The appeals procedure in each province has been analysed in a document for study. This has been circulated to the provinces asking for their comments. In one province after another the appeal machinery is being changed and developed. In some instances the subject has been a matter of discussion and very hot debate in the provincial legislatures. We hope that through this continued process of federal-provincial consultation, plus the concern displayed by welfare rights organizations and the normal attention that legislatures apply to this matter, we will see the appeal mechanism provision fully effective. Its development has been slow, but we do feel confident that it is moving ahead. We have done everything we can within the context of our federal-provincial relationships to press very hard in this connection. The organizations of assistance recipients have played a very important role by bringing this matter to the attention of their members and informing them of their rights.

These organizations have also been useful with regard to the residence requirements. These are matters in which the people affected are helping themselves in ensuring their entitlement.

The Chairman: The lack of information on the part of people who need assistance is amazing. Very little is forthcoming at the provincial offices. It is a very important point, but I do not suggest that you write each of the provinces a letter, for fear that Mr. Kierans would have to deliver it; we cannot wait for that. But, we have now Information Canada. That is the kind of information that has to get down to the people. You have got to get a booklet out to every one of these people. It is a duty you have to tell the people and let them know what their rates are. It is the only valve you have. Here is an opportunity to really let these people know that there is nothing to hide and what we want to do what is right.

Dr. Willard: Mr. Chairman, we are planning a booklet on the Canada Assistance Plan, as you have suggested. We have probably been slow in getting on with it and this is partly because we have operated under the old approach. With regard to provincial-federal relations, after a federal law was passed it is up to the provinces to carry out their provincial law which applies to their residents. We believe that we should at least make known the federal law so that the undertakings of a province in relation to the Canada Assistance Plan will be known to more people than is the case now, and this includes people who are on assistance.

Senator Carter: Are these provincial-federal agreements for the Canada Assistance Plan secret or public?

Dr. Willard: No, they are tabled from time to time in the House of Commons whenever they are asked for.

Senator Carter: I tried very hard to get hold of one in the other house but I did not have too much success.

The Chairman: There is not very much that has escaped you in the other house, Senator Carter.

Dr. Willard, there are a couple of friends of yours associated with welfare who just could not be here today. They wanted to have an opportunity to talk with you about this on Thursday. You have been very helpful this morning and we would like you to come back. I am going to tell you how much we appreciate this excellent brief that has been put together and your approach as well as your thoughtfulness and information that has been available. It helps us in a task that isn't easy. We have got to ask you to come back once again.

Dr. Willard: We will be very pleased to return and perhaps we can talk about some of the Department's health programs.

Senator Carter: Mr. Chairman, is it planned that Dr. Willard will be back here on Thursday?

The Chairman: Yes.

Senator Carter: Then we will continue where we left off.

The Chairman: Whatever you wish.

Senator Carter: I have some questions.

The Chairman: Please save them.

Senator Carter: Before we leave, for the sake of the record, there is one matter which I would like to bring up. You called attention earlier to page 31 and you read a paragraph. You put some figures on the record and said that the gross national product was 11.9 billion in 1946 against 71.5 billion in 1968 and then you drew a comparison with the welfare services. I think the comparison you made at that time would have been misleading, because if we convert $46 up to $68, which is easier, we would have somewhere between $24 billion and $25 billion in 1946 as compared with $71 billion for the GNP in 1968. On page 18 the total expenditures—not back to 1946—from 1959 to 1969 have gone from $1.4 billion to $3.2 billion.

The Chairman: I read these figures. You mean the deductions were not correct, or my conclusions were bad?

Senator Carter: I do not think the conclusions were bad, because no conclusion was made, as I understand it. There was just a comparison which I thought could be misleading. You say we have gone from $11.9 billion to $71.5 billion and I think the next comparison was that Family Allowance has gone up only 15 per cent as against...

The Chairman: No. I said the last GNP had gone from $11.9 billion to $71.5 billion, and the weekly wages rose from 32. The cost of living had gone up 111 per cent, but Family Allowance only went up 15 per cent. What I was trying to say was that these social services were not receiving their proper proportion of the wealth and growth of the economy.

Senator Carter: I think that is wrong. Page 18 shows that the total growth in expenditures of all programs from 1959 to 1969 has more than doubled in the last 10 years. They have probably quadrupled since 1946. In other words, the total increase of social security payments have been more than the growth in GNP. That is the point I am trying to make.

Dr. Willard: Perhaps Table 3 on page 20 would reinforce your point as to how the amount that applies to these different programs is measured. The GNP has risen from 8.5 in 1959-60 to 10.6 in 1968-69. I think the point is that family allowances did not get the increase in expenditures. It went into other plans, such as hospital insurance.

The Chairman: Fine.

Senator Carter: I think we want to be fair. It would have been misleading. I did not think the comparison would carry through.

The Chairman: Quite right. Thank you very much.

The committee adjourned.

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Thursday, February 26, 1970.

The Special Senate Committee on Poverty met this day at 9.30 a.m.

Senator David A. Croll (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, I call the meeting to order. Our witness this morning is the Deputy Minister, Dr. J. W. Willard. Just before we finished last week Senator Carter asked Dr. Willard a question to which he has the answer today. Would you care to answer that now, Dr. Willard?

Dr. J. W. Willard, Deputy Minister, Department of National Health and Welfare: Mr. Chairman, honourable senators, just when we broke up at our last session Senator Carter asked if we had any information in respect of social security expenditures in Canada as compared with other countries. We have in the course of preparation a document that will be released very shortly. We would be glad to make it available to the committee as soon as it is published. It is entitled "A Comparison of Social Security Expenditures in Canada, Australia, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States for the Fiscal Years 1961-62 to 1966-67 Inclusive."

Senator Carter: With the exception of the United States, those are all Commonwealth countries.

Dr. Willard: That is correct. The reason we selected these particular countries to make a comparison was owing to the fact that the nature of the social security system in each of them is quite similar to the Canadian system.

Thus, those countries lend themselves to the comparison much more readily than other countries with different systems. Another reason is that the data we are able to analyse is more readily available from them.

The other type of international comparison that is carried out from time to time is done by the International Labour Organization. The Department contributes expenditure data to that Organization on behalf of Canada and they put out a book that compares most industrial countries, showing the relationship of these expenditures to a measure such as the gross national product.

One of the difficulties with such comparisons in the case of Canada is that they are usually quite a few years behind in the last year reported and that is because of the lag in getting information. In the case of Canada we have some lag in the time it takes to get information from provincial and municipal levels in order to show the total expenditure for Canada; and, of course, it is even more complicated when it comes to other countries.

The result of this problem is that the 1966-67 expenditures in these five countries, if we take them as a percentage of gross national product, are much less favourable to Canada in fact than they appear in the comparison today because Canadian programs have been expanding and new programs have been undertaken in comparison with developments in these other countries.

The introduction of the Canada Pension Plan in 1965, the Canada Assistance Plan, the Medical Care Insurance Act and the Guaranteed Income Supplement in 1966, to mention some of the main ones, all have had an impact on the Canadian situation.

Taking a historical perspective on these figures, Canada has always been in a middle position in relation to the five countries. New Zealand has been at the top for most years with the United Kingdom second, although in the last few years this order has been reversed. Canada has been third, Australia fourth and the United States fifth.

The ratio of expenditure to G.N.P. in 1966-67 was in the case of the United Kingdom 11.6 per cent, New Zealand 11.1, and Canada 9.1, Australia 7.8 and the United States 7.8.

Senator Carter, you referred on Tuesday last to a table that dealt with these expenditures in Canada and pointed out the fact that the percentage in relation to G.N.P. is increasing. This was at page 20 of the brief. You pointed out that the Canadian figure for 1968-69 is 10.6. Historically in the case of Canada the percentage has been rising. In the case of New Zealand in recent years it has been dropping. If we go back to 1961-62 we see that New Zealand had 12.4 per cent and that this has now dropped to 11.1 per cent in 1966-67. The United Kingdom was 10.1 per cent and is now up to 10.6 in the same years. Canada was 9.6 in 1961-62, but in 1966-67 it was down slightly to 9.1. However, as you can see in the table on page 20 we are now at 10.6. Part of the reason for that is the fact that the New Zealand and United Kingdom have mature social security systems in the sense that they are comprehensive; for many years now they have included medical care, hospital care and public health services generally. As Canada has built up more sectors of the social security system with further public programs, naturally you would expect the percentage to rise.

Senator Carter: Could I ask two questions arising out of that? You omitted the figures for Sweden in your table. Is this because the statistics from Sweden are not conducive to a good comparison?

Dr. Willard: We could obtain those statistics on Sweden from the ILO publications, if you like, senator, and make them available to you.

Senator Carter: And I gather that in the figures you have used the Gross National Product as the base.

Dr. Willard: Yes.

Senator Carter: Would there be much difference if you had used the total budgetary expenditures as a base?

Dr. Willard: Yes.

Senator Carter: Because the Gross National Product varies with inflationary tendencies in different countries.

Dr. Willard: I think the Gross National Product is a better measure by and large because what is included in total budgetary expenditures may vary considerably from country to country. If one country has a very high military expenditure and another one has not, this would have a very significant effect on the relative importance of the sectors in the comparison, whereas the Gross National Product is the best measure we have of the general output of goods and services in any particular year in each country and thus you can relate a level of expenditure in a particular sector such as social security to it.

Senator Carter: Mr. Chairman, today we are supposed to deal mostly with health matters, but there are a few questions left over from what we were discussing on Tuesday, and I wondered if I might ask them now.

The Chairman: Certainly, go right ahead.

Senator Carter: Dr. Willard, coming back to our discussions on Tuesday, I asked you what you saw in the future and I gathered from your answer that you did not see a great deal of consolidation, although some provinces are now consolidating blind persons' allowances and disabled persons' allowances under the Canada Assistance Plan. Yet, I gather from your remarks that that could not be carried a great deal further. Was that a correct interpretation of your remarks?

Dr. Willard: Perhaps I could put it this way; within the social assistance area where social assistance techniques are used, the Canada Assistance Plan was developed with a view to co-ordinating and bringing together one system of social assistance, and this objective is being pursued so that gradually the blind persons' allowances and the disabled persons' allowances are being phased out. As I mentioned on Tuesday, the case-load has already dropped very considerably in both programs. The Old Age Assistance program was phased out in effect as of January this year when old age security became available at age 65. Therefore, except for a few cases where there might be some difference in residence requirements between old age assistance and old age security, for all intents and purposes old age assistance has been phased out. So, within the area where this is the technique used to provide income support to people, we are trying to have an integrated, co-ordinated, unified approach.

Now when you consider the broad field of social security, social assistance is just one technique. I mentioned to Senator Inman when she asked about family allowances that it depends on what the objectives are, and that these affect the techniques to be used in the future as well as the techniques that have been used in the past. For example, when family allowances were introduced in 1944, there was a number of socio-economic objectives. One of the social objectives was the fact that wages do not compensate for children, and there was a desire to provide compensation for children in a way that would be particularly helpful to larger families and to people in lower income groups on the minimum wage and just above. Such a program would be particularly helpful to the social assistance system because people with children would receive these allowances whether they were on assistance or working and any change of this status would not affect them. Now this was one of the social objectives. I think Marsh referred to it as "the key to consistency" in terms of how family allowances related to the social security system as a whole.

One of the general social objectives was that there should be income redistribution in favour of all children within the population up to a given age, and that wage earners that had to support children and as a result had an additional load should be compensated as compared to single persons or married couples who did not have children. This was pointed out very clearly in the statistics quoted in Parliament by the Prime Minister of the day, Mr. Mackenzie King. In other words, the objective here was to try to redistribute income in favour of all children. This was comparable to the system of education we have in Canada, where all children have free education at the primary and secondary levels. This is paid for through municipal and provincial taxes, but there is no differentiation in terms of the burden cost and, naturally, single and married couples without children pay disproportionately more at a given level of income to support these payments on behalf of children. This was one of the main social objectives at that time.

If it were decided not to redistribute income in favour of all children, but to redistribute income in favour of children of low-income families, then you have a completely different social objective, and then you have to employ a completely different technique. You have to switch from a demogrant technique, which is the family allowance program we have now, to an income tested technique, which is similar to the guaranteed income supplement.

What happened in the case of Old Age Security? Here was a demogrant that came about through a certain social objective formulated by a joint parliamentary committee in 1950. The proposition then was that everybody should receive this flat rate benefit at a given age; a great deal of emphasis was placed on the fact it was universal. It was recognized that people of higher income groups would have part of the demogrant back in taxes. It was recognized that people of higher income groups throughout their working years probably would pay a disproportionately large share towards the financing of the program. It was intended, when came time for the benefit to be paid, that nobody be discriminated against and that everybody should receive the benefit. In other words, it was very clear what the social objective was at that time.

When the Senate Committee on Aging discussed the question of income support for the aged, it decided in 1966 that the social objective should not be universality; that the demogrant technique should not be used; but, rather, that a guaranteed income supplement approach, using an income test, was the technique that should be used.

What was the difference? Why did we have different social objectives in these two situations? Well, the two main factors were a difference in social priorities and a difference in financial capacity. For instance, in the case of the situation in 1950 there was no decision at that time to pursue hospital insurance or medical care and to do many of the other things that have been done since with regard to federal expenditure. Therefore, it was considered that a $40 a month demogrant was within the financial capacity of the government of the day. But when the Senate Committee on Aging considered the matter, the universal pension was by that time already up to a level of $75, and the tremendous cost involved in a pension of that level had to be weighed against other things that were under consideration at the same time. The fact the Canada Pension Plan had been introduced meant an additional levy on the wage earners across the country for old age and survivors' and disability insurance, the fact it was planned to proceed with a medical care program, and the fact it was planned to implement a new approach to social assistance under the Canada Assistance Programs had to be taken into account.

So, a different set of social priorities came out of the situation where there were other social programs that were considered important at the time. They had priority over moving ahead with a higher demogrant in the field of the aged, and the financial situation was such that a choice had to be made.

Thus, when you look to the future, the kind of decisions that have to be made in the allocation of resources relate to the overall questions of government expenditures—in the case of the federal Government, how much is being allocated to post-secondary education, how much is being allocated to regional economic expansion, and how much to the wide variety of other activities of the federal Government. How much is being allocated to the social security sector, and, within the social security sector, what is the best allocation of the funds?

Senator Carter: I want to develop questions on the social objective that Dr. Willard has referred to, but I want to get off the track I am on. I am thinking in terms of the Canada Assistance Plan. Our thinking is geared to poverty in this committee, and we are wondering about the best way of going about allocating the resources we have. We are thinking in terms of guaranteed annual income, or income tax relief, or some device like that, which would take in a large section, particularly of those not in the labour market. Then there are welfare service which the old people particularly must have and which we think everybody in poverty should have below a certain level. Then, as you pointed out, we need a sort of catch-all to make up for the extra assistance you cannot provide for under any rigid system.

I, for one, was hoping that with a three-part package like that we could pretty well cover the social needs of the people who need them most, the people we regard as being below the poverty level; but I gather from what you have said that it all depends on what our social objectives are and how they change.

Before going on to the social objectives that you mentioned, I would point out that you did not give us any figures. We have figures as to how the Canada Assistance Plan is being used by the various provinces, but I am wondering if it is possible to know how much is being devoted to income maintenance. That is just financial assistance. How much would you allocate for welfare services and health services. I think you told us that some provinces are using the Canada Assistance Plan to supplement the wage of the working poor. I wonder if we could have a breakdown under those three headings?

Dr. Willard: Mr. Chairman, I have some figures here on the estimated federal expenditures under the Canada Assistance Plan for the year 1969-70. This is what they are: financial aid, long and short term, $288 million.

Senator Carter: What about health and welfare?

Dr. Willard: In the services sector we have Adult Institutions, $49,200,000; Children's Institutions, $33,400,000; Child Welfare, $35,300,000; Health Care, $22,800,000; Welfare Services, $28,900,000, for a total of $169,600,000.

Then there are some miscellaneous items: under the unemployment assistance program in the case of Quebec, there is $14 million; Indian welfare support in Ontario, $2,400,000; and work activity projects, $2 million. This makes a grand total of $476 million.

Senator Carter: $476 million altogether?

Dr. Willard: That is just the federal share. With provincial expenditure it would be double that. Taking the two big items, you have $288 million for financial aid, and about $170 million for services.

Senator Carter: Yes. You do not have any figures as to the assistance to the working poor?

Dr. Willard: No, I am sorry, we do not have that, although I would like to say a word or two about it, particularly to clarify what I said on Tuesday. I think when I was referring to people likely to be in need I may have made reference to this in the context of assistance payments, whereas the act restricts this to an area of welfare services.

The main thrust of the social assistance technique is to assist those in need who do not have the normal flow of income, either because they are unemployed or because they are unable to work. It is not a technique that effectively reaches the working poor. I think it is fair to say that—although I am sure it could be argued because there are different points of view on this point. The Canada Assistance Plan provides for the sharing of cash benefits for a person who by reason of inability to obtain employment, loss of the principal provider, illness, disability, age or other cause acceptable to a province is found, on the basis of a needs test, to be unable to provide adequately for himself, or for himself and his dependents, or any of them.

Now, the CAP can share in costs to help the person who is in and out of employment. Because during these periods of unemployment the loss of income has resulted in his being in need he gets assistance payments. But where the cause is not unemployment, illness, disability, or loss of the bread winner, the federal act gives broad latitude to the provinces by indicating that other causes acceptable to a province can justify the providing for the basic requirements through a needs test. This permits aid to part-time workers and very low income workers who nevertheless are in need as much as people on assistance and who have no other source of income.

CAP can also share in the cost of services to persons who are likely to be in need or who are likely to become assistance recipients, unless such services are provided.

I would say that the needs test approach does not readily led itself to application to the working poor, that is, as the vehicle of income support to those employed on a regular basis at low wages. It is at this point the minimum wages becomes of vital importance for low income workers who are single or married couples. It is at this point that the level of the minimum wage and of family allowances becomes of vital importance for low income workers who have children. Apart from the minimum wage and family allowance demogrants the only other technique that effectively reaches the working poor is some type of income-tested benefit.

Senator Carter: After listening to the statement that you read—and I do not know whether it was from the act itself, or whether it was an interpretation of the act—it seemed to me to be a bit ambiguous. One part seemed to indicate that there are payments made to a person who is steadily employed even though his wages are not enough to support him, but then you got into the area where the province can make up any definition it wants in order to make use of that act.

Dr. Willard: I think, Mr. Chairman, that is a fair observation with regard to the question of assistance payments which are designed to meet the basic requirements of a person in need. Where it is a situation other than inability to obtain employment, illness, or disability it does depend on that section of the act which says "or other cause of any kind acceptable to the provincial authority".

Senator Carter: Yes.

Dr. Willard: So that is the section where, in a sense, the federal act passes the decision over to the province, and that is the area where, apart from services, the question of compensation to low income workers would arise.

Senator Carter: Yes. Well, some provinces are using that, are they not?

The Chairman: Yes, there are four provinces using it now. As a matter of fact, it is being used very effectively in New Brunswick, and that is not one of the richer provinces.

Senator Carter: Could you mention some of the other provinces who are using it? I suppose the poorer provinces are the ones that are using it, but can we assume that the others are not?

The Chairman: I think it is the three western provinces.

Dr. Willard: I wonder if you could answer that question, Mr. Cragg?

Mr. N. F. Cragg, Director, Canada Assistance Plan, Department of National Health and Welfare: In addition to New Brunswick, Alberta is the province which makes the most effective use of it, and Nova Scotia and Newfoundland as well. Very limited use is made of this provision in Quebec, Saskatchewan, and British Columbia.

The Chairman: Manitoba?

Mr. Cragg: I do not believe so.

Senator Carter: There is only one rich province among those three. It seems that the poor provinces are taking advantage of this, the ones that cannot afford it; the ones that can afford it are not doing it. How do you explain that?

Dr. Willard: Mr. Chairman, the table comparing minimum wage rates and provincial assistance rates for a four-person family has been circulated. This was a matter which came up yesterday. At that time I mentioned that the big problem arises with regard to adequate provision of assistance where you have a number of children in the family. To give them adequate support certainly you are going to push above the minimum wage rate. Here we have taken a situation where it is not a particularly large family, but four persons. That could be man and wife with two children. Even this comparison is bound to raise difficulties and to place assistance rates in some provinces above the minimum wage rates.

I also mentioned yesterday that the provincial assistance rates shown are, of course, the maximum. It would not necessarily mean that everybody on assistance would be receiving these rates. Comparing those who are getting the maximum benefits with those who are receiving minimum wage rates on an annual basis, in the case of some of the provinces the assistance provision is higher. Prince Edward Island, Manitoba and Ontario are examples. In the case of the average for Canada, the amount of annual income through assistance is slightly higher than the minimum wage. In the case of families with five, six or even more children, of course, the minimum wage rates appear less and less adequate.

The Chairman: Some of the figures in this table are somewhat surprising. In British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Quebec the allowance is less than the minimum wage. It is hard to believe, but in Nova Scotia it is also less than the minimum wage. The average is just about equal to the minimum wage, with an allowance of $2,676 as against $2,600 at the minimum annual wage.

Dr. Willard: Mr. Chairman, I mislead you with regard to that. The Canada figure is not an average; it includes Old Age Security and the income supplement. The total is compared with the federal minimum wage.

The Chairman: That is $1.50.

Dr. Willard: No, $1.25.

The Chairman: One thing has been bothering this committee: we are told that Ontario has prohibited the use of other causes by way of a supplement in their regulations.

Mr. Cragg: I do not know that you can put it that way, that they have actually prohibited it. They have not included other causes in the reasons for assistance.

The Chairman: I understood, Mr. Cragg, that the regulations prohibit it. I have not seen the regulations, but someone has told us this. Perhaps they have not even shown them to you?

Mr. Cragg: We can check that out.

Senator Carter: Would matters such as that have to be included in the agreement with the province?

Dr. Willard: Not a specific matter such as this; it is a general agreement.

Senator Carter: You referred to the fact that everything would depend on our social objectives, then you discussed family allowances. It is indicated at page 18 that family allowances in 1959, that is ten years ago, were $491,214,000. When you make allowance for inflation of roughly one-third, that is ten years at 3 per cent per year, it would result in $655 million, or roughly $650 million for 1968-69. Therefore we are spending less on family allowances today, in proportion, than we were spending ten years ago.

Have our social objectives changed? When was the last increase in family allowance?

Dr. Willard: Mr. Chairman, the increases have tended to result from a consolidation of rates. You will remember that when the legislation was first introduced rates were $5, $6, $7 and $8 per month, depending on age. They are now $6 and $8 per month. The $5 rate has disappeared and every child up to age ten is now entitled to $6 per month. From age ten to 15 years, inclusive, it is $8 per month. Then the youth allowance is $10 per month. The main extensions have been through this upward shift in rates through consolidation and through the introduction of youth allowances, which are shown as a separate item in the table.

Senator Carter: But it does not really make that much difference. You only have $52 million to add to it, so it still would not bring it up. The number has increased over the ten-year period. The number of children receiving family allowances in 1968-69 must be far more than in 1959-60, ten years ago, yet you are spending less money. Even adding the youth allowances you are still spending less money in proportion. What has happened to the social objectives? Have they changed? Have we lost them?

Dr. Willard: Throughout the period the governments of the day have kept the same social objective because they have left the legislation on the statute books as a demogrant, but their priorities appear to have changed. For example, they have given greater priority to old age income security. Whereas at the time family allowances were introduced old age security was operating at a level of about $30 a month, it is now at $75 a month. You will recall that the $30 a month was on a means test basis, so that it was available only to about 46 per cent of the eligible age group which at that time was for people 70 years of age and over.

What priorities have been given to old age security? First of all, the age has been lowered from 70 to 65, which has increased the cost enormously. Secondly, the benefit has been increased from a level of about $30 to $75. Thirdly, the means test has been completely removed and it has been made a demogrant. Fourthly, a guaranteed income supplement has been placed on top, which raises the level of benefit at the present time to a maximum of about $111. Fifthly, supplementation on a shared basis with the provinces for anybody who finds that level insufficient is provided under the Canada Assistance Plan.

Over this period of time governments have, in their priorities, shows a definite emphasis in favour of income support for senior citizens of Canada as compared with allowances for families. It can be argued, I think rightly, that the provision for old age security was inadequate at the time family allowances were introduced, and that a lot of what has happened has been an effort to get old age security into a proper balance in the total system. However, throughout the period governments have apparently left the social objective for family allowances the same; in other words, that it should be a universal payment. On the other hand, they have given it a much lower social and financial priority and have decided that many other facets of the social security system should be developed. In this process certain programs have not kept up relatively, and family allowances is one of them. In other words, funds have been put into hospital insurance, medical care insurance, a new co-ordinated approach to social assistance, as well as greatly expanded provision for the aged.

Senator Carter: This is what puzzles me. Family allowance filled a very great need, and I think this piece of legislation was one of the most useful for poor families, for families at or just below the poverty level. The family allowance income received by the mother was a real factor, not only in getting the child properly clothed, but properly fed. It therefore ties in with your health objectives. What you are saying is that we have downgraded it a bit because old age security should have a higher priority. To me that does not seem logical. Surely the children are really the resources we should be concentrating on, yet now, compared with ten years ago, the impact of family allowances on the family income is almost insignificant, and the figures in your table tell the story.

Dr. Willard: Not only the figures in the table, but the place in the text where we refer to family allowances. On page 31 we bring out very clearly that relative to the increase in the cost of living and to the growth in the gross national product family allowances have very definitely fallen behind.

Senator Carter: I have a question on health, but I will put that later.

Senator Fergusson: I am sorry I was unable to be present on Tuesday, as I had to be out of town. I have not yet had an opportunity to read the minutes, so if I ask any questions that have already been answered please tell me so. One of the things in which I am particularly interested is the subject of school dropouts. The committee has asked many witnesses their ideas about this, and whether these children leave school to help the finances of their families. I was interested to learn last night that the Department of Justice, under the Solicitor General, is carrying out a small survey in Moncton to try to discover why there are dropouts, because it is thought that this also leads to juvenile delinquency. How effective do you think youth allowances have been in keeping children at school?

Dr. Willard: It is difficult to give any very satisfactory answer to that question. One of the problems is that the cost of maintaining the youth allowance at $120 a year is very considerable indeed. The difficulty, of course, is the one Senator Carter has been referring to in the case of family allowances. Even since youth allowances were introduced the cost of living has gone up substantially. The stage at which the added income support to a family would make the difference between a youth in that family being able to carry on in school or alternatively going out to take work would, I think, vary tremendously from one family situation to another. But, I would think the main help that Youth Allowance gives at the present time is that it adds one more increment to a total family income, along with Family Allowances. I indicated on Tuesday that the main assistance that Family and Youth Allowances is providing at the present time is for low income families with large numbers of children. In the situation where you have a family with an income that is below the minimum wage, or at or near the minimum wage and where you have seven, eight or nine or more children, the added increment is very important to the family in terms of its proportion of the total income. You can figure this arithmetic out very quickly and demonstrate that it is very significant in regard to their resources. However, even in that situation, whether or not it would make the difference between a youth attending school depends upon the family situation.

Senator Fergusson: Dr. Willard, this was the objection of putting in these allowances. What I mean, do you feel that they have been effective in keeping children from dropping out of school?

Dr. Willard: Mr. Chairman, if you are thinking in terms of surveys of families designed to find out whether, in fact, it made the difference, we have not conducted such surveys so that I cannot give any quantitative answer. It would be my impression that at the time the legislation was introduced in the case of low income families with large numbers of children this would be a particularly important increment to the family and could indeed have made the difference between children carrying on in school or not.

Senator Carter: Is there a cut-off stage for Youth Allowances?

Dr. Willard: Yes, at 18. It is paid for youth who are 16 or 17 years of age, provided that they are at school or if they are disabled and cannot attend school.

Senator Fergusson: Would you or any of the members of your department know if the research projects of the Canadian Welfare Council which had to do with school performance in public assistance families—there are two such projects mentioned on pages A65 and A66—would have anything to do with the drop-outs? I have not read them, but I noticed the projects that you mentioned.

Dr. Willard: I wonder if Mr. Iverson would want to comment on that.

Mr. B. J. Iverson, Director, Welfare Grants, Department of National Health and Welfare: Mr. Chairman, the one study which was undertaken by the Canadian Welfare Council on school performance of children of public assistance families did, I believe, reach the conclusion (which we might have suspected before) that there is a differential performance between children in those families and those in the general population. I am not able to give Senator Fergusson a detailed report today, but I would be happy to table a copy of the final report of the committee, if that is acceptable.

Senator Fergusson: My reason for feeling that this is important, and we have learned this in the committee, that lack of education is one of the basic reasons for poverty and for children dropping out of school and not getting their education and training. I want to know whether the efforts we have made by supplying Youth Allowances is preventing this drop-out or not.

Dr. Willard: Mr. Chairman, we do have the statistical information. Eighty-one per cent of the youth that are in this age group—16 and 17—are covered by the federal Youth Allowances Program. In my opinion, that is a high percentage compared to past years. It would be indicative of a number of factors, of which I feel that Youth Allowances could be one.

The Chairman: Senator Fergusson, Mr. Iverson said he would table that for you.

Senator Fergusson: If you will give us a copy for the committee I think that will be fine. Thank you, Mr. Iverson.

I think that I got lost when Senator Carter and Mr. Cragg were discussing the Canada Assistance Plan. I thought that I understood Mr. Cragg to say that only four provinces had entered the agreement, but on page 44 it says:

Agreements relating to work activity projects have been signed with seven provinces.

Maybe I am referring to something different.

Dr. Willard: Mr. Chairman, earlier the point that was being brought out related to whether provinces were paying assistance to people who might be classed or called the working poor, whereas here we are discussing the question of work activity projects.

Senator Fergusson: I misunderstood what the discussion was about. Could we have something about the statement on page 44 at the top of the page which says:

Agreements relating to work activity projects have been signed with seven provinces.

Could we know the provinces who are in agreement and would it be possible to give us some examples of what the work projects are like?

Dr. Willard: Mr. Chairman, the provinces that have signed agreements under Part 3, which is the work activity project section, include British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Quebec, Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia. So far the provinces which submitted projects and which have had them approved are Quebec and Saskatchewan. The Province of Prince Edward Island has submitted a project which is now under consideration. The first to be approved were the "bûcheron" projects in Quebec. This involves a total of seven "bûcheron" or lumberjack projects. Projects were submitted and approved for Montmagny and for the Eastern Townships. The first set of these has been completed. The overall aim of these projects is to enable recipients of public assistance to become productive citizens. The projects attempt to motivate individuals to look after their own needs, develop habits which will enable them to fit into the everyday working world and prove to themselves that they are able to provide for their needs and those of their dependents.

Participants perform the following forestry jobs: setting up seed stands; clearing paths; reforestation; pruning and gathering of cones.

Participants are provided with any social welfare services necessary for their rehabilitation.

These projects range from six to twenty-two weeks in duration and from 125 to 150 persons participate in each project.

Les Ateliers R-10 Inc., Quebec City is another project. This project is aimed at the global social rehabilitation of the worker-trainees and their vocational readjustment either through a vocational training course or regular employment. Trainees include persons who are chronically unemployed, in receipt of assistance and fit to work.

Participants are engaged in the assembly of floor and dish mops, and in wordwork and carpentry projects. It is hoped to extend the type of work available.

Trainees are provided with complementary recreational and cultural activities. They also receive services necessary for social and work rehabilitation including vocational counselling, case and group work and medical and psychological services, if necessary. Some 20 worker-trainees participate in a four-month training period. About 60 persons can be trained in one year under this project.

There is another project for Quebec.

Senator Fergusson: It is just a general idea.

Dr. Willard: We could table the document.

Senator Fergusson: I would like that very much, if we could have the document tabled.

Senator Inman: Would that document include the projects under consideration in Prince Edward Island?

Dr. Willard: It is here. I do not think Prince Edward Island will mind if we table it, even though it is under consideration. We have a committee which includes representatives from the Departments of Manpower and of National Health and Welfare that reviews work activity projects, to make sure there is no overlapping with vocational training and other Manpower services. The purposes of the program is to try to put emphasis on getting people back to work in an environment which will motivate them perhaps to take normal vocational training and other Manpower programs. In other words, in some cases it is pre-vocational training, in others it is just work activity to try to motivate them and to get them ready to get back into the employment market.

Senator Fergusson: Speaking of the work activity project, I have been trying to remember those we saw out in Vancouver. You did not mention British Columbia?

Dr. Willard: They have signed an agreement.

Senator Fergusson: This was a group of women who were on welfare and it started through an organization that was called MOMS—More Opportunity for Mothers. It was something carried on under the Canada Assistance Act, where some training is being given to just the sort of people to which you refer and it seemed to be successful. It may be that the chairman or Mr. Joyce remembers the name of that organization, as it does not come to my mind. I visited the place where they were working and saw what they were doing. It would be wonderful if the same sort of thing could be carried on in other parts of Canada.

The Chairman: I think it was MOMS.

Senator Fergusson: Yes, and I think that through MOMS they developed another organization.

Dr. Willard: Perhaps Mr. Cragg can say something on this.

Mr. Cragg: This particular kind of organization of which Senator Fergusson refers would not be one that would fit into work activity. These people are obviously well motivated and able to work and just need some support to enable them to do that. This is available through Part I of the Canada Assistance Plan rather than through Part III.

We have had discussions with British Columbia on a number of other projects which they have not yet submitted in final form—and indeed with other provinces as well.

If you go to Nova Scotia, for example, there is a number of projects there, working with people who do need help in securing employment or in reaching the stage where they are able to take advantage of training. But they come under Part I and they do not have to meet the particular criteria required for the work activity project.

Senator Fergusson: I think it was the Peoples Opportunity Centre, the name I was trying to think of.

Mr. Cragg: That is Winnipeg.

Senator Fergusson: Then that is not the one.

The Chairman: We will find the name.

Dr. Willard: The Canada Assistance Plan, under Part I, to which Mr. Cragg is referring, provides for assistance for community development projects. Some of these community development projects involve working at the community level in an effort to assist people who are on social assistance to get employment, and to work with them in such a way that the process will encourage self help and act as a bridge between other agencies such as Manpower and a housing authority.

Senator Fergusson: That is what it was, the Community project. I realize that. There is one other thing. I am sorry to bring this up and perhaps it was discussed. It is a matter of incentives, mentioned on pages 26 and 27. I got the idea or general impression from the brief, that all people who are working are just waiting for the chance to get a free ride. I do not believe this, from the evidence given to us. There are so many people who are working and who would be a lot better off if they were not working—it may be that was not what was supposed to be implied in the brief, but it was what I got out of it.

Dr. Willard: It certainly was not meant to be the implication. Those of us who work in this field and who have contact with people on assistance and with people who are administering assistance at the local level, are more and more convinced, as I mentioned on Tuesday, that one of our basic problems is sufficient jobs. For those who are ill or disabled or for those who cannot get jobs, there needs to be income support.

The few cases where the individual may be getting assistance when he should not, or the cases where the provision of assistance adversely affects incentive to work, are a relatively minor problem in the total situation. When individual circumstances are quoted in an unfavourable context, indicating that some people prefer to stay on assistance rather than to work, it does great damage to the other people who, through no fault of their own, find themselves on assistance and who are doing their very best to get along but have to have this channel of income support. Therefore, while it is inevitable, in any system as comprehensive as the social security programs that exist in modern industrial nations, that some abuse will occur as an adverse side effect or by-product of the total system, the incidence of such abuse is so negligible relative to the total provision of income support that it is unfortunate that it gets blown up out of all proportion.

Senator Fergusson: Thank you. This is my own opinion, and I am glad to realize that it is also the opinion of the Deputy Minister of the department.

Mr. Cragg: Mr. Chairman, we do not have definite statistics for all provinces, but if we take Alberta as an example, specifically the city of Calgary, there was a study done there showing that only 5.4 per cent of the assistance cases involved employable people. So there is only a small group of people to start with who could abuse the system if they chose to do so. For the province of Alberta as a whole, the percentage figure with respect to people who are employable but who are on assistance is 6.5 per cent. Those are people who could work if work were available. That is the small percentage from whom you will draw the people who may abuse the system.

Dr. Willard: Mr. Chairman, we have talked about people and how they get categorized with regard to the question of incentive. I think it is fair to say that the way assistance programs sometimes operate is not fair to them, in that quite often additional income they may earn, part-time income, results in their having their assistance reduced; and in this sense an assistance program can have an adverse effect on incentive.

That is looking at it from the point of view of where the fault may lie in the program rather than with people; and that occurs most commonly among people involved in a part-time employment situation. However, it can also occur in instances where full-time employment is involved, and where, as I mentioned before, there are a large number of children. There is the situation where more income is derived by being on assistance than by being at work. But this is not the fault of the recipients.

There are only two remedies in the case of part-time employment and income from that source. Provision can be made in the assistance program to have some income exempt, and then above that level to have some progressive rate of reduction so that as each $2 or $3 is earned perhaps only $1 is deducted. That permits the individual to carry on in part-time employment and thus encourages him to feel he was doing something constructive toward securing income for his own support.

So far as the working poor is concerned we have already canvassed that situation and I have indicated that there are two income security techniques for trying to assist them. One is the demogrant in the case of family allowances; if the rates of allowance are high enough, this could easily solve the problem. The other is the income tested benefit.

The Chairman: Mr. Cragg, the survey to which you referred was made by Professor Peitchinis, was it not? As I recall, there was also an American survey made because of many accusations similar to those which Senator Fergusson brought forward here, and that American survey, which was on almost a national basis, indicated that the figure was less than 1 per cent. Do you recall that, Mr. Cragg?

Mr. Cragg: Yes, Mr. Chairman, but I believe that in the United States they used a different base so that the two programs are, in that sense, not comparable. In the United States, for example, they do not include aid to dependent children. Even so, however, it is a relatively small percentage in both countries, in any case.

The Chairman: Dr. Willard, on page 45 of the brief there is mention of the adequacy of assistance, I should like to read into the record the third paragraph with respect thereto:

Adequacy of Assistance: While provinces have made substantial progress toward the improvement of assistance levels, further movement is hindered by three major factors. One is the scarcity of financial resources, bearing in mind that 50 per cent of costs must be found within the province; the poorer provinces assert that they cannot afford to provide a desirable standard of assistance and services to eligible persons. A second is the absence of consensus about the standard of living that such programs should support. A third problem is the relationship of assistance levels to work incentives.

Now, something occurred to me here as we went along. For example, Newfoundland is a very poor province where the assistance is well above the minimum age. The same thing is true of Prince Edward Island. Yet we find that in British Columbia it is considerably below and Quebec appears to be considerably below. Some of the other provinces are just on the margin. These poorer provinces are attempting to do a great deal more than we give them credit for. The standard of living becomes important. I have a statement to read here before I ask my question. This is a statement made by the Prime Minister on September 16, 1968, appearing on page 68, of Hansard. I quote:

In order to focus programs on those who need them we must define, with as much clarity as possible, the essential components of a minimum standard for satisfactory living—not a subsistence standard but one which allows for dignity and decency. Defining the components of such a standard is a tremendously complex task. Yet, Mr. Speaker, it is something which must be done if we are to fashion the tools with which to measure, with some precision, social investments.

That is the Prime Minister's statement. The Fifth Annual Report carried a similar statement of which you are undoubtedly aware. Now, my question is; what has the department done towards bringing about a minimum standard as indicated here, not a subsistence standard, since the declaration made by the Prime Minister in September, 1968?

Dr. Willard: Mr. Chairman, we have done a number of things. Some of the studies we have carried out appear in this document. As you can see, we have made an analysis of the development of concepts for measures of minimum living standards which is one of the appendices. We have made an analysis of family budgets in Canada which is included as another appendix. We have also built up the story of monthly budgets for items of basic needs by provinces under social assistance legislation. One of the federal-provincial task forces, the one concerned with a developmental approach to assistance, has a committee working on this question; I believe you would be interested, Mr. Chairman, in the fact that they considered that this matter should be approached not on a national basis designed to come up with a national standard, but that it should be examined more on a regional or provincial lines, having regard to the different circumstances within the different regions and provinces of Canada. So we are pursuing these studies with the provinces in the context of a joint federal-provincial task force.

The Chairman: Do you feel that these studies have had an impact on the people responsible for welfare in the various provinces and has there been any change or any improvement?

Dr. Willard: This question of what brings about change or improvement is a very intangible thing. We like to think there are many people who play parts in bringing about change. All we can do is to bring these matters to the attention of the ministers responsible in the respective provincial governments, and to committees such as this so that the public at large can see the rates that are being paid to social assistance recipients across the country.

The Chairman: Yes, but Dr. Willard, we are contributing 50 per cent. I feel that we are pretty understanding in our contribution. The provinces are not complaining about your coming in and being small about things. Fifty per cent is a fairly decent contribution. Do we not have anything at all to say other than merely advising and suggesting? Do we not have a little more to say having regard to the partnership we have with them? It is pretty well an open-end partnership.

Dr. Willard: Well, Mr. Chairman, I cannot reveal the nature of the discussions between the federal and provincial ministers in such matters as to whether it is advice or how frank the discussions are, nor can I reveal the nature of the discussions between deputy ministers and technical officials. That is one reason why it is difficult to answer your question. I pointed out on Tuesday that at the time the Canada Assistance Plan was developed and, indeed, when all the assistance measures over the years were developed, the old age pensions, that is the means tested, programs, unemployment assistance and so forth, the point that was dominant was the fact that the operation of such programs was conceded by all to be under provincial jurisdiction. When the legislation for the Canada Assistance Plan was developed, there was considerable criticism by the provinces that the means test programs for the blind the disabled and the aged were inflexible. Federal legislation had fixed requirements and long regulations, and the provinces had very little area in which to move. The whole thrust by the federal Government was one to make the new assistance instrument simple and flexible. Secondly, there was desire to leave the responsibility with regard to assistance rates and the kind and extent of services to the provincial jurisdictions. This is the nature of the instrument within which the Department has to work.

The Chairman: But, Dr. Willard, I fully understand what you are saying and we know the kind of work you are doing. This committee and the chairman of this committee have absolute confidence in you, so don't worry about that. However, let us get back to what we were discussing. Here we have an open-end contract. When we had an open-end contract on the Trans-Canada Highway, we laid down specifications and said "you get this and we want that" for the 50 per cent or the 25 per cent, whichever it was. We do it with regard to hospitals, we do it with regard to dozens and dozens of programs—these open-ended programs—and yet we find here, on this very important one, we are just pay and leave it entirely to the provinces. Where is the social philosophy there?

Dr. Willard: There are times when you have to decide where the responsibility for the social philosophy lies within a federal state. I think what I have been saying is that it has been the view of the federal Government, and certainly the view of the provincial governments, that this rests mainly within the sphere of the provincial government, when it comes to social assistance and social services. In some programs certain conditions have been laid down and an effort has been made to have the provinces conform to those conditions before they receive federal contributions.

Over the last few years the trend has been to provide fewer and fewer conditions and, indeed, some provinces would like to withdraw from shared-cost programs in a way that there would be only general financial arrangements. One approach is federal withdrawal from certain areas of taxation, so that the provinces would proceed to provide social assistance in their own way, without reference to legislation such as the Canada Assistance Plan. Another approach is the provision under some of these shared cost programs of federal block grants; some would view this as a far more satisfactory approach than individual programs with specific conditions.

The Chairman: Could you give us an example of a block grant?

Dr. Willard: For instance, a block grant in the health field that would take care of the whole of the health sector and would mean fewer conditions in the case of the federal legislation with regard to how the province spends the money within that particular field.

So, the trend of discussion with the provinces has been, firstly, to underline the fact that this is their responsibility—this most of them make clear; and secondly, that given the funds on tax room, they would like in the case of some provinces to carry out this responsibility on their own. In some cases—and this is particularly true for low-income provinces—the federal participation is very important because it has an important income redistribution effect. Within each of these programs in the social security field there is some income redistribution from high-income provinces to low-income provinces, whether it be in the field of social assistance or in the field of hospital care or whatever other program you might select.

The Chairman: The only one province at the present time that has taken a grant and is looking after its own public assistance is the Province of Quebec. All the rest of them are part of the scheme.

Dr. Willard: That is correct. However, Mr. Roberts, after the last Federal-Provincial Conference, indicated to the press that Ontario was thinking about it.

The Chairman: But I think the table that you filed here tells us a tale that really bothers us on the committee and should bother the Canadian people, that here is Quebec, which has withdrawn from the scheme...

Dr. Willard: Mr. Chairman, may I clarify the relationship of Quebec under several shared cost programs including the Canada Assistance Plan?

The nature of the arrangement under the Interim Arrangements Act with Quebec is that they have received tax points—I believe it is 19 equalized points under personal income tax. There is also an adjustment made at the end of the year that takes into account the difference between what Quebec actually expends on the program and what have received through the tax points. So the Interim Arrangements Act provides for a particular method of financing with respect to the Quebec program under the federal program. In other words, the Quebec government goes out and collects personal income tax from people in Quebec with which to finance its social assistance program. The 19 points include not only Canada Assistance Plan but hospital insurance and health grants, and some other programs.

On the other hand, in all other respects the Canada Assistance Program is administered and operated in relation to Quebec on the same basis as for other provinces. In other words, the provincial agreement between the federal Government and Quebec under the Canada Assistance Plan still holds. All the accounts in Quebec under the Canada Assistance Plan are audited by the federal Government in the same way as they are audited in other provinces.

We have the same relationship with the welfare authorities in that province that we have with the welfare authorities in the other provinces with respect to the Canada Assistance Plan. The one exception relates to their expenditure statements; they forward them to us and after verification we send them to the Department of Finance, so that they may determine how much the adjustment payment to that province should be.

Thus, Quebec is not completely out of the existing federal-provincial system; the province is very much a part of the total country-wide program. Under this arrangement, for instance, Quebec has to carry out its obligations with regard to appeals and other matters covered under the Canada Assistance Act, the same as any other province.

The Chairman: Then what does "opting out" mean?

Dr. Willard: That is the interim stage in opting out. The next stage, which the Quebec government has indicated it would like to pursue, would mean that there would presumably be complete severance. The administration of the Quebec assistance program would not be within the context of an agreement under the Canada Assistance Plan, and presumably there would be a general fiscal agreement between Canada and Quebec concerning the permanent withdrawal of Canada from certain tax areas. From then on Quebec would carry on completely with its own legislation, and would not be covered, as it is now, by these federal-provincial agreements relating to hospital insurance, the Canada Assistance Plan and certain other measures.

The Chairman: The reason for my question is obvious after looking at this table which indicates the differences between the current minimum wages rates in the provinces. The current minimum wage in Quebec is $1.35 an hour, but the amount of assistance that a family receives is lower than it is in any other province—perhaps I should say that the difference is greater than it is in any other province. I was wondering if that was due to their policy of using the money in any way they liked, but you say it is not?

Dr. Willard: No. I think, Mr. Chairman, that the expenditures on social assistance in Quebec have increased substantially over the last few years. Let me put it in this way, the percentage increase in provincial financial assistance has gone up in the case of Quebec by 52 per cent in the period from 1965-66 to 1968-69.

The Chairman: What about the others?

Dr. Willard: For Canada as a whole the figure is, as I mentioned on Tuesday, 42 per cent. For Newfoundland it has gone up by 78 per cent; for Prince Edward Island, 52 per cent; for Nova Scotia, 56 per cent; for New Brunswick, 60 per cent; for Quebec, as I mentioned, it has gone up by 52 per cent; for Ontario, 37 per cent; for Manitoba, 45 per cent; for Saskatchewan, 14 per cent; for Alberta, 24 per cent; and for British Columbia it has gone up by 63 per cent.

The one other point, Mr. Chairman, that I would like to add is that within the past week British Columbia has announced an increase in its social assistance rates, so that the figures shown here are out of date.

Senator Carier: Are you about to take up another subject, Mr. Chairman?

The Chairman: Yes, but if you have a question, please go ahead.

Senator Carter: Mr. Chairman, you said that a sharing of 50 per cent was pretty generous, and so it is in a way. However, I would point out that it is still pretty hard for the poor provinces to match the other 50 per cent. The ones that can least afford to match it are doing the most towards looking after the poor.

I should like to ask Dr. Willard if there is any new thinking on this; whether they have been considering this problem? Have they given any thought to a sliding scale based on the average per capita income so that provinces whose per capita income falls below the average would get a few extra points on the sharing.

Dr. Willard: Yes, Mr. Chairman, in August the four ministers responsible for welfare in the Atlantic provinces met with the Honourable Mr. Munro to put forward a brief asking that a higher percentage of sharing be provided to low income provinces. Since that time the officials of the Atlantic provinces have been working on two or three alternative proposals, and the Minister of National Health and Welfare has indicated that he will put this request before his colleagues for consideration.

The Chairman: Let us for a few minutes touch on a subject that we did not touch on before, namely, that of female heads of families who are widowed, divorced, or separated. I think your brief indicated that there are about 300,000 of them in Canada who have as their responsibility some 472,000 children of various ages. Our figures were a little higher, but you could be quite right. We think that they are a special problem in many instances. Senator Fergusson raised the matter of there being more dropouts in such households than in households with a male head, or with both a father and a mother. What attention have they received, particularly the children? I think that 35 per cent of those women work by their own choice, but that still leaves a considerable number who are totally dependent. In this group there are almost half a million children of all ages. What are we doing to make sure that those children have the benefits of education, and so on?

Dr. Willard: Mr. Chairman, traditionally this group of people in the population received income maintenance support through what we have known in Canada as the mothers' allowances program. This, along with workmen's compensation, was one of the earliest pieces of provincial legislation enacted to help a needy group.

You will recall that in 1916 Manitoba brought in the first legislation, and very soon thereafter the various provinces followed.

In many ways Canada was ahead of other countries in trying to give protection to this group, and this is apparent when you look at the matter historically. When it came time for the federal Government to consider the Canada Assistance Plan the federal Government was not sharing in the cost of allowances for this group. Strangely enough, in the United States federally they were sharing for many decades the cost of the aid to dependent children programs which were administered by the states. On the other hand, in Canada federally we were sharing the costs of unemployment assistance which is still not done in the U.S. The situation was just the reverse in the two countries.

When the Canada Assistance Plan was being designed the question was: Would the cost of mothers' allowances be covered federally, and would child welfare services be included as a part of the legislation? The provinces made strong representations on both these points which were considered by the federal Government, and the sharing of this type of provision was provided for in the act. The fact that the federal Government began sharing these costs was of tremendous assistance to the provinces, which were feeling considerable financial pressure because of these and other programs and the improvement of assistance programs generally.

With reference to your question as to whether particular families are afforded adequate support, this again is a matter that depends on how generous a particular province is with the rates of benefit they will pay. It also depends, and this is becoming increasingly so, on the extent to which day care centres have been or can be developed. More and more of these women who have children to support are going back into the labour force. This was not the pattern in the 1920s and the 1930s, but it is true of the postwar period. Therefore this question of day care centres is of vital importance. The manner in which part time workers are dealt with is of particular importance to this group. If the part time earnings of the mother who wishes to go out to work but cannot give full time to a job are taken away on a dollar for dollar basis, such a defect needs to be remedied.

The availability of health services, including the hospital insurance and the medical care programs which are now being established in the various provinces is, of course, of particular importance to these families. Over and above that, the inclusion in the Canada Assistance Plan of federal sharing on the whole range of health services which may not be provided for under other federal programs is particularly important to this group. This applies to eye glasses, drugs and various other needs that the mother and her family may have with growing children.

The Chairman: When you speak of dollar for dollar, how many provinces permit the dollar for dollar and how many take total deductions?

Dr. Willard: I have not the figures with me. Perhaps Mr. Cragg could speak to this question.

Mr. Cragg: Mr. Chairman, it is a very complicated picture. Each province varies in accordance with the programs of long term and short term assistance. They have certain allowable items which may take into account earned income or such items as income from board and lodging receipts, room rentals or rental of property. To take Ontario as an example, there are two assistance programs provided by the province under the Canada Assistance Plan. There is the Family Benefits Act, which generally provides long term assistance, and is administered by the province. Exemptions here include, as I have indicated, a variety of items, but with respect to wages and salaries exemptions are in relation to the number of children and adults in the family. If there is just one adult, the exemption is $24 per month. For two adults it is $36 per month. If there are six children and two adults the exemptions are $108 per month. Under the General Welfare Assistance Act, which is administered by the municipalities in Ontario and is generally for the employable person who is temporarily unemployed, there are no exemptions at all. That is on a one for one basis.

The Chairman: Would that be applicable across the country in that particular orientation?

Mr. Cragg: Most provinces do provide some exemptions for earnings.

The Chairman: Both long and short term?

Mr. Cragg: Yes; I have a detailed table here.

The Chairman: Could you leave it with us for our file, please?

Mr. Cragg: Yes.

The Chairman: Does the table cover all the provinces?

Mr. Cragg: Yes.

Senator Carter: What criteria do you have for long and short term? I presume the short term is based on the assumption that the applicant is going to find work soon, but that assumption very often has no validity. Does this definition vary from one province to another?

Dr. Willard: Yes, there are variations. For instance, a disabled person or one who is obviously unemployable tends under most programs to receive a long-term benefit. The amount of benefit may be higher and his continued eligibility is checked less often. If it is a case of a wage earner temporarily out of work, or even one who is in and out of work quite regularly, he tends to be in the short-term benefit stream.

Senator Carter: There is no period laid down. An unemployed person could be on short-term benefit for a year, I presume?

Dr. Willard: I do not know whether Mr. Cragg wishes to add anything further?

Mr. Cragg: This could be. If he is classified as an employable unemployed person he could be on short term assistance for a fairly lengthy period. It varies from province to province. The table I am going to leave with you defines for most provinces what they mean by long and short term assistance. The definition in the Newfoundland Act is that short term assistance is available to unemployed employables. That is all they say. Long term assistance is available to adults or families with mental or physical incapacities, widowed mothers with dependent children, other women with children and without adequate means, unmarried mothers caring for their children, and fathers with dependent children if they are incapacitated or must remain at home because the mother is incapacitated, deceased, in jail, in a sanatorium, in a hospital or has deserted the home.

The Chairman: One point that troubled me when you presented this table was the fact that our staff figures did not agree with yours. I wanted to know why, because I thought they would be able to do multiplication and that your people also would or would use the computer. Now, my staff point out to me the obvious mistake: you have your examples working 52 weeks of 40 hours per week and our staff, being a little more generous, decided to give them two weeks holiday.

Dr. Willard: Without pay?

The Chairman: Oh, no; the law says you must pay them.

Dr. Willard: That is why it is 52.

The Chairman: We did it the other way then.

Dr. Willard: We thought the two weeks would be with pay. I think we were more generous than your staff.

The Chairman: I am afraid you are.

Dr. Willard: We may be wrong, but we like to be on the side of the angels.

The Chairman: You are.

If there are no further questions. That concludes this part of the hearing and we will turn to health. We have here Dr. James Wiebe, Director General of the Medical Services Branch; Dr. Robert Armstrong, Acting Director General of the Health Insurance and Resources Branch; and Dr. L. Bradley Pett, Deputy Director General of the Health Services Branch.

First, Dr. Willard will say a few words.

Dr. Willard: Mr. Chairman, I thought we might address ourselves first of all to the very important departmental program concerned with Indian and Northern Health Services. In the brief we have listed some of the infant mortality rates, some of the averaged age-specific death rates and so on, to give an indication of the health status of the Indians.

The other day in the general summary I mentioned some of the new developments. One was our consultation with Indian representatives from across Canada; in the last three days Dr. Wiebe has been meeting with these representatives. This has provided a means of communication and joint participation with the Indians in policy development.

I also mentioned that a system of liaison officers has been developed, whereby the Department of National Health and Welfare is providing $10,000 to each Indian association to meet the salary and other expenses of Indian liaison officers, who can tell us about our health services from the point of view of the Indians receiving care from those health programs.

Another important matter, upon which Dr. Wiebe might wish to comment, is that since 1962 a Community Health Worker Training Program has been established, under which Indians and Eskimos are trained so that they are able to go into their communities and act as health workers.

Another important development that Dr. Wiebe may wish to mention is that in an effort to tap the resources of our medical schools in Canada the department has entered into contracts with various universities for them to provide medical staff on a rotating basis for some of our health regions and health zones. For example, we have an agreement with McGill University whereby they provide two doctors and two fifth-year medical students, who go into our hospitals in the Baffin zone and provide medical services. There are similar contracts with other universities, including the Universities of Manitoba, Western Ontario, McMaster, Toronto, Queen's, Montreal and Dalhousie. This is an effort to supplement the staff coming under Dr. Wiebe's direction, and to try to improve the quality of care by this means.

Efforts are being made to improve radio communication, which has been difficult in some isolated centres. An appropriation of $500,000, designed to try to assist in this regard, has been announced.

I do not know whether Dr. Wiebe would want to add anything further to that.

Dr. James H. Wiebe (Director General, Medical Services Branch, Department of National Health and Welfare): We are developing a relationship with the Canadian medical profession through the Canadian Medical Association. While this development is at an early stage, it is quite promising. We believe there are here resources that we can advantageously tap and utilize.

Dr. Willard: Do you want to say anything about your discussion of the past few days with Indian leaders and the kind of things you have been talking about?

Dr. Wiebe: We have just had our second meeting, the first being last fall. Both meetings were of two days duration. The first one resulted largely in an agreement to speak further, which we thought was tremendous progress. The second meeting did, we think, produce a number of fairly solid achievements, particularly with respect to the community health workers. The Indian Brotherhoods are most interested in this program, wish to support it, and moreover wish to operate it and made this proposal to us. We agreed with enthusiasm, because no program among Indians has better chances of success, we believe, than if it is carried out by the Indians themselves.

We also broadened our liaison officer program and increased the financing of it so that there would be more officers available, who and so that they could be paid better salaries. This program also is in the hands of the brotherhoods.

These were two of the main things that were hammered out. There were many other relatively minor subjects. We considered this meeting a success, and on departing the Indians also looked forward to the next meeting, when further topics will be discussed.

Senator Carter: The table of the Indian infant mortality rate is very interesting. The first thing that strikes me is that the Indians in New Brunswick have a lower mortality rate than that for the whole province, whereas in every other province the rate is stacked against the Indians two to one, even up to three to one. Is there any special reason? Do they have special water in New Brunswick, or special air? Why is there such a striking difference in New Brunswick compared with all other provinces?

Dr. Wiebe: I believe one needs to be just a little careful here, because we are dealing, first of all, with a small number of Indians in that province and therefore a small number of possible deaths. One such case can contribute greatly to the fraction or the ratio that we get.

Senator Carter: The sample is too small for a general comparison.

Dr. Wiebe: Yes, I think it would be wise to assume that.

Senator Carter: Have you any comparative figures with the Indian or Eskimo rates in other countries? Does this include the Eskimos or just the Indians?

Dr. Wiebe: Where it says Indian it is Indian only.

Senator Carter: Have you comparative figures for Eskimos?

Dr. Wiebe: Yes, at the bottom of page 50. In 1968 it was 49 per 1,000 for Indians and 89 per 1,000 for Eskimos.

Senator Carter: How does that compare with the figures for Eskimos in Greenland? Do you have such comparative figures?

Dr. Wiebe: We do, but they are not available at the moment. The Greenland Eskimo situation is not entirely comparable to our own. They have been in contact with western civilization for hundreds of years, where our Eskimos count their true contact in terms of decades. I believe their figures are better, but unfortunately we are unable to say exactly how much so.

Senator Carter: Do you provide a full range of health services for Indians, Eskimos, including tuberculosis and mental disease? The federal Government does not share with the provinces in expenditures for these two diseases, I understand, but do you provide them for the native people?

Dr. Wiebe: Yes. Perhaps it would be best to confine our remarks at the moment to provinces and not to the territories, which is a different situation again. Either we or the province provide this full range of services to the Indians. Perhaps you wonder why I put it in this way. First of all, not every Indian in the country comes to us for services. Many Indians provide their own health services and pay for them or take advantage, if they are living off the reserves, of the facilities available in the province. Those Indians living on their reserves do look to us for these services and we provide as wide a range of services as the provinces do and perhaps a little wider, because we are in the position of dealing with a limited number of people. Our staffs are therefore able to have practically every person on their conscience. Thus, our immunization program, which is in the preventive field is perhaps much better than for any other segment of the Canadian population. In the same way, our case finding and treatment effort in regard to tuberculosis is perhaps a little more specific to the individual rather than to the mass.

Senator Carter: Is the responsibility of the Government limited only to Indians on reserves or could an Indian living off the reserve claim those services too?

Dr. Wiebe: We generally expect an Indian living off the reserve, who has made his way as other citizens have, to take the same responsibility as other citizens. In the same way, if he is in need he has access to the same sources of assistance as other citizens do.

Senator Carter: Is there a legal basis for that or is that just a practice that has grown up?

Dr. Wiebe: Shall we say it is a practice in that Indians are perhaps, first of all, citizens of their province and then citizens of Canada. If you wish to mention the statutory basis for this, our whole work is based on section 72 of the Indian Act, which provides permissive legislation for the federal Government to provide certain services to Indians. It is very poorly defined.

Senator Carter: Do you have any comparative figures of the infant mortality rates for non-Indians and other Canadians who are living in isolated areas under similar conditions?

Dr. Wiebe: We have done quite a search of the literature and have not been able to come up with anything that has been very useful. I am, however, on the trail of a study which took place in British Columbia, specifically in the Fraser Valley area. I just heard about this last week and I do not have it in my possession yet. My source of information suggested that other segments of the population, in a similar socio-economic setting, are perhaps even more disadvantaged than the Indians are, if you study the statistics.

Senator Carter: On page 51 you list the causes of infant mortality. Have you done any research as to what extent this is caused by lack of health education on the part of parents in the community?

Dr. Wiebe: We have not done research on this. However, there is the project which Dr. Willard referred to earlier, namely, that of the community health worker program. When it was begun, certain base-line data was taken. We shall determine, as the years go by, whether any effect was shown as a result of this project, which of course involves largely education, activation, stimulation and information for the Indian people.

Senator Carter: I was interested in knowing if there was any evidence that poverty was a contributing factor more than others, such as lack of education and lack of services.

Senator Inman: Mr. Chairman, Senator Carter in fact asked the question, but I will go a little further and ask if there is any prenatal or postnatal education provided for those Eskimos and Indians?

Dr. Wiebe: There has been for many years.

Senator Inman: What is being done, what services are there to alleviate these diseases and the causes of them? It is not always poverty.

Dr. Wiebe: We are taking advantage of all possible methods—actual treatment, finding of disease, education. We are trying to take advantage of all methods of alleviating the situation.

We have had a constantly rising budget with which to perform this program. However, we believe we now have perhaps arrived at the point where pouring a great deal more money into the health services side might not produce the results that we might anticipate, until certain other things happen, namely, on the socio-economic side—until the effects of low income, poor living conditions, lack of access to services, poor communications—all these things that we take for granted in the country at large, until these have been improved for them—we wonder whether some of the dollars might, instead of increasing the health budget, might not be diverted to these other problems.

Senator Inman: Do you find these people co-operative?

Dr. Wiebe: They are human beings and many of them are very co-operative. Others show relative degrees of indifference. These people find themselves at an inter-face between two cultures. One culture, namely, ours, is highly competitive and requires planning; the other is their old culture which is a day to day type of thing, with very little planning required. There is a conflict in minds, I believe, relative to this situation.

Senator Inman: Do you take any part in providing for them in regard to ante-natal and post natal education?

Dr. Wiebe: We have been encouraging this. I have been 25 years in the service and have tried to spend time trying to persuade them that medicine and health care would be a good thing. Today these people have become highly critical. In some cases, much more so than the general public in Canada, as to whether they are getting good health services or not.

Senator Inman: Do you find much of this trouble with other groups—perhaps Senator Carter asked that—other groups in Canada, new Canadians, or people who may not have been used to these services? Can you get at them?

Dr. Wiebe: I am not qualified to pass an opinion and I have no statistical data to back this up.

Senator Fergusson: I want to comment on the community health training program. You speak of it on page 53. You say it was instituted in 1962. I would gather from the report you have here that you feel it is quite successful.

Dr. Wiebe: Yes, if you measure success in terms of what we might consider very very slow progress. I do not think we can measure success by the same yardstick as in the Canadian environmental at large. On a recent trip, I spoke to a community health worker, who had spent six years in the community, and I asked the specific question: "What have you succeeded in doing, how would you assess what you have done?" She said: "I do not think I have achieved very much." But I think she was growing along with the situation and things had been happening around her and she did not notice them. Now our nurses have indicated that there have been changes in attitudes and changes in practices with respect to health.

Senator Fergusson: Do you expect to expand this program?

Dr. Wiebe: We shall expand it just as rapidly as we can acquire health educators. Health educators are not trained in Canada. We have to send persons out of the country for training. Health educators are necessary to this program, because what is involved are the techniques of education and not just information. There is no point in lecturing people, as you know; one has to devise ways and means of persuading them to look for new knowledge and new practices.

While we have a number of educators who head this program, we lack them. Nevertheless, there are always courses going on and the numbers are increasing yearly.

Senator Inman: Is there not a place where these educators can be trained in Canada?

Dr. Wiebe: On this point I did a survey yesterday with two of our regional directors and to our combined knowledge there is no university which provides that in Canada.

Senator Fergusson: Where do you send them?

Dr. Wiebe: To the United States.

Senator Fergusson: Only to the United States?

Dr. Wiebe: There are courses in England but we have not utilized them.

Senator Fergusson: Do you send them on scholarships or how do you send them?

Dr. Wiebe: Yes, actually these people are given leave with pay and perquisites and we look after such things as fees and books and transportation and so on and so forth. There is no loss to them.

Senator Fergusson: As Senator Inman says, is it not bad that we cannot set up such training in Canada. It would be in the universities, I suppose?

Dr. Wiebe: Yes, it would be in a university setting, it is a degree course.

Senator Fergusson: Have you tried to get universities interested?

Dr. Wiebe: Yes, we have communicated with universities on this matter and presumably the demand in Canada is not great enough in toto to warrant such a program but we shall continue our efforts.

Senator Fergusson: Thank you.

Senator Carter: Has any work been done to diagnose the different kind of diseases and ailments that the Indians, and Eskimos suffer from—for example, diseases of dietary deficiency and that sort of thing.

Dr. Wiebe: Yes, we have as a matter of fact one medical officer who has some assistants from time to time as needed, whose sole work is just exactly what you have suggested, Senator Carter, investigating whether there are variations or variances from what we consider normal in the medical textbook. This requires a great deal of study and one must not be too premature in making assumptions until results are known. It does appear that in certain metabolic situations the Indian or Eskimo metabolism differs somewhat from ours. But it is a little premature to say too much on this subject.

Senator Carter: Do you have a preventive program? I am not talking so much of an immunization program, but of a general preventive program for these people, under your department?

Dr. Wiebe: Yes, we try to bring to bear all the tools that are available. Prevention is something that can operate from almost any facet of daily life, the prevention of accidents, for example. The educational program includes that. Prevention may take the form of better housing, better sanitary conditions in the community, better sanitary conditions in the individual home. This is all prevention. In so far as the provision of facilities such as housing and so on is concerned, they are not in the purview of this department, as you know. We do, however, communicate at a high level, and at the echelon level, too, with the Departmental of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, whose function is to provide these services, and we exchange advice and information with them.

Senator Carter: Do you provide school children with milk or dietary supplements and vitamins, or with bread or special flour with vitamins in it?

Dr. Wiebe: Yes, partly. With the help of officers in our department we have made certain developments. For instance, Dr. Pett helped us some years ago to develop the vitamin biscuit which had the various vitamins usually deficient in the diet of Indians. These vitamin biscuits were offered to school children and are still in use.

However, so far as school lunches and so on are concerned, this would not fall under our purview but would be within the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, which does in fact have such programs.

Senator Carter: There must be a close liaison between your department and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, because the two programs supplement each other.

Dr. Wiebe: Yes, indeed. We are certainly not satisfied that we are closely enough related, but we are working at it so that our efforts can be synchronized and meshed, as you properly suggest they should be.

Senator Carter: How do you manage for dental care? What kind of dental services do you have for these people?

Dr. Wiebe: They suffer from the same problems you and I suffer from. Dentists are in very short supply in Canada. However, we have on staff at this time about 22 dentists who work full-time for us. In addition to that, there are many Indian groups who have easy access to metropolitan facilities. Furthermore there are some private physicians who sell us their time for a week or so at a time.

The Chairman: On the reservations?

Dr. Wiebe: Yes. We would have them visit either in remote areas or otherwise. We are now negotiating with the dental profession to provide more of that kind of service.

The Chairman: Certain Indian organizations which have appeared before us have voiced the fear that the provinces will not give them the kind of services they have been receiving hitherto, I wonder if there is any basis for that state of mind.

Dr. Wiebe: I would give a guarded yes as an answer, because in many phases of our work we have used a much higher concentration of manpower per individual than in the provincial setting. Furthermore, our range of services has been a bit wider than most provinces give. I can therefore understand the fear expressed by the Indians, but, nevertheless, they should also be persuaded that we are not going to cause them to have less than they had in the past.

Senator Carter: I have never been sure whether the provision of eye glasses, dentures and prosthetics and such things was something that came under your department or the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Does it come under your department?

Dr. Wiebe: Yes.

Senator Carter: All of it? None of that comes under the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development?

Dr. Wiebe: With the exception of certain major items such as wheelchairs, and I can think of no other exceptions at the moment, we provide all prosthetic devices.

Senator Carter: Do you have any problems with the folklore of the Indians, in the sense that they have their own remedies for certain ailments? Is there much of a problem in that respect?

Dr. Wiebe: The most recent complaint I have had was the day before yesterday to the effect that we and the missionaries had taken away from the Indians their peyote. Even so, there is still a residuum there, but I don't think it interferes with the acceptance of the modern technology and techniques that are available. It is somewhat like what an old Indian told me years ago when we were discussing religion—his old religion and the new Christian religion. He said you had to put your feet into both lakes to play it safe.

Senator Carter: He was a good politician, then.

I was interested to see that you have community health programs. How successful are they, and can they be "translated" to other, non-Indian, groups in poverty levels?

Dr. Wiebe: That is an interesting question. At least one province has asked if it can join us and send delegates or students to our courses. Apparently that province at least feels it could make use of the same kind of individual within its own groups.

Senator Carter: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Do you have any witch doctors on the payroll?

Dr. Wiebe: Around this table, you mean?

The Chairman: I had in mind the Indian who says he wants to go to a witch doctor. And if he exists, can the witch doctor claim a fee from you?

Dr. Wiebe: We haven't licensed them yet.

Senator Inman: What provision do you have for old people who are not able to look after themselves?

Dr. Wiebe: That does not properly come within our purview, in the sense that the Indian Affairs Branch would be looking after it, but, obviously, we are very much interested because there are health problems related to the aged. Indirectly we have assisted, because many of our smaller hospitals are being closed and the Indians are taking over some of these institutions to utilize for the purposes that you have in mind.

Senator Inman: Such as old people's homes?

Dr. Wiebe: That is right.

The Chairman: To use my term, how many old folk's homes would you have?

Dr. Wiebe: We have none. We have one hospital in southern Ontario that was taken over by the Indians, and there is another hospital in the Fraser Valley which is now under negotiation with them.

The Chairman: How many beds would there be in those hospitals?

Dr. Wiebe: The one in southern Ontario has 35 beds, approximately, and the one in Fraser Valley has 150 beds.

The Chairman: Without intending to draw any inferences, that means that across this country there are approximately 200 beds for an Indian population of over 250,000. Of course, their way of looking at these problems is different from ours. What is their way of looking at them? Do the old folk just stay at home with their families?

Dr. Wiebe: They have the same access to the usual homes as other citizens have.

The Chairman: Even from the reservation. And the question is as to who pays?

Dr. Wiebe: It is a question of who pays, yes.

The Chairman: Then, just one more question. Somewhere in your brief you said that drugs are provided at local initiative in the provinces. Is that a plus or a minus?

Dr. Wiebe: I want to be very sure I am addressing myself to the question you have in mind. I believe you are referring to immunological products such as vaccines and things of this nature, and most provinces are now providing these free to Indians as they do to any other citizen and on the same basis as they provide them to other citizens.

The Chairman: But there was a reference to three provinces and I did not know whether this was in addition or whether only three had participated. Is it a problem? I am not talking about pot or anything of that nature, I am talking about normal drugs.

Dr. Wiebe: Drugs for legitimate use do not provide any problem. We provide the drugs for Indians, so there is no problem. None of the provinces provides drugs for Indians except in the way I have said.

The Chairman: Where they are off the reservation?

Dr. Wiebe: If in the Province of Ontario, for example, a person is a diabetic, the province will provide free insulin and will not ask if that person is an Indian or not. The insulin is available to all.

Senator Carter: We are discussing the medicare program in Canada and different provinces are coming into it now although they are not all in yet. But under our programs for the Indians, they are provided with everything that a province could get under medicare. Is that right?

Dr. Wiebe: I must answer that by changing the frame of your statement a bit. Every province that now has a medical care program extends to the Indians the same provisions they extend to other citizens.

Senator Carter: Any variation would depend upon the particular provincial agreement with the federal Government?

Dr. Wiebe: Yes, the same program applies to the Indians in the Province of Ontario, for example, as applies to other citizens.

Senator Carter: But an Indian in Ontario under medicare might get a different range of services from those available to Indians in other provinces. But your responsibility is to all Indians.

Dr. Wiebe: If it should happen that a specific Indian were unable to receive under a particular provincial plan the services he required, then we would see to it that he got those services.

Senator Fergusson: I have a question with regard to the co-charges and extra-billing which is referred to on page 56. I do not understand this wording, and I wonder if you could explain and tell us if it works against the poor people, and makes it less likely that they will get the services they require.

Dr. Willard: Dr. Armstrong might wish to comment on this question of co-insurance charges and extra-billing.

Senator Fergusson: You see, I do not know what the word "co-charges" really means.

Dr. Robert A. Armstrong, Acting Director General of the Health Insurance and Resources Branch, Department of National Health and Welfare: This is more usually referred to as "co-insurance". Under the hospital insurance plans in British Columbia, Alberta—although only temporarily now—Saskatchewan and the Northwest Territories they have what is called an authorized charge or sometimes co-insurance where the patient pays an amount varying from about $1 per day to $2.50 per day, depending on the province, and the hospital plan pays the balance.

Only one other province, Saskatchewan, has a similar charge under medical care.

Senator Fergusson: But does it work against the poor people of Saskatchewan?

Dr. Armstrong: Typically any person on public assistance does not have to pay because the province will pay it on his behalf for hospital care or medical care. Because of the Medical Care Act requirements in Saskatchewan there are special provisions to prevent hardship. For example, the rate of payment, according to the way the medical care plan is administered, must be such that there is no financial impediment to a person receiving all necessary medical care. In the case of people on lower incomes, the province must make fairly elaborate provisions to prevent such impediments from developing. In Saskatchewan anyone on public assistance is automatically covered. For certain illnesses which have been more or less traditionally treated free in that province, such as cancer, tuberculosis, mental illness, the province pays the co-insurance without reference to income.

There is a third such provision whereby the person, who does not qualify either as a public assistance recipient or by coming into one of the special categories, may apply for temporary assistance or the doctor or hospital may apply on his behalf, if it comes to their attention that the patient is likely to be financially embarrassed and he might be too proud or too ignorant to apply for assistance himself. We have to get a commitment of that sort from a province to permit the charge.

Senator Fergusson: I wondered how this could be brought under the Act if some people were going to be left out. You feel that this covers it adequately for people at the marginal level?

Dr. Armstrong: It has done so so far. The majority of cases coming to our attention—and I might add that people always seem to know where Ottawa is, no matter what province they live in, because if they have a problem, they write to us. In most cases where there have been problems it was because people did not know that there was help available, and on our redirecting such letters to the appropriate people in the provinces, these situations have been taken care of.

Senator Fergusson: But there could be a lot of people who would not know about this and would not know where to apply.

Dr. Armstrong: Yes, that is the case. This is another interesting aspect about the so-called private insurance statistics which have been bandied about a great deal in recent years, particularly by those opposed to medical care programs, and which in many cases have not been proven entirely accurate. In other words, they have often overestimated the number of people covered or very often didn't recognize duplication of coverage. In British Columbia when they introduced their plan, (during the previous four years before they had a governmental plan with subsidies available to low-income people), they were amazed at the number of people who popped out of the bush, so to speak, and who were qualified for completely free coverage or substantially subsidized coverage but did not realize that this was available until the great wave of publicity surrounding the introduction of the federal-provincial program. Yet, they lived there for four years previously and in most cases would have been qualified for premium subsidy for medical coverage but they had never heard of it being available.

The Chairman: Could you categorize these people at all? Were they low income people?

Dr. Armstrong: These were people who would get low cost coverage on a subsidized plan. In other words, they were low income people, some with no taxable income whatever and some with very little taxable income, but they just did not know there was help available before.

The Chairman: Of course, nobody told them either.

Dr. Armstrong: I suppose four years before there was some publicity attendant on the introduction of the old British Columbia Medical Plan, but nothing like the publicity the universal plan got with full page ads and forms all over the place, radio and television, and all the publicity of the medical care debate in the House of Commons, and so on.

The Chairman: For a highly unionized province it does not make quite as much sense as in a province with less unionization, because they usually know their rights and word gets around.

Dr. Armstrong: The interesting thing in that regard is that while British Columbia had a very high level of decent private insurance coverage through group arrangements—perhaps a higher average level than any other province—most agreements were such that if a worker was laid off his coverage stopped at midnight, or if he left one job covered under one group and moved to another job covered under a different group, he lost coverage in between jobs and had no coverage until he had passed the waiting period in the new job under the different group. That has all gone now because under Medicare coverage continues and is not related to employment; but here were people who were part of the work force who could be left without coverage at a time when they most needed coverage.

Senator Carter: Part of your problem, I suppose, is staff for the program. You do not have all the qualified staff you would like to have to carry out your full program. Is that a problem?

Dr. Armstrong: We are not running a medical care plan. We are administering a medical care program which is achieved through individual provincial plans that fit together, just as has been the case in hospital insurance where the federal Government lays down the minimum requirements and the provinces each run their own plan within those requirements.

Senator Carter: The doctor told us this morning you do have 22 full-time dentists on your staff.

Dr. Armstrong: That is the Indian and Northern Health Services.

Senator Carter: Yes, in the Indian and Northern Health Services. Do you have staff problems? Is your staff inadequate for the full implementation of the program?

Dr. Wiebe: We do have problems, and they vary from year to year and relate to the general deficiency in any particular category. Dentists are in short supply anywhere you look.

Senator Carter: Do you have any program to indenture native people, to get them into high school and bring them on through, with an agreement that they go back and work for four or five, five or ten years among their own people?

Dr. Wiebe: To date we have not had such a program, but we have used whatever means were at our disposal to encourage young Indians to go into the professions, and we have given them all the support we could by summer employment, and so on. During their course at school, of course, they are completely supported by the Indian Affairs Branch.

Senator Carter: It does not matter which department works it out, if we know there is anything being done, because obviously these people would be the best to do that type of work.

Dr. Wiebe: We have recently spoken to the National Brotherhood on this subject, to see whether it could help us by persuading some of their own people to do exactly what you have suggested, and if they come forward with anything of this nature we will certainly support it.

Senator Carter: The National Brotherhood?

Dr. Wiebe: Yes, the Indian Brotherhood.

Senator Carter: Do you mean out of reserve funds? I am thinking of a government program.

Dr. Wiebe: We would support it.

Senator Carter: And you would do the selection?

Dr. Wiebe: And give encouragement. There are some Indian doctors and dentists, but so far they have preferred not to go back to their own people.

The Chairman: Dr. Pett, would you mind filling us in a little on the national nutrition survey—what you have in mind, what you are trying to attain?

Dr. L. B. Pett, Deputy Director General, Health Services Branch: The National Nutrition Survey really has two objectives. One is to provide factual information on a statistical basis across the whole country, because there are indications scattered here and there that nutrition in Canada is not all it might be. The other purpose, I think equally important, is to provide, particularly for the Food and Drug Directorate, information on the amounts and kinds of foods that are consumed by individuals in relation to, really, the pesticide residues and other things which could be in those foods. It is one thing to have the analysis that a food contains some mercury or DDT; it is quite another thing to establish how many people were eating that particular kind of food and, therefore, to know how widespread the problem is in the population. So there is this double-barrelled objective, both aspects of which I think are very closely related to the interests of the department.

The Chairman: How long has the survey been going on?

Dr. Pett: The plan has not actually started yet. The feasibility study was carried out last year, and the pilot project is being carried out now. It is sought, among other things, to reach formal agreements with the provinces who will be participating, a process which is expected to take place this summer, with a view to starting in actual fact by next fall or in the summer of 1971, depending on how these agreements are reached.

The Chairman: How do you get your nutrition information across to the public?—we are meeting these poor people all the time and they do not seem to have any idea what it is all about.

Dr. Pett: That is a rather different thing, in a way, from a national nutrition survey. The department has had a program for nearly 30 years designed to help people learn about the foods to eat for good health. Since it is partly informational and partly health education, it has to work through and with the co-operation of the provinces. It is not, generally speaking, directly a federal program, except with respect to the Indians I would like to give credit to the work done not only by Dr. Wiebe but by all his colleagues in one particular area in the nutrition area. It almost applies to the whole field of preventive medicine, in which I am interested—namely, in one particular case, materials designed for Indians. The material is at the level of pretty well all the Indians.

To come back to your interest and that of the honourable senators, this is not true in the field of poverty.

I think that most of the health education efforts provincially and federally—I am not going to single out anything in particular—have not been aimed at the poverty level. It simply is not good enough to tell people to eat grapefruit when they cannot afford grapefruit, or, indeed, on a more elementary level, to tell people to wash their hands before eating in order to prevent the spread of infectious hepatitis—which is one of our fairly important problems today—when they have not running water in their houses. These are simply other ways of saying that when you are talking about poverty you are talking about extra-health problems that need an approach that is perhaps a little more direct—the type of direct approach which I think has been achieved with the Indians. This is why the provinces want to get in on some of the advances that have been made in respect of the Indians.

Senator Carter: This survey is an across the nation survey?

Dr. Pett: That is correct.

Senator Carter: Are you taking samples from different income groups?

Dr. Pett: Yes it will be not only demographical but will be taken by age and sex, but also the characteristics of low and high incomes will be included in the sample. Of course, this will vary from province to province, but it will be conducted in such a way that the number of people examined at the low income level will be adequate for an interpretation of that level.

Senator Carter: Have you made any similar survey geared to the health index of different groups? I am referring to the mortality rate in people who are below the poverty level as compared with that in people in the annual income range of $6,000 to $7,000, and up. Do these different groups suffer from different types of diseases or ailments?

Dr. Pett: The Canada sickness survey which was conducted in 1951 did, in fact—well, I think it is the only one that has been done on a national basis in Canada. It would be nice to have it repeated, perhaps.

Senator Carter: It is out of date now, do you think?

Dr. Pett: Oh yes. It was made in 1950-51.

Senator Carter: Yes, that was 20 years ago.

The Chairman: The survey in connection with old age security was done in the same year, and you would be the first to say that it was out of date.

Senator Carter: Dr. Willard, is your department thinking of renewing the sickness survey, particularly now as we are geared to the poverty group or, as we call them, the working poor, and the native peoples?

Dr. Willard: Mr. Chairman, we have in the last few years given consideration to this question, but we never got to the stage where it was agreed that it would get priority. The amount of money involved is very considerable. The nutrition survey is the new big survey that the Department is putting its money into at this time, and it is going to cost $1.9 million. Looking at it in terms of the poverty problem, because there will be an analysis on the basis of income, it is going to be very important indeed. You will recall that in the appendices that dealt with the whole question of budgets of low income people, the food component is very important and therefore in terms of the study takes on special significance. I would say the other very important budget item, if you are singling them out, is housing or shelter provision. There is a great variation there, even within a given city. The relationship of rents and so forth to the income of people is another area that I think deserves a great deal of study.

So, with regard to the sickness survey, I think it is a type of survey that certainly the department should get back to as soon as it can get the resources with which to do it.

Dr. Armstrong: May I say something on that, Mr. Chairman?

The Chairman: Yes.

Dr. Armstrong: Under the universal medical care plans you have a record of virtually every medical service rendered to every resident in a province. In some provinces the numbering of the identification cards of persons on public assistance or on subsidized premiums is distinct so that the plan can tell who is such a person and who is not. It becomes feasible, after the plans have been running for a reasonable length of time and the computers have the bugs cleared out of them, that you can do a sickness survey on a computer.

Some provinces have refused to identify persons on assistance in any way by means of numbering. In other words, it would be a much more involved process to find out who was in a low income group and who was not, but I think the provinces are sort of divided between these two approaches. However, technically speaking, one can do a sickness survey by computer once we have the universal plan in effect.

There is another point related to this, and that is that experience in Canada has generally been that the low income people, when they are first given comprehensive coverage, take a few years to learn to use it. Although it is commonly bandied about that you are going to have your services swamped because these people are going to the doctors and hospitals in droves, experience in Canada has been that it takes a few years before they take advantage of the benefits of the plan. This is partly because of education, partly because of ignorance, and partly because it is something new and they do not know what to do with it. It is also due in part to ingrained habits of watching every penny, because they know that if they go to the doctor they may be given a prescription and that costs them money, or that they have to pay bus fare or a taxi in order to get to the doctor. They have become so used to incurring an expense when they go to a doctor that they tend to shy off.

The Chairman: There does not seem to be anything further, Dr. Willard. On behalf of the committee I will thank you and your competent and impressive staff for coming here today. We are very appreciative of your brief. It is thoughtful and helpful. We have many problems before us, and the information contained in the brief will be of great use in their solution.

The committee adjourned.

I. INTRODUCTION

The substantial economic growth of Canada after World War II led to the expectation on the part of many that with the rising Gross National Product poverty would steadily diminish as a serious problem; this has not proved to be so.

Real income per capita did increase substantially, but a significant portion of the population did not benefit to the extent needed to lift them out of poverty. While the affluent society became increasingly visible to the poor, the poor remained largely invisible to the affluent in society. In recent years, however, there has been a growing awareness of the continuing magnitude of poverty in Canada.

Perhaps our lack of perceptiveness was caused, in part, by the persistence of the notion of poverty as absolute deprivation. That is to say that the poverty line frequently has been regarded as a level of minimum physical subsistence, just sufficient to maintain life and working capacity. But human needs also comprise many "conventional" or social elements related to the changing ways of life in the community; and, of course, these change over time. Thus more people begin to realize that many are "poor" because they are deprived of the income, opportunities, environment, and self-respect that is regarded as normal in the community to which they belong. Poverty then is to be seen as relative to the continually changing average standard of living in the community; this is not to say, however, that isolated cases of absolute deprivation cannot be found.

(a) Extent of Poverty in Canada

There are various ways of attempting to measure the extent of poverty, and these are under study within the Department. Two reports related to measurement of living standards have been included as appendices to this presentation. Appendix I is entitled "Historical Development of Concepts and Measures of Minimum Living Standards". Appendix II deals with "Family Budgets in Canada".

The rough measure of poverty used by the Economic Council of Canada in its Fifth Annual Review indicates that approximately four million Canadians could be considered to be living at or below a poverty level.⁽¹⁾ Of these, available data from the Canada Assistance Plan and the Old Age Security Program suggest that close to two million currently are receiving income support based on a means or needs test, or an income supplement to Old Age Security; the incomes remain nonetheless below this poverty line. Accordingly, using the Economic Council's measure, we may conclude that most of the remaining two million persons are in families of the working poor who are employed members of the labour force, but whose earnings are below the poverty line.

(b) Causes and Types of Poverty

To be poor does not signify only lack of income; it means lack of opportunities -- for good health, for education, for meaningful employment, for suitable recreation and so forth. Poverty is characterized by a depressing and harmful physical and social environment -- both indoors and outdoors. It leads to a sense of failure, a feeling of alienation, and generates personal and social pathologies.

A variety of categories of poverty may be distinguished. First, cyclical poverty, which refers to the temporary deprivation that may occur on a substantial scale because of a downturn in the business cycle, a crop failure, or the seasonal nature of certain industries. Prolonged massive unemployment following a major downturn in the business cycle, however, has not occurred in Canada since the economic depression of the nineteen thirties. Fiscal and monetary policy as well as income security measures have been successful in reducing the magnitude and impact of periodic recessions, while other measures have helped to cope with the serious Canadian problem of seasonal unemployment.

Much more difficult to deal with is collective poverty which affects populations in particular geographic locations. Such depressed area poverty may arise from lack of natural resources, changes in the natural or technological environment or retarded economic development because of demographic and geographic factors. Collective poverty is found in certain rural and coastal areas, and in towns whose industry is no longer competitive.

Sometimes the concept is also used to describe the poverty of particular ethnic groups or people living in the decaying inner cities. In these cases, however, cultural factors may well dominate the economic factors mentioned before.

Individual poverty results from individual misfortune or incapacity.⁽¹⁾ It may be of a temporary nature arising from injury, illness, unemployment or other circumstances, and is then described as crisis poverty. Poverty may arise also at various stages of the life-cycle -- childhood, parenthood, old age -- when changed circumstances bring it on. On the other hand, some persons may remain handicapped, physically or mentally, for the rest of their lives; such long-term dependencies may lead to very severe poverty.

These various causes may interact frequently to reinforce deprivation and patterns of behaviour which reduce future possibilities for escaping from poverty. Many questions may be posed concerning the effectiveness of social policies designed to combat one or another facet of poverty. Sometimes an approach which is intended to alleviate one aspect may actually aggravate other forms of poverty. For example, it is sometimes argued that higher minimum wages would exclude from the labour market a growing number of workers whose marginal productivity could not match the costs of employing them. That is to say the collective poverty of workers in marginal industry may lead to crisis poverty for all or some, if higher minimum wages should lead to a closing down of that industry.

(1) One exception to this is the voluntary poverty of the Christian ascetic or the hippie.

The extent to which ill health is a cause of poverty or poverty is a cause of ill health is open to argument. We do know that health problems are frequently associated with poverty, and in many cases are chiefly responsible for loss of income. Chronic and disabling conditions may push people into dependency. In Ontario 30 per cent of all General Welfare Assistance recipients in March, 1968, were granted aid because of major health problems, as compared with 43 per cent given aid because of unemployment. Ill health of the principal wage earner may induce, for all family members, the adverse living conditions which in turn contribute to poor health, and low educational achievement, thus perpetuating for them the condition of poverty. There is little doubt, that the impact of ill health on those whose financial and educational resources are severely limited - and this is the case with most of the poor - is often disastrous.

The distinctions drawn between types of poverty and the causes they point to are relevant to the next section in which the Department's policies in respect of poverty are discussed. It is clear that these policies address themselves mainly to individual poverty. Their impact on cyclical and collective poverty, particularly the former cannot be gainsaid, but responsibility for its prevention lies primarily with overall government policy and for its implementation with other departments.

II. POLICIES AGAINST POVERTY

Two basic objectives of social policy in modern industrial states have been to maintain full employment and to achieve freedom from want. Monetary and fiscal policies and related economic measures in the trade, industrial labour and manpower fields have been aimed at the maintenance of full employment, while controlling the rate of inflation. The various income security measures and the health and welfare services that have been introduced have been directed toward freedom from want. These objectives have been related to other goals, such as better opportunities for children and adults to lead full, meaningful and useful lives.

The full employment objective has not been attained throughout Canada in recent years. It has been implicitly assumed that, given the appropriate monetary and fiscal policies, the private sector of the economy will generate enough jobs to maintain a high level of employment. But the industrial system does not respond easily to social objectives; rapid technological change makes it increasingly difficult for unemployed people to find jobs. A much heavier burden than would otherwise be the case is thus thrown on the income support system because the private industrial system does not generate the job opportunities that are required of it. The social security system is blamed for its "failure" to eliminate poverty, when in fact it is the private sector of the economy that has been unable to perform in accordance with public expectations.

The freedom from want objective has also not been fully attained in Canada, for a variety of reasons. One factor which has restricted the development of health and welfare services and income security in Canada has been the lack of clarity in the constitution on jurisdiction in the field of social security. A number of approaches have been employed over the past half century to meet this problem. One of the earliest was the provision by the federal government of grants to the provinces to support health services and to provide income maintenance for the aged. This shared-cost approach has continued to be used in respect of a number of programs - notably, hospital insurance and medical care and the Canada Assistance Plan through which the cost of health and welfare services, as well as income maintenance payments, is shared by the federal government. Another approach is the use of the federal spending power to make direct payments to persons by way of income support through such programs as family allowances and youth allowances.

A third approach has been to amend the constitution to clarify the question of jurisdiction in particular fields. During the depression era of the 1930's when Parliament sought to enact an insurance measure to deal with the problem of income support for the unemployed, the legislation was declared to be ultra vires. With the agreement of all provinces, the federal government accordingly sought an amendment to the British North America Act to give Parliament powers in respect to unemployment insurance and thereby secured authority for the enactment of the Unemployment Insurance Act of 1940. Similarly, the provinces agreed in 1951, and again in 1964, on amendments which gave Parliament concurrent power with the provincial legislatures in respect of retirement insurance and related benefits such as survivors and disability benefits. This authority permitted the federal Parliament to proceed with Old Age Security and Canada Pension Plan legislation.

Through these approaches, the federal and provincial governments have developed the present social security system in Canada. In general, the provinces administer health services and welfare services and social assistance programs which are best administered at the provincial or local level, while the federal government provides support to the provinces in those fields and makes direct income security payments, either on a universal basis as with family allowances and basic old age security, or on an income-test basis as in the guaranteed income supplement program. In addition, the federal government has carried responsibilities for some special groups - notably, veterans, Indians and Eskimos, immigrants, and seamen in need of health care.

The following discussion is concerned primarily with the work of the Department of National Health and Welfare viewed in the context of the total activities of government relevant to poverty. For this purpose, policies against poverty have been grouped into four broad categories: general economic policy, programs to improve the environment, services to improve earning power, and direct income support measures.

Any such separation for discussion purposes should not be interpreted as meaning that each category is self-contained. All are inter-related, and co-ordinated planning is vital for success.

(a) Government Anti-Poverty Policies

(i) General Economic Policy

The Economic Council of Canada has listed the performance goals of the Canadian economy as: full employment, a high and sustained rate of economic growth, reasonable price stability, a viable balance-of-payments position, and an equitable sharing of rising incomes. From this perspective, the most fundamental remedy for unemployment and for poverty is to expand aggregate demand, employment opportunities and incomes. General economic policies designed to maintain a high level of aggregate demand serve as the basic infrastructure underlying all other policies aimed at reducing poverty.

But the Economic Council recognizes also that economic policy consists of more than this. It includes also particular measures directed towards particular regions, sectors or industries of the economy, characterized by slow growth, low wages or "collective poverty". Programs have been developed to increase job opportunities in depressed areas or particular sectors of the economy, and several departments of the federal government are involved, notably the new Department of Regional Economic Expansion, and others such as the Departments of Manpower, Agriculture and Fisheries.

Higher levels of national income have been accompanied by proportionately greater growth in service industries. The "personal service" fields of health, education, welfare, cultural activities, sports and recreation have been a part of this growth. The health industry, for example, is one of Canada's most rapidly growing sources of employment. Numbers employed now total approximately 450,000 persons (75 per cent female) including not only professionals, but also substantial numbers of manual or semi-skilled workers.⁽¹⁾ A major stimulus to this expansion has been the hospital insurance, health resources, and medical care programs administered through the Department of National Health and Welfare.

(1) According to the Royal Commission on Health Services (Vol. I, page 497), "Expansion has taken place largely at the expense of unemployment (actual or underemployment in the home) rather than at the expense of other output these Canadians might have produced."

(ii) Programs to Improve the Physical and Social Environment:

The squalid environment of poverty areas is frequently characterized by substandard housing, overcrowding, ill-health, dreary surroundings, low quality public services, alienation, crime and social pathologies. The importance of a physical and social environment which will help the poor to cope with family crises, and offer the children a means of escape from a life of poverty can scarcely be overstressed. Policies related to these problems are concerned mainly with housing, public and community services, community development, and pollution control.

Housing policy is primarily a responsibility of provincial housing authorities and the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. However, since poor housing conditions are of central importance in perpetuating poverty and disease, the Department of National Health and Welfare has a major interest in the field of housing. Bad housing is a prime obstacle to all anti-poverty efforts; it raises the costs of health and welfare programs. Enforcement of housing standards is essential for the promotion of health and of child and family welfare. A very large increase in low-rent housing projects and housing for low-income families and aged persons is needed to reduce the heavy pressure of shelter costs on low-income family budgets. Any income maintenance programs for needy persons should include sufficient provision for an adequate standard of housing. The problem arises when the total stock of adequate housing is insufficient to meet demand. Under these circumstances assistance recipients and the working poor end up living in substandard housing.

Among community public services that need special attention in low-income areas are parks, playgrounds and recreational facilities, library services, public health services, garbage and sewage disposal, and public transport.

Community development is a technique for helping the poor to deal with social change and to develop approaches to solving their community problems. Community development programs have been sponsored under the Canada Assistance Plan and by the Secretary of State. Under the National Welfare Grants Program community development projects have also been financed.

Problems of pollution leading to deterioration of the physical and social environment have become increasingly important in today's society. Water and air pollution, noise, radiation exposure and the effects of pesticides are matters of growing concern. Responsibility for aspects under federal jurisdiction rests mainly with the Departments of National Health and Welfare, Transport, and Energy, Mines and Resources. This Department has particular responsibilities for the health aspects of water and air pollution across international and interprovincial boundaries, and for radiation protection, and is conducting studies relating to noise, and to pesticide residues in food.

(iii) Services to Improve Earning Power or Reduce Dependency:

Services to reduce dependency and increase vocational skills have always been important as a means of attacking poverty. Educational programs, training schemes, health services, grants to help people to move to new jobs, family counselling and family planning services all contribute to the alleviation of hardship among the poor, the prevention of future dependency, and the rehabilitation and remotivation of the poor toward improved self-care, social functioning and earning power.

But the opportunities offered by these services are frequently grasped only by the more able and least deprived persons; conversely, the providers of service also tend to focus their efforts on individuals with good prospects. Thus, the "hard to reach" individuals, families and groups, are given less attention and become even harder to reach. The need is for massive inputs of service directed to some of the most seriously disadvantaged individuals, families and groups. This means much more money and personnel than are currently being used for these purposes.

This is not to imply that no significant progress has been made. Provincial educational programs have expanded enormously in recent years, and increasing attention is being directed to deprived areas and groups in the population. Federal financial assistance in the costs of vocational education for a number of years, and the expanded post-secondary vocational training scheme of the Department of Manpower has been aimed at up-grading the skills of unemployed and low-wage workers. Improved Counselling and employment services as well as mobility grants of that Department have also greatly strengthened Manpower services across Canada.

The rehabilitation of disabled persons has been a success story for some groups. Provincial workmen's compensation boards and the Department of Veterans Affairs pioneered comprehensive arrangements for persons affected by work-connected and war-connected disabilities respectively. Voluntary agencies also did much useful work for specific disability groups, and beginning in 1953, provincial rehabilitation programs were organized in many provinces when federal financial support was made available for co-ordination of services and for medical rehabilitation. The Department of Manpower currently administers federal-provincial cost-sharing agreements for the vocational rehabilitation of disabled persons. The Department of National Health and Welfare has since 1948, assisted medical rehabilitation services, demonstration or training projects through the National Health Grants, and now operates a national prosthetics service.

Advances have been made in improving the accessibility of health services to the poor, and in removing the financial barriers to health care. The provision to the Indians of Canada and northern residents of geographically accessible health services has been a primary concern of the Department for many years. The National Health Grants Program, introduced in 1948, provided federal grant assistance to a wide variety of health services in the provinces, including local public health activities. The implementation of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act in 1958 made prepaid public ward hospital care universally available to all Canadians in participating provinces; outpatient services too have been included in the program by most provinces. The Canada Assistance Plan, beginning in 1966, enabled the Department to share the cost of a complete range of health care services for public assistance recipients; and the Medical Care Act which became effective on July 1st, 1968, provided for comprehensive physicians services on a universal basis in participating provinces, with federal financial contributions: seven provinces are currently participating. Nevertheless, the Department is aware that many stubborn problems remain to be overcome in meeting the health needs of the poor.

Many problems remain also in the provision of social welfare services designed to prevent future poverty, alleviate existing situations, and foster the rehabilitation of the poor. Comprehensive counselling services, foster home care, institutional care, day care for children and adults, meal services, homemaker services, work activity projects and sheltered workshops are supported under the Canada Assistance Plan, which offers an incentive to the provinces to expand such services by sharing in the cost of both assistance and services.

(iv) Income Support Programs

Income support measures have one or more of the following objectives: first, to provide income support to alleviate the economic circumstances of the poor and to prevent persons from becoming poor; secondly, to provide protection against loss of income arising from certain social risks for all members of society--not just those classified as poor; and thirdly, to redistribute income in favour of certain groups.

In Canada we have five distinct types of income maintenance:

- i) Social Assistance
- ii) Compensation Payments
- iii) Income-tested Allowances
- iv) Universal Demogrants
- v) Social Insurance.

Social Assistance: Public assistance based on the means test and administered by municipalities is the oldest type of income support program. Beginning with Mothers' Allowances in Manitoba in 1916, provincial governments developed province-wide assistance for particular categories of persons. Federal participation began in 1927 with the Old Age Pension legislation, followed later by cost-sharing of Blind Persons Allowances in 1937 and Disabled Persons Allowances in 1954. Federal cost-sharing for general assistance, used extensively during the thirties on an emergency basis, began again in 1956 for employable persons under the Unemployment Assistance Program; "unemployables" were added two years later. The Canada Assistance Plan, which commenced in 1966, involves federal-provincial cost-sharing of both cash payments to needy persons based on a test of needs, and a comprehensive range of services for all categories of public assistance recipients. Other federal assistance programs include war veterans allowances, and cash payments to Indians and Eskimos.

Compensation Payments: Provincial workmen's compensation programs pay cash benefits as compensation for loss of earning capacity arising from work-connected disability or death. War Pensions are provided by the Department of Veterans Affairs as compensation for service-connected disability or death. Although these are regarded as awards for damages, nonetheless they are paid over a period of time in lieu of income.

Income Tested Allowances: Income tax exemptions for dependents may be considered as allowances available to persons above a specified income level, (i.e. persons having taxable income); with rising marginal tax rates the benefit increases as income increases.⁽¹⁾ Conversely, the guaranteed income supplement for old age security recipients introduced by the federal government in 1967, is available to persons below a specified income level; the benefit decreases as income increases. In both instances there is an "income test". Some people have suggested that this technique be used to provide all persons with a basic minimum income - the negative income tax and guaranteed income approaches.

(1) Flat rate tax credits apply to persons above a specified income level, but remain constant for income changes above that level.

Universal Demogrants: A universal demogrant is a flat rate benefit on a universal basis to all persons in a category. This was the approach followed in the federally administered Family Allowances Program introduced in 1944. A similar approach was adopted in 1951 in the federally administered Old Age Security Program providing flat rate pensions to persons 70 years of age and over.

Among subsequent changes in these programs have been higher benefits, introduction of Youth Allowances in 1964, and progressive reduction of the eligible age for Old Age Security to 65 years. Quebec has its own youth allowances program and a supplementary family allowance program, introduced in recent years.

Social Insurance: Social insurance involves periodic contributions as a condition of eligibility for benefits. The first such program in Canada was the federal Unemployment Insurance Program, begun in 1941, to protect workers against loss of income through unemployment. In 1965, the Canada and Quebec Pension Plans were introduced to provide a degree of protection to contributors and their dependants against the risks of loss of income through retirement, death and disability.

(b) Changing Welfare Concepts

Before reviewing departmental programs in detail in Chapters III, IV and V, something should be said about changing welfare concepts as they affect program development. These may be examined in terms of four strategies: prevention, rehabilitation, income-redistribution and participation. While these four objectives are all present in greater or less degree in most anti-poverty programs, the relative emphasis has varied over the years.

During the early post-war years, the preventive strategy dominated economic and social policy. With memories of the depression of the nineteen thirties still fresh, what we have described as cyclical poverty⁽¹⁾ was the main pre-occupation. The primary concern was to prevent another economic depression, and economic policies were, and still are, directed towards the objectives of maintaining full employment and stabilizing the economy. The new major federal programs of income security, (i.e. unemployment insurance, family allowances, and old age pensions) were viewed as "built-in stabilizers" for the economy--important devices for maintaining aggregate demand and stabilizing consumer purchasing power. The attractiveness of the approach was that measures that helped to prevent individual unemployed workers, children and old people from living in poverty, simultaneously helped to modify any recession. Thus, cyclical poverty, life cycle poverty and temporary crisis poverty arising from unemployment⁽¹⁾ could be attacked by policies that also promoted greater national production at the same time.

While the prevention of poverty was a main objective the redistribution of income was an important subsidiary consideration. The maintenance of full employment, of course, improved income distribution by reducing the number of families at the low end of the income scale because of unemployment. Transfers of income from the working population to the main non-working groups also were intended to redistribute income. The income security programs further reflected a new approach to the old Canadian problem of regional economic disparities.' In addition to inter-governmental transfers of funds, transfer payments directed to persons caused a flow of funds from the more prosperous provinces to provinces having higher proportions of unemployed workers, older persons and children in the population. There remained, of course, the problem of the "unemployables" -- long-term dependency among the working age population. This was seen as a gradually diminishing residual problem which could be looked after by the provinces and municipalities using traditional techniques of public assistance; low levels of assistance combined with rehabilitation services would help to reduce the size of the residual group.

To sum up, the essence of the preventive strategy against poverty was full employment for the working-age population, plus universal benefits for all persons at risk in non-working groups. The development of universal benefit programs could proceed step by step in line with economic growth, and in accordance with social priorities. Thus, social insurance for the employable unemployed (1941) was followed by the universal demogrant for children under 16 (1944) and for the aged over 70 (1951); later came universal hospital insurance (1957), and the medical care program (1966), the last two at the option of the provinces. Also, during the fifties and sixties, the coverage of unemployment insurance was extended, and during the sixties the age range of the universal demogrant was extended by youth allowances and by amended old age security. The Canada Pension Plan was enacted in 1965. Social solidarity among all classes of citizens was promoted by these developments, although universal benefit levels were sufficiently low that benefits did not interfere with incentives to employment.

But as universal programs have progressed, problems of cost have come to the forefront. Increasingly, despite the growth of the gross national product, rising expenditure levels have inhibited extension of benefits, endangered adequacy of benefits, and have forced reconsideration of the concept of universality. In the case of health care, rapidly rising costs of insured services have generated pressures to examine the efficiency of the health delivery system, and to re-introduce some form of direct payments by patients. In the case of universal demogrant, the age range has been extended, but benefit levels for family allowances have not kept pace with increases in the cost of living. There remain some gaps and inadequacies in the protection afforded by the unemployment insurance program and the Canada Pension Plan. Thus, the effectiveness of universal programs in preventing poverty has become increasingly restricted by cost considerations.

At the same time, full employment policies failed to solve the problem of poverty. Rapid economic growth generally meant that various areas and groups, both rural and urban, were increasingly left behind by economic progress elsewhere, thus increasing their "relative poverty". Wage levels for relatively unskilled work failed to keep pace with other sectors of the labour force, thus highlighting the phenomenon of the "working poor". The influx of rural residents and immigrants into urban areas created many new problems and pressures, which tended to push vulnerable individuals and families into crisis poverty and long-term dependency. The available structures of health, welfare and educational services and of income support measures (despite changes and improvements) seemed increasingly inadequate to cope with the problems.

Yet as noted earlier, the social security system is blamed for the failure of the private industrial sector to meet the problem of poverty due to unemployment in a period of rapid technological change when the structure of family relationships has weakened considerably. In periods of full employment, the people who are on social assistance will be the aged, the disabled, mothers with small children, and the unemployable. These people really need help; they are not on the assistance rolls due to any lack of individual motivation. In our complex industrial society which seems unable to provide a high level of employment, there are also a large number of unemployed persons on the assistance rolls. These people are there through no fault of their own -- they need income support, and the kind of society we have developed makes it hard for them to obtain income in any other way.

The demonstrated insufficiency of the preventive strategy of full employment and universal benefits appears to be bringing about divergent results. On the one hand, the effects of the broad preventive strategy are being pushed forward into the future. That is to say that under the Canada Pension Plan, for example, the preventive effects in reducing the number of persons who would otherwise be in needy circumstances will be felt only gradually over many years. Similarly, many observers are stressing that increased output from the economy over the long-term is the only ultimate way of providing a satisfactory living standard for all citizens.

On the other hand, in the short-term the preventive strategy is being increasingly merged with and subordinated to a rehabilitation strategy and an income redistribution strategy. That is to say that there is a growing movement in favour of more selectivity in the provision of cash income directed to persons having the greatest need. This parallels the growing awareness that inflationary pressure (a side effect of full employment policy) as well as counter-inflationary policy both tend to have selective adverse effects on low-income groups. As contrasted with universalism which tends to promote social solidarity, selectivity tends towards a more clear-cut division between "the haves and the have nots".

The rehabilitation strategy aims to build up earning capacities and reduce dependency by promoting opportunities and encouraging independence. It focuses on individuals and tries to give them the tools to lift themselves out of poverty. Beginning with the physically disabled, following successful methods developed for workers and war veterans, this approach has been extended to the chronically ill, the mentally handicapped and retarded, and various "socially" disabled persons. It involves co-ordinated provision of counselling and guidance, health care, welfare services, training and job placement services directed towards deprived individuals and families. Co-operation among many agencies and all levels of government is essential.

In the early post-war years, the rehabilitation strategy was seen as complementary to the preventive approach, and as being directed to the residual group affected by crisis poverty and long-term dependency; this was perceived as arising mainly from physical or mental disability or illness. Gradually, a broader approach has emerged, stimulated by the developing notion of "structural" imbalance in the economy. Not only the disabled, but all poor persons are viewed as underutilized resources of human capital. As pointed out by the Economic Council, many suffer from "remedial disadvantages, such as lack of education or training, lack of information about job opportunities, inability to move to known job opportunities, poor work habits, and poor physical or mental health stemming from economic deprivation".

Arising from recognition of this situation, the systems of training and education are being reorganized to weld together the needs of the poor for appropriate skills, and the needs of the economy for workers in various occupations. Methods of developing job opportunities, work activity projects, sheltered workshops and employment services are being given more attention and resources than formerly. In the field of health care, an emphasis on prevention and rehabilitation implies reorganization to promote the efficient delivery of the right service to the right person in the right place at the right time. Similarly, welfare services can be directed to areas of greatest need, and as specified in the Canada Assistance Plan, this may include services for persons likely to become needy if such services are not provided. This approach, if successful, has the happy result of increasing the gross national product while reducing the number of families in poverty.

It should be pointed out that selectivity in the provision of services is not contradictory to universal availability of benefits. If services are to be selectively directed to areas of greatest need in an efficient way, universal availability of benefits without a financial barrier to persons requiring them, is a necessary prerequisite for optimum allocation.

The distributive strategy reflects a growing pre-occupation with cash transfers stemming from recognition of the injustice of the existing distribution of income. It is being better understood that the vast majority of the poor are in their unfortunate situation through no fault of their own. Moreover, the tax policies often fall heavily on the poor requiring them to pay taxes from meagre resources.

As already noted, the universal demogrant of the early post-war years had important redistribution effects on non-workers and on less wealthy regions. However, gradual inflation combined with continuing low wage levels for unskilled work muted these effects among employed persons; furthermore due to inflation and continuing long-term unemployment in depressed areas, poverty arising from long-term dependency increased instead of gradually "withering away" as had been hoped.

In line with the early post-war view of residual poverty as being caused mainly by physical or mental incapacity, federal policy aimed at supplementing universal benefit programs with financial support for provincially administered means test assistance for blind persons (1937), elderly persons 65 to 70 years of age (1951), and permanently and totally disabled persons (1954). A new departure in 1956, however, heralded the beginning of a trend towards a broader base for income redistribution on a selective rather than universal basis. The Unemployment Assistance Act (1956) extended federal sharing to provincial and local assistance for the employable unemployed; two years later unemployables also were included. This increased federal aid gradually stimulated pressure in favour of more adequate benefits based on a more selective approach designed to help those who most need such assistance.

During the sixties there was increasing criticism of the universal demogrant as providing inadequate benefits for those needing it, while at the same time (despite the element of recovery through the income tax machinery) providing income support to many persons who don't need it. Social assistance programs also have come to be widely criticized as being unnecessarily complex, of depriving the recipient of dignity, and of denying him the ability to participate in community life because allowances are inadequate and restrictive. These changing attitudes have stimulated a search for new approaches, of which the use of a declaration of income which is tested impersonally through the income tax machinery is an example; this has been incorporated into the Guaranteed Income Supplement program for the aged.

Within public assistance itself, the trend has been toward a needs test rather than a means test as a means of measuring the assistance to be provided; and this approach was incorporated into the Canada Assistance Plan (1966). Between 1959 and 1969 the number of assistance recipients in Canada approximately doubled. Undoubtedly, benefit levels have gained on unskilled wage levels over this period, despite the development of minimum wage legislation. The minimum wage has tended to set a ceiling on further changes in assistance levels, which otherwise might reduce work incentives. A higher minimum wage helps not only the working poor but also ceases to act as a deterrent to more adequate assistance levels. A low minimum wage can adversely affect the incentive to work among those who would fare better on assistance than at work. On the contrary, a high minimum wage can increase unemployment among low-paid workers whose higher wages are not justified by their low productivity; this applies particularly to marginal industry. A further point to be made is that minimum wages do not take into account the number of children a wage earner may have; family allowances and tax deductions somewhat compensate for this. If an adequate minimum living standard is to be achieved, either sufficient cash payments must be made to large numbers of unemployed persons, or work opportunities must be provided by government serving directly as the "employer of last resort". For those who are long-term dependency cases unable to work, cash income maintenance is the only approach left open. This is the distributive strategy.

The participation strategy is based on the growing awareness of the need to involve the people directly affected by social development programs in their planning, development and implementation if these programs are to be successful. This awareness stems from our increased understanding of the process through which people individually and in groups learn to accept and use their own resources, as well as the technical and financial resources of the community, to develop new solutions to their problems.

This strategy is based on the concept that people have a right to exercise influence over the forces in their environment which affect them, and that those affected are in the best position to identify their problems and needs, decide on their priorities, plan solutions, and participate in their implementation. There is also a growing awareness that people can only begin to develop the skills, the knowledge and the commitment to deal in more adequate ways with their environment through the experience which grows out of participation.

The effectiveness of this approach is usually of a long-term nature, with positive results and increased capacity of citizens only becoming evident after periods of several years of relatively intensive action aimed at promoting citizen participation. The effectiveness of this approach has been demonstrated by the growing ability of Indian and Métis people in dealing with their own situations, articulating their needs and entering a position of negotiation with government regarding future programs and policies which will directly affect their position and status in our society.

There has been a fairly rapid realization among other disadvantaged groups, including welfare recipients, that they too can achieve positive development through collective action. This is being demonstrated by the variety of welfare rights groups, tenants associations, and community improvement groups which have sprung up among low income citizens in the past year or so.

As citizens groups gain experience in participation they have shown an increasing ability to be more effective and to achieve positive results more quickly. Government has recognized the advantages and often the necessity of promoting citizen participation to make its own plans and programs more effective and to reduce the dependency-inducing nature of many of its present services. To this end the department has, and is currently, supporting a number of special projects and activities aimed at initiating, encouraging and experimenting with this approach.

Direct support for such projects has been provided from the program of funding for welfare demonstration projects (see Appendix III). Projects of a similar nature but with a health orientation are being considered for funding in the present fiscal year under the health grants program. Projects with a social-recreational focus are being explored for possible funding by the Physical Fitness and Amateur Sport Directorate of the Department in the new fiscal year. The Department supports activities and programs geared to participation of consumers of service and disadvantaged groups generally under the cost-sharing agreements in the Canada Assistance Plan.

Agreement has been reached with the National Indian Brotherhood which is establishing an Indian Health Committee to meet with the Minister semi-annually to recommend improvements in policy and administration of health services for Indians, and at any time to report cases of poor or inadequate health services. Indian liaison officers have been appointed to improve communication between the Indian people and departmental medical officers. Indian representatives are studying ways in which their people can make more effective use of the fitness and amateur sports grants that are available to improve Indian recreational facilities.

The Department has also established a National Council of Welfare, an advisory body to the Minister, which includes substantial representation from low income, welfare recipient and economically disadvantaged minority groups, and which is designed to serve as a vehicle through which the poor can enter into dialogue with government on the efficacy of present programs and participate in the development of new ones.

The citizen participation strategy rests on the principle of collective self-help and is dependent upon a responsiveness among the poor to such a course of collective action. Although a certain number of these organizations have come into being through the sponsorship of local social agencies or government, they are most largely a spontaneous phenomenon initiated by the poor themselves. As a phenomenon these groups post-date the observations in the Economic Council of Canada's 5th Annual Review that "the poor tend to be collectively inarticulate, lack the education and organization to make themselves heard ... (and) have few spokesmen and groups to represent them and give voice to their needs".

The Department views the emergence of these self-help groups among the poor as a highly positive development. If, as the Economic Council suggests, the absence of such groups has been among the reasons for the perpetuation of poverty, the presence of such groups offers the prospect of reaching the roots of what the Economic Council's report described as the "sense of entrapment and hopelessness accumulated defeat, alienation and despair which often so tragically are inherited by the next and succeeding generations".

(c) Role and Structure of the Department of National Health and Welfare

The functions of the Minister of National Health and Welfare are set out in the Department of National Health and Welfare Act as follows:

- "5. The duties, powers and functions of the Minister extend to and include all matters relating to the promotion or preservation of the health, social security and social welfare of the people of Canada over which the Parliament of Canada has jurisdiction and, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, particularly the following matters:

- i) Co-operation with provincial authorities with a view to the co-ordination of efforts made or proposed for preserving and improving the public health and providing for the social security and welfare of the people of Canada."

The major activities of the Department may be summarized as follows: direct administration of nation-wide income security programs, health care for special groups such as Indians, and food and drug control; administration of grants-in-aid for social assistance and welfare services, health care programs, health resources, training of personnel and health and welfare research; provision of technical assistance and consultative services to the provinces; research and statistics; and co-ordination of health and welfare efforts within Canada and of Canadian international participation.

Although the Department of National Health and Welfare has the major responsibility for health and social welfare programs at the federal level, other departments -- the Departments of Veterans Affairs, Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Labour, Manpower and Immigration, in particular-- have an important role in the provision of services which complement those of this Department.

(i) Organization

Under the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Department is grouped in three branches:

The Welfare Branch under the executive authority of the Deputy Minister of National Welfare; the Health Branch is under the executive authority of the Deputy Minister of National Health; the Administration Branch which includes the Research and Statistics Directorate, is under the authority of the two Deputy Ministers.

Welfare

Under the Deputy Minister of National Welfare are the Income Security Branch, the Welfare Assistance and Services Branch, the Fitness and Amateur Sports Branch and the Special Programmes Branch.

Income Security Branch

- The Canada Pension Plan,
- Family and Youth Allowances,
- Old Age Security and Guaranteed Income Supplement.

Welfare Assistance and Services Branch

- The Canada Assistance Plan,
- Old Age Assistance,
- Blind Persons Allowances,
- Disabled Persons Allowances,
- Welfare Grants Program.

Fitness and Amateur Sports Branch Special Programmes Branch

- International Welfare,
- Emergency Welfare,
- Special Projects.

Health

Under the Deputy Minister of National Health, the four main branches include Health Insurance and Resources, Medical Services, Health Services, and Food and Drug.

Health Insurance and Resources Branch

- National Health Grants Program,
- Health Resources Program,
- Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Program,
- Medical Care Insurance Program,
- Health Facilities Design.

Medical Services Branch

- Indian Health Services,
- Northern Health Services,
- Civil Service Health,
- Civil Aviation Medicine
- Immigration Medical,
- Quarantine,
- Public Health Inspection.

Health Services Branch

- Child and Adult Health (Health Education, Smoking and Health, Chronic Illness and Aging, Child and Maternal Health, Dental Health, Mental Health, Nutrition)
- Environmental Health (Occupational Health, Radiation Protection, Public Health Engineering),
- Rehabilitation Services,
- Laboratory of Hygiene,
- Emergency Health Services,
- Research Development - Epidemiology - Public Health Nursing.

Food and Drug Control

International Health - Special Projects

Administration Branch

- General Administration,
- Information Services,
- General Counsel,
- Research and Statistics (Biostatistics, Health Research, Social Security, International Welfare and Special Projects, Welfare Research).

(ii) Main Programs

The development of the main departmental programs related to poverty may be listed in chronological order of enactment as follows:

- 1927 - Old Age Pensions
- 1937 - Blind Persons Allowances,
- 1944 - Family Allowances,
- 1948 - National Health Grants,
- 1951 - Old Age Security,
- 1951 - Old Age Assistance,
- 1954 - Disabled Persons Allowances,
- 1956 - Unemployment Assistance,
- 1957 - Hospital Insurance,
- 1962 - National Welfare Grants,
- 1964 - Youth Allowances,
- 1965 - Canada Pension Plan,
- 1966 - Health Resources Fund,
- 1966 - Canada Assistance Plan,
- 1966 - Guaranteed Income Supplement,
- 1966 - Medical Care Insurance.

(iii) Expenditures

Departmental expenditures on these programs have been increasing steadily. In Table 1 are shown the expenditures over the last ten years on our departmental social security programs, and the percentages that these outlays represented of total federal spending. For purposes of comparison, four additional tables have been provided showing:

Table 2 - Social security expenditures by all three levels of government on particular kinds of benefits.

Table 3 - The percentages that total expenditures on health and on social welfare by all three levels of government represent of our gross national product.

Table 4 - A breakdown of total social security spending for each level of government.

Table 5 - A breakdown of health and social welfare spending for each level of government.

III DEPARTMENTAL WELFARE PROGRAMS(1) PEOPLE

The welfare programs operated by the Department have been developed to meet the needs of specific categories of people.

(a) Aged Persons

In 1968 persons 65 years of age and over numbered 1,604,700 and comprised 7.7 per cent of Canada's population. (1) Using the criteria of the Economic Council of Canada, we can estimate approximately 45 per cent of these older persons are at or below the poverty line, and that they comprise about 16 per cent of the "poor" population of Canada.

The broad objective of social policy for aged and retired persons has been to provide protection against loss of income due to age, and specialized services to meet the varied needs of elderly people. Just as adequate income maintenance through transfer payments is essential for older people, so also are the services that enable them to live comfortably, creatively and independently for as long as possible, and with appropriate social and recreational outlets.

Initially, government involvement in protection against loss of income due to age was limited to destitute persons; the technique was public assistance based on a test of means; the level of support was bare physical subsistence; and the administering authority was at the local level. But during the past several decades there has been increasing participation by federal and provincial governments; income maintenance has been extended to aged persons regardless of income. The newer techniques include the universal demogrant for aged persons and the selective income supplement. In addition, there is contributory social insurance providing retirement benefits and the universal coverage of hospital and medical care insurance. In some cases further assistance and services may be provided through social assistance.

Basic income security for all persons 65 years of age and over is provided through the federal government's universal Old Age Security scheme. Under the same legislation a Guaranteed Income Supplement Program provides needy aged persons with a monthly supplement, subject to an income test. For aged persons with special needs, some provinces provide through their public assistance programs supplementary cash assistance, institutional care, welfare and health services, and the federal government shares half the costs under the Canada Assistance Plan. Hospital Care (all provinces) and medical care (seven provinces) are available on a prepaid basis under provincially administered programs, financed jointly by provincial and federal governments.

For aged persons who are not quite so needy, another approach has been developed which provides additional income security for the current working population when they reach retirement age. Income support for contributors reaching the age of 65 will be available through the Canada Pension Plan.

(1) See Dominion Bureau of Statistics "Estimated Population by Sex and Age group for Canada and Provinces, June 1, 1968".

This is a contributory social insurance program covering almost the entire working population, which will provide additional benefits above the basic Old Age Security Pension to all contributors on retirement. Additionally, there is a network of private pension plans across Canada which provides additional benefits for a substantial portion of the working population as they reach retirement age.

(b) Children

Many studies have documented the disadvantages suffered by children in poor families -- ill-health, sordid environment, lack of educational opportunity and so forth. The number of such vulnerable children is large. Of Canada's 7 million children under the age of 16 in 1966, an estimated 1.6 million or 23 per cent belonged to families estimated to be living in poverty. In terms of the total number of Canadians estimated to belong to poor families, perhaps 40 per cent are children under 16 years of age.

Income maintenance has been the preferred approach of federal and provincial governments towards equalizing opportunities for children; transfer payments are intended to assist large families and to supply protection against the loss of the breadwinner. Unlike some European countries relatively less emphasis has been placed on benefits in kind such as free or subsidized school meals, day nurseries, domestic help, rent subsidies and other specific services. Free education and health care have been extended widely in Canada, but apart from this Canada relies mainly on local and voluntary organizations to respond to particular needs for services not readily available to poor children through the market.

Historically, severe deprivation was the main concern; local government supplied public assistance and voluntary societies undertook child protection services. The provinces followed with mothers' allowances and support for or provision of child protection and care, services for unmarried mothers and adoption services. Children in other needy families continued to be assisted under various public assistance programs. Beginning in 1966, the Canada Assistance Plan made available comprehensive federal financial support for both assistance and services for needy children.

National concern for the economic welfare of children was first expressed through income tax legislation -- tax exemptions for children. Later, in 1944, the Family Allowance program was introduced as a positive system of transfer payments applicable to children under the age of 16. Through the fifties and sixties, improved health and education services with equal accessibility for rich and poor alike became important social goals; schooling allowances in Quebec in 1961 and the federal Youth Allowances Program in 1964 were part of the search for ways of encouraging children to continue their education. More recently, the provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland have developed additional income support measures for families with children.

Social insurance is the other method for protecting children against loss of income to the breadwinner or directly against loss of the breadwinner. Payments without a means or needs test for surviving dependent children are made under the workmen's compensation, and war pension programs, and have been available since early 1968 under the Canada and Quebec Pension Plans. Benefits will be available in 1970 under the Canada and Quebec Pension Plan for children of disabled contributors.

(c) Disabled Persons

Disabled persons comprise a significant element of the poor in Canada, and undoubtedly various forms of disabling illness and injury play an important role in bringing on poverty.

Physical and mental defects that lead to disability affect a substantial proportion of the population. It is estimated that congenital defects, chronic diseases and accidents restrict at least one person in ten in carrying out the usual activities of daily living. Several provincial welfare departments have indicated that about one-third of assistance recipients are in families receiving aid because of ill-health or disability.

Originally, physically or mentally disabled needy persons had to rely on general assistance or "poor relief" administered by local authorities. Subsequently, a variety of income maintenance programs financed by federal, provincial and municipal governments have been developed to provide cash assistance to disabled persons and their dependents. Some of these, such as Disability Pensions for war veterans and for disabled workers covered by Workmen's Compensation legislation, are based on the principle of cash compensation for war-connected or work-connected disability, with payment based partly on the degree of functional incapacity regardless of any subsequent earnings. Other programs such as Blind Persons Allowances and Disabled Persons Allowances, make eligibility for benefits dependent upon a means test as well as the degree of functional incapacity.

Income support and rehabilitation services began first for particular categories of disabled persons, while more recent programs have been extended to cover all types of disability. The Ontario Workmen's Compensation Law of 1914, later imitated by other provinces, embodied the principles of collective liability, medical aid, cash disability benefits and comprehensive rehabilitation services for work-connected injury, disease or disability. The federal government operated comprehensive services for war veterans, and awarded disability pensions for service-connected permanent disability. Blindness allowances on a means-test basis were introduced as a shared federal-provincial program in 1937.

After the war, Medical rehabilitation services were encouraged by national health grant support to the provinces. Beginning in 1954, disabled persons with "permanent and total disability" who could pass a means test became eligible for allowances under a new federal-provincial shared-cost program. In some provinces this program is being merged with the Canada Assistance Plan. Beginning in 1970, under the Canada and Quebec Pension Plans pensions are payable to disabled contributors who qualify.

(d) Widows and One-Parent Families

According to the 1966 Census of Canada, there were about 300,000 families headed by a female, containing about 472,000 dependent children. Undoubtedly, a large proportion of these families are living at or below the poverty level, many of them being recipients of social assistance. There are a variety of reasons for this type of family situation: separation, divorce, widowhood, desertion, unmarried parenthood and so forth.

Fatherless families have normally received income support through the public assistance structure. In cases where the situation arises from separation, desertion or divorce, attempts may be made through the courts to obtain maintenance payments from the father for the mother and children. Otherwise, such families are frequently dependent entirely on social assistance. Additional separate provision for widows exists in some provinces.

In all provinces assistance is available to needy mothers with dependent children. The first categorical program for mothers' allowances was established in Manitoba in 1916; other provinces followed suit until all had such legislation by 1949. Provision was made for provincial allowances for needy widows, mothers with disabled husbands and certain other categories of needy mothers with dependent children. These programs were excluded from federal sharing of costs when the Unemployment Assistance Program was begun in 1956; they continued to be excluded when the program was extended to include "unemployables" in 1958. However, all such special income support programs were brought under the umbrella of the Canada Assistance Plan in 1966.

With the coming of the Canada Assistance Plan (and prior to it in several instances) the provinces have discontinued mothers' allowances as separate programs, and have made assistance available to needy mothers on the same basis as to other needy persons and their dependents.

Social insurance protection for widows, orphans and one-parent families (arising from death of the breadwinner) is provided under the Canada Pension Plan. Benefit levels, however, are not intended to provide full maintenance, and where other income is not available, would have to be supplemented by social assistance.

(e) Other People in Need

Single persons and couples without dependent children generally do not qualify under the various programs designed to meet the needs of particular categories in the population. However, the Unemployment Assistance program in 1956 was developed to protect unemployed persons in need, regardless of family status, and was extended in 1958 to cover "unemployable" persons as well. The Canada Assistance Plan of 1966 was intended to cover all cases in which need could be shown. However, as provincial assistance plans have been developed, they have not generally recognized the needs of employed persons working at very low rates of pay -- the "working poor".

In general, assistance benefits are not available to the "working poor" under existing policies. This is despite the fact that there are no bars in the Canada Assistance Plan or in agreements made with the provinces under that statute to federal sharing of assistance to fully employed persons. Some provinces specifically preclude payment of assistance as a general policy to fully employed persons; others do not. In practice, however, payment of assistance in such provinces is on a highly restricted basis and is usually confined to families in which extreme hardship can be identified.

The suggestion that public assistance be made available to the fully employed raises the hotly disputed question of incentives, especially when it is considered in relation to the provision of adequate scales of assistance to the unemployable. The objection is often raised that if assistance is provided at a satisfactory level for the unemployable it may become a disincentive for self-support for partly employable recipients of assistance and for the fully employed who may be able to earn no more than is available under assistance. Here is the basic dilemma. If assistance programs provide adequate support for unemployables, assist employable recipients at the same level, and provide no income exemptions, the latter will have no incentive for employment. If employables are allowed partial exemptions of earned income above a level of basic adequacy, not only is a massive expenditure of public funds required to support incomes beyond that level, but the programs are accused of subsidizing substandard wages. If, to provide a work incentive for people who can earn, some form of income guarantee is set at less than the minimum adequate level, the problem of providing an adequate minimum for those who cannot work remains.

(2) PROGRAMS

The Departmental programs mentioned briefly above in connection with the categories of people they were designed to serve are discussed below in more detail.

(a) Old Age Security

(i) Universal Demogrant

The objective of the old age security program has been to provide a basic pension as a floor on which Canadians could build a retirement income. Under the Old Age Security Act of 1951, a universal pension of $79.58 a month is now payable by the federal government to all persons who meet the residence and age qualifications. The pension is adjusted by increases in the Pension Index developed for the Canada Pension Plan; the ceiling for increases in any one year is 2 per cent per year. Adjustments have brought the benefit to $79.58 a month beginning in January 1970.

The old age security benefit may be described as a universal demogrant which covers practically the entire aged population with the exception of the few who do not have 10 years of residence. (1)

The amount of old age security pension has almost doubled from $40 to $79.58 since it was introduced in 1951; over the same period the consumer price index increased by about 44 per cent, while average weekly industrial earnings went up by 138 per cent. The universal flat-rate pension goes equally to men and women, is not related to previous earnings, and does not require a retirement test. It is not intended to provide for total maintenance, but rather to serve as a floor for basic income.

- (1) The pension is payable to a person of attained age who has resided in Canada for ten years immediately preceding his application for the pension. Any gaps in the ten-year period may be made up if the applicant has resided in Canada in earlier years for periods of time equal in total to double the length of the gaps; in this case, however, the applicant must also have resided in Canada for the year immediately before his application for pension. A 1965 amendment authorized the payment of the pension to persons who have had 40 years of residence in Canada since age 18, thus making eligible for the pension persons who have left Canada before reaching the qualifying age but have spent virtually all of their working lives in Canada. A pensioner may absent himself from Canada and continue to receive payments. If he has lived in Canada for 25 years since his 21st birthday, payment outside of Canada may continue indefinitely; if not, payment is continued for six months, in addition to the month of departure, and is then suspended, to be resumed only with the month in which he returns to Canada.

(ii) Guaranteed Income Supplement

The main objective of the guaranteed income supplement is to provide additional income support for old age security recipients who because of age will be assisted only slightly by the Canada and Quebec Pension Plans (see below). The Plan which came into effect in 1967 by amendment to the Old Age Security Act, is limited to pensioners born on or before December 31, 1910, and utilizes an income test for determining eligibility.

The concept of a guaranteed annual income as applied to this age group represents an important new feature in Canada's social security system. The maximum supplement payable is 40 per cent of the amount of the flat-rate Old Age Security pension. With the escalation of that pension, the maximum supplement has increased from $30 in 1967 to $31.83 in 1970. The combined Old Age Security pension and the maximum supplement now provides an annual income of $1,336.92 for a single pensioner, and $2,673.84 for married pensioners.

Pensioners with income in addition to their old age security pension may receive partial benefits. The maximum supplement is reduced by $1 a month for every full $2 a month of income over and above the old age security pension and any supplement that may have been received. In the case of a married couple, each is considered to have one-half of their combined income. (1)

- (1) Where one spouse will not be receiving an old age security pension at any time in the current year, to make allowance for that fact, six times the amount of the monthly old age security pension is deducted from one-half of the combined income in calculating the income of the pensioner for Guaranteed Income Supplement purposes. Payments will not be made to married couples unless both spouses submit returns. However, in order to prevent undue hardship when no statement of income is obtainable from one spouse, the other, in certain circumstances, may be deemed to be single for purposes of determining income. Furthermore, although marital status is determined as at December 31 of the preceding year, even if this status should change in the current year, a special provision allows a person to be deemed either married or single in the preceding year.

The Guaranteed Income Supplement program is administered in conjunction with the Old Age Security Pension program. An application for the supplement is sent to each person when he begins to receive the Old Age Security pension and subsequently at the beginning of each calendar year.⁽¹⁾ Entitlement is reassessed each year on the basis of the pensioner's income in the preceding year.⁽²⁾

Slightly more than 50 per cent of old age security recipients also received the guaranteed income supplement in 1969 as shown in the table below; approximately 31 per cent were eligible for the full amount of the supplement.

(iii) OAS and GIS

The total cost of the combined program is estimated to reach $1.9 billion in the fiscal year 1970-71. Old Age Security and GIS payments are financed through the Old Age Security Fund. This Fund obtains its revenues from the following earmarked taxes: a 4 per cent tax on taxable personal income subject to a limit of $240 a year; other sources of finance are a 3 per cent sales tax and a 3 per cent tax on corporation income.

The benefit is subject to income tax, and thus is recovered in part from persons with taxable incomes.

The program is administered by the Family Allowances, Youth Allowances and Old Age Security Division of the Department of National Health and Welfare through regional offices located in each provincial capital.

- (1) If a pensioner who is in receipt of a supplement leaves Canada, the supplement will be paid for the month of departure and for six further months. If he has not returned by then, payment will be discontinued but may be paid again upon his return. If on the date when a supplement might otherwise become payable to a pensioner he has been absent from Canada for six months, no supplement may be paid until his return. If his absence has been for less than six months, a supplement may be paid until he has been away for six months. It will then be discontinued until his return.
- (2) Entitlement to a supplement is normally based on the pensioner's income in the previous year. However, where a pensioner retired from employment or self-employment in that year or in the current year, he may elect to substitute estimates of certain income items (such as employment earnings and pensions) in the current year for that which he actually received in the preceding year. This may allow him to show a lower income and hence to become eligible for a higher supplement.

(b) Family and Youth Allowances(i) Family Allowances

The Family Allowances Act of 1944, administered by the Department of National Health and Welfare, is designed to assist in providing equal opportunity for all Canadian children. The allowances do not involve a means test and are paid from the federal Consolidated Revenue Fund. Unlike old age security pensions, family allowances are not taxable income.⁽¹⁾

Allowances are payable in respect of every child under the age of 16 years who was born in Canada, or who has been a resident of the country for one year, or whose father or mother has been domiciled in Canada from a date three years immediately prior to the date of birth of the child. Payment is made by cheque each month, normally to the mother, although any person who substantially maintains the child may be paid the allowance on his behalf. Allowances are paid at the monthly rate of $6 for each child under 10 years of age, and $8 for each child aged 10 or over but under 16 years. If the allowances are not spent for the purposes outlined in the Act, payment may be discontinued or made to some other person or agency on behalf of the child. Allowances are not payable for any child who fails to comply with provincial school or attendance legislation, who ceases to be maintained by a parent, who ceases to be a resident of Canada, or on behalf of a girl who is married and under 16 years of age.⁽²⁾

The original broad objective of the program was to correct to a degree the imbalance between family income and family need, and to make an investment in the children of Canada. It provided for a redistribution of income in favour of low income families and low income regions of the country.

The objectives of the program are still being met, but to a much lesser extent than earlier. While $560 million are being redistributed each year, the impact is not as great as it would otherwise be because family allowances have not kept pace with the growth in national income and the purchasing power of Canadian families. The gross national product was $11.9 billion in 1946 and $71.5 billion in 1968. When the program was in full operation in 1946, the average weekly industrial wage in Canada was approximately $32.50 per week; it is now $120 per week. The cost of living has risen by 111 per cent since 1946. By contrast, the average monthly family allowance payment per family between March, 1947, and March, 1969, has increased by 15 per cent; the average payment per child went up 12 per cent.

- (1) There is an element of recovery from income taxpayers through the smaller income tax exemption for children eligible for allowances. The tax exemption for dependent children qualified for family allowances is $300 per child, as compared with $550 for children not qualified for such allowances.
- (2) The federal government also pays family assistance, at the rates applicable for family allowances, for each child under 16 years of age resident in Canada and supported by an immigrant who has landed for permanent residence in Canada, or by a Canadian returned to Canada to reside permanently. The assistance, which is payable monthly for the first year of the child's residence in Canada, is intended to bridge the gap until the child becomes eligible for family allowances. The eligibility requirements, other than that relating to length of residence are the same for family assistance as for family allowances.

The table below sets out recent statistics on the family allowances program:

(1) Based on gross payment for March.

It should be noted that two provinces have added supplements to the federal family allowance scheme.

The province of Newfoundland introduced its parents supplement (schooling allowances) program in 1966. Under this scheme, an annual benefit of $15 is paid in semi-annual instalments for each eligible child who is registered at and attending a school other than a trade school or university. There is no age limit specified in the legislation but the allowance terminates when the child leaves school.

The province of Quebec introduced its own family allowances program under legislation enacted in 1967. Under this plan the following allowances are paid at the end of each six-month period to persons satisfying the relationship and residence requirements in respect of children under 16 years of age: $15 for one child, $32.50 for two children, $52.50 for three children, $77.50 for four, $107.50 for five, $142.50 for six, and an extra $35 for each child after the sixth. These allowances are increased by $5 for each child between the ages of 12 and 16 years. To qualify for the allowances, children must be attending school regularly from the time when they are first required to do so, unless prevented by physical or mental infirmity.

(ii) Youth Allowances

Legislation providing for youth allowances became effective September 1, 1964. The Federal Government does not provide youth allowances in Quebec, which has had its own program called "schooling allowances" since 1961. With the introduction of the federal scheme, Quebec agreed to make certain changes in its schooling allowances program so that it would be comparable to the federal measure; since then that province has been compensated by a tax abatement adjusted to equal the amount that the federal government would otherwise have paid in allowances to Quebec residents. The federal youth allowances together with the Quebec schooling allowances programs cover all eligible young people in Canada. The federal program is administered by the Department of National Health and Welfare, and payments are made from the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

Under the federal program monthly allowances of $10 are payable in respect of all dependent children aged 16 and 17 who are receiving full-time educational training or are precluded from doing so by reason of physical or mental infirmity. Both the parent or guardian and the child must normally be physically present and living in a province other than Quebec.⁽¹⁾

Allowances normally commence with the month following that in which family allowances cease and continue until the school year terminates. They are paid retroactively for the summer months when the child returns to school at the commencement of the new school year. Allowances for a disabled child not attending school are payable continuously throughout the year. Should a student leave school, leave the country permanently, cease to be maintained, take up residence in Quebec, or die, the allowance will cease. Otherwise, the youth allowance continues until the end of the month in which the young person reached age 18.

Youth allowances are not considered to be income for any purpose of the Income Tax Act. A higher personal exemption under the Income Tax Act is provided for dependent children age 16 and over than for children under 16. Receipt of youth or schooling allowance does not change this entitlement under the Income Tax Act.

The objectives of the program were primarily social ones, closely related to manpower policy; the new program has, of course, increased the average monthly payment per family and per child. The social objective was to encourage children to remain in school at least until the age of 18; in June 1966, the number of youth allowance recipients was 408,979 or 81 per cent of the census population outside Quebec aged 16 and 17. Another objective has been to assist handicapped children before they qualify for disabled persons' allowance at age 18.

(1) The federal allowance is not payable to a parent who resides in Quebec or outside Canada, regardless of where his child may be attending school. However, a child may attend school in Quebec or outside Canada or, if disabled, receive care or training in Quebec or outside Canada, and still be considered eligible, on the basis that he is a resident of a province other than Quebec but is temporarily absent.

The table below gives summary statistics on the youth allowances program:

(c) Canada Pension Plan

In 1965, the enactment of the Canada Pension Plan added an important new component to Canada's Social Security system. The Plan was designed to provide an earnings-related retirement pension for members of the labour force and together with the Quebec Pension Plan, applies to about 92 per cent of them. It also provides benefits to contributors who become disabled, and their dependent children. At a contributor's death a lump sum death benefit becomes payable together with monthly benefits for his widow and surviving dependent children.

The Canada Pension Plan does not operate in a province which has established a comparable plan. The only province to do so is Quebec. However, the Canada and Quebec Pension Plans are closely co-ordinated and operate together to provide one nation-wide system. Anyone who, in the course of his or her working life, contributes to both plans will receive the same benefits as if he had contributed to either plan throughout.

Coverage: For purposes of making contributions, the Canada Pension Plan covers all employees who earn over $600 and all self-employed persons who earn $800 or more in a calendar year, provided they are over 18 and under 70 years of age. Employees and self-employed persons who earn less than the above limits in a calendar year are not covered by the Plan for that year. Also excluded from coverage are casual employees, family workers and some migratory workers.

Financing: The Canada Pension Plan is financed by contributions of employees, employers, and self-employed persons and by interest earned by the fund. The first $600 of each contributor's annual earnings is exempt from contributions. On earnings above that amount and up to the present maximum on pensionable earnings of $5,300 a year, the employee makes a contribution of 1.8 per cent, with his employer paying a matching contribution. Self-employed people contribute at the combined rate of 3.6 per cent, also on annual earnings between $600 and $5,200 provided that they have earned at least $800 in the year.

Adjustment of Benefits: Once a Canada Pension Plan monthly benefit is paid, it is subject to annual adjustments in accordance with upward changes in the Pension Index. Benefits are payable no matter where the beneficiary may live whether in Canada or in any other country.

The contributory limits under the Canada Pension Plan are automatically adjusted with changing economic conditions. For 1966 and 1967 the limits were $600 and $5,000. For the next eight years these limits are adjusted by means of a specially constructed Pension Index which will reflect increases in the Consumer Price Index, subject to a maximum annual charge of 2 per cent. The upper limit was $5,100 in 1968, $5,200 for 1969, and is $5,300 in 1970. After 1975, the contributory limits will be adjusted according to changes in an Earnings Index based on a long-term moving average of national wages and salaries. This method is to be used to keep contributory earnings in line with the average earnings of workers.

Retirement Pensions: A retirement pension is 25 per cent of a contributor's average adjusted pensionable earnings. His pensionable earnings include not only those earnings on which contributions were made but, also, the $600 that was exempt from contributions. In the calculation of a contributor's pension, his earnings for each year are adjusted so that they bear the same relationship to the average of the maximum pensionable earnings in force at the time the pension begins and of the two preceding years that they bore to the upper limit prevailing in the year in which they were actually received. In this way, past earnings are revalued to their current equivalent before his average earnings are calculated. His total adjusted pensionable earnings under the program are averaged over the entire period from the commencement of the program on January 1, 1966, or from age 18, whichever is later, to the date the pension is first paid; but in no case are they averaged over less than 120 months, unless a disability pension has been paid to the contributor in the interim. Consequently, during the first ten years of the program only partial retirement pensions are payable. Not until 1976 will full retirement pensions first become payable.⁽¹⁾

(1) After 1975, certain periods of low earnings, or no earnings at all, and the earnings themselves, are disregarded in determining the average earnings on which retirement pensions are to be based. Pensionable earnings received between ages 65 and 70 may be substituted for lower or nil earnings of earlier periods of the same duration and the earlier periods are dropped out, provided that the reduced contributory period is not less than 120 months. These drop-out provisions make it possible for the person to receive a higher pension than would otherwise be the case.

A retirement pension is payable at any time between the ages of 65 and 70, provided the contributor has then retired from regular employment. If he earns $900 a year or less, he is considered to be retired for purposes of applying for his pension. Those taking up employment after starting to draw a retirement pension will be required to pass an earnings test. For earnings from work of between $900 and $1,500 in any year, the pension will be reduced by one-half of the excess of actual earnings over $900, with the maximum reduction in this range being $300. When annual earnings exceed $1,500, the retirement pension will be reduced by $300 plus all earnings in excess of $1,500. However, no reduction will be made in the pension for any month in which the pensioner's earnings are $75 or less, no matter what his earnings are for the entire year. The pension is payable at the full rate when the person attains age 70 regardless of any current earnings. Earnings test limits will be adjusted as the earnings ceiling rises.

Survivors' Benefits: The Canada Pension Plan provides a degree of income protection for widows and dependent children, as well as for disabled widows of contributors. Survivors' benefits under the Plan including the widow's pension, disabled widower's pension, orphan's benefit, and the lump sum death benefit, first became payable in 1968.

A widow's pension is payable to qualified widows in all cases at age 65 or over, but under 65 a number of factors can affect payment. A widow age 45 to 64 at her husband's death, a disabled widow under age 45, or a widow under age 45 with dependent children, is entitled to a widow's pension if her husband has made contributions for the required period of time. This pension is comprised of a flat-rate component, ($26.53 in 1970), and an earnings-related component equal to 37.5 per cent of the retirement pension payable to her deceased husband. If her husband was under age 65 at the time of his death, a pension is calculated for him as if he had actually attained age 65 at that time. A widow who is not disabled and who does not have dependent children receives a reduced pension if she is under age 45 at the death of her husband. If such a widow is between 35 and 45 her pension is reduced by 1/120 for each month she is under age 45 at his death. If a non-disabled and childless widow is under age 35 at the time of her husband's death, she is not entitled to receive a pension until she reaches 65 years of age unless she becomes disabled in the interim.

A woman widowed at age 65 or over, or a widow reaching age 65, will receive a pension calculated on a different basis than for those under 65. At age 65 or more it is calculated as 60 per cent. of her husband's retirement pension. If her husband was not in receipt of a retirement pension at the time of his death, one is calculated for him in the prescribed manner as if he had reached the eligible age at that time. A widow age 65 or over who is also entitled to a retirement pension of her own may receive by way of her retirement pension and her widow's pension an amount equal to the greater of, (a) 60 per cent of the total of her own and her husband's retirement pension, or (b) 100 per cent of her own retirement pension plus 37.5 per cent of her husband's retirement pension; subject to the limit that the total cannot exceed the maximum retirement pension that is payable under the Plan.

A lump sum death benefit is also payable provided the minimum qualifying contributory period has been met. The amount of the benefit is six times the monthly retirement benefit that is being (or would be) paid to the contributor in the month of his death, but cannot exceed 10 per cent of the maximum pensionable earnings for that year; (in 1970 that would be $530). If the contributor is under 65 years of age when he dies, a retirement pension is calculated for purposes of determining the amount of the death benefit as if he were 65 at the date of his death.

If a qualified male contributor dies, a monthly orphan's benefit is payable on behalf of his eligible dependent child whether or not the mother is alive. An orphan's benefit is payable on the death of a female contributor if she was maintaining the child at the time of her death. To be eligible for the benefit the child must be a dependent child as defined by the legislation governing Canada Pension Plan.

The amount of the benefit in 1970 is $26.53 monthly for each of the first four dependent children of a contributor, and $13.26 a month for each additional child. However, where there are more than four children in a family, the total of the orphans' benefits is divided equally among them. If both parents were contributors, and both die, only one orphan's benefit is payable to each of their children. The benefit ends when the child gets married, reaches age 18, or if he is between 18 and 25, at the time when he ceases to attend school or university fulltime.

A pension is provided for the disabled widower of a contributor if he was disabled at the time of his wife's death and had been wholly or substantially maintained by her. The rate of pension is the same as that for a disabled widow. A disabled widower entitled to his own retirement pension is also provided with the same two alternative formulae as the widow for purposes of calculating his total income from the two benefits. The disabled widower must continue to prove disability for the duration of his pension. Before age 65 he can receive both a disabled widower's pension and a disability pension, subject to the limit on the combined total mentioned previously.

Disability Pensions: Pensions for disabled contributors and benefits for their dependent children will first be payable in February 1970 under the Canada and Quebec Pension Plans.

A contributor who becomes disabled after making the required contributions will be entitled to a disability pension consisting of a flat-rate component, at least $26.53 monthly in 1970, and an earnings-related component equal to 75 per cent of a retirement pension calculated as if he had reached 65 in the month the disability pension became payable. A contributor is considered to be disabled if he has a physical or mental disability so severe and likely to continue so long that he cannot get steady work. Benefits payable to dependent children will be the same as orphans' benefits, which in 1970 are $26.53 monthly for each of the first four dependent children, and $13.26 for each additional child.

Current Data: As at the end of December, 1969, statistics on benefits are as follows:

(1) Retirement Pensions in pay	90,064
(2) Survivors' Benefits:
(a) Widows' Pensions	17,998
(b) Orphans' Benefits	21,041
(c) Disabled Widowers' Pensions	24
(d) Lump Sum Death Benefits - (paid since February, 1968)	23,527

Expenditures on benefits in December, 1969, totalled almost $4.0 million. As will be seen from the above 129,127 individuals are deriving monthly benefits from the Canada Pension Plan. The overall caseload has been increasing at the rate of about 7.5% per month. This, of course, will rise even further when disability pensions become payable for the first time in February, 1970.

In February, 1970, the maximum retirement pension under the Plan was $44.24; the maximum disability pension was $92.88; the maximum widow's pension was $67.15 and the orphan's benefit amounted to $26.53 for the first four children and one-half that amount for the fifth and each additional child. The maximum death benefit payable in 1969 equals $530.

Administration: The Department of National Health and Welfare administers the Canada Pension Plan through its head office in Ottawa and district and local offices located in various centres across Canada. Contributions are collected by the Department of National Revenue which is also responsible for the coverage of persons under the Plan.

Summary: The Canada and Quebec Pension Plans may be viewed as long-term measures to reduce poverty among the aged, survivors, and the disabled. In the case of the aged, individuals and married couples eligible for full retirement pensions (worth $105 a month in 1967) plus old age security pensions, will undoubtedly be well above the poverty line when such pensions become payable in 1976. During the ten year transition period prior to 1976, the "blanketing-in" process will provide relatively large benefits in relation to contributions for older workers. Moreover, benefits are not strictly proportional to earnings; low wage earners will receive somewhat higher benefits in relation to contributions than will average wage earners. At the same time, it must be recognized that a contributory scheme of this type is partly a method of income transfer across time for the same individual, and is thus less redistributive than a scheme which transfers funds between individuals at a point in time. Thus, many of the working poor must pay contributions now, when they can ill afford to do so, in order to keep themselves out of poverty after retirement.

Private Pension Plans

It is important to remember that the retirement system of income support provided under public programs is supplemented by private pension plans available in many places of employment. These plans provide pensions for retirement with some of the better plans providing benefits for disability and to survivors. Generally, private pensions provide little protection for the dependants of deceased contributors. Plans are either non-contributory with the contributions being paid by the employers and benefits being payable to employees, or contributory where both employer and employee contribute to a pension fund.

Plans and membership in 1965⁽¹⁾ were:

	Plans	Membership
	No.	No.
Contributory	11,558	1,823,000
Non-contributory	2,102	523,000
Totals	13,660	2,346,000

Unduplicated membership in 1965 was 2,295,000 or 38.3 per cent of the paid workers in the labor force.⁽²⁾

The following table shows the levels of income support provided for one year under private pension plans in 1965 to members who had normal retirement in that year. With increasing wages and salaries, benefits provided under private pension plans will also increase. Some of these increases may be offset to a degree by the effect of adjustments made by private plans to the Canada and Quebec Pension Plans.

(d) The Canada Assistance Plan

The Canada Assistance Plan, enacted in 1966, is a comprehensive public assistance measure which provides, under agreements with the provinces, federal contributions of 50 per cent of the costs of assistance to persons in need generally, and of selected costs of extending and improving welfare services.

This comprehensive measure is the latest in a series of developments that have progressively altered the form and structure of assistance programs. The trend from municipally administered assistance to provincial programs for particular categories of recipients has been mentioned in Section II. One of the first of such groups was widows with dependent children, on whose behalf mothers allowance programs were introduced by provincial governments during and after the First World War. Categorical programs, as they came to be called, were subsequently extended to the aged, the blind and the disabled, with cost-sharing provided by the federal government.

The means-test categorical programs improved the adequacy of benefits for qualified recipients, (mainly long-term beneficiaries), but did nothing for other needy persons and their families. The federal Unemployment Assistance Act of 1956 was an attempt to redress the balance in favour of "employable" (mainly short-term) recipients of assistance; cost-sharing was provided for assistance payments by provinces and their municipalities to "employable" unemployed persons. Two years later the legislation was amended to permit federal cost-sharing of assistance to "unemployable" persons as well, including residents in homes for special care.

Stimulated by more comprehensive federal sharing, the pendulum began to swing away from the categorical approach to public assistance. The provinces accelerated their development of more generalized social assistance or social allowance programs under which eligibility was determined increasingly on the basis of a family needs test rather than an individual means test. The non-categorical needs test approach was incorporated into the 1966 Canada Assistance Plan legislation, which provided also for sharing of health care costs and various welfare and rehabilitation services. The developmental approach to public assistance is enshrined in the new legislation; the objectives include prevention of poverty, amelioration of the effects of poverty, and the rehabilitation of the poor.

The change to the generalized needs test approach has been accompanied by improved levels of assistance and wider eligibility for benefits. There is also evidence that a more structured approach combined with the movement toward provincial administration has made assistance programs more acceptable, so that persons needing help are more willing to seek the support available. Perhaps, too, the amount of relative poverty may be increasing. In any case, the numbers of persons (including dependents) receiving assistance under the shared cost programs has increased greatly - from 620,000 in March 1959 to 1,260,000 in March 1969.⁽¹⁾ Total expenditures for financial assistance in the same period rose from $200 million in 1958-59 to $640 million in 1968-69.

A number of factors contributed to this trend. The movement from categorical to general assistance programs extended more adequate assistance benefits to many, among them the sick and partially disabled, some classes of needy mothers, the unemployed and, to a limited extent, fully employed persons. The recognition of need or budgetary requirements as the basis for setting assistance rates produced higher assistance payments and recognition of a wider range of special needs. Technological changes have increased the number of people handicapped by limited capabilities and lack of skills in competing for employment who are forced back upon social assistance for support. Advances in medicine and health services have extended the life span of older and disabled persons who are unable to be self-supporting.

(i) Blind Persons Allowances

The Blind Persons Act of 1951, as amended, provides for federal reimbursement to the provinces for allowances to blind persons age 18 or over who meet the ten years' residence and income requirements. For an unmarried person, total income including the allowance may not exceed $1,500 a year; for a person with no spouse but with one or more dependent children, $1,980; for a married couple, $2,580. When the spouse is also blind, income of the couple may not exceed $2,700.

The federal contribution may not exceed 75 per cent of $75 a month or of the allowance paid, whichever is less. The province administers the program and, within the limits of the federal Act, may fix the amount of allowance payable and the maximum income allowed.

Under the terms of the Canada Assistance Plan a province may elect to aid needy blind persons under a general assistance program with costs shared under that Act. In accordance with this provision, provinces may discontinue acceptance of applications under the Blind Persons Allowance Act. They may also transfer current recipients of blind persons allowances to their general programs, provided that there is no decrease in benefits. To date three provinces (Ontario, Saskatchewan and Alberta) have discontinued receipt of applications for Blind Persons Allowances.

For March, 1969, a total of 5,267 persons received benefits under this program. The total cost to the federal government during the 1968-69 fiscal year was $3,589,632, including payments received by Quebec.

(ii) Disabled Persons Allowances

The Disabled Persons Act of 1954, as amended, provides for federal reimbursement to the provinces for allowances paid to permanently and totally disabled persons age 18 or over who are in need and who meet the required definition of "permanent and total disability", the ten years' residence requirement and specified income limits. For an unmarried person, total income including the allowance may not exceed $1,260 a year. For a married couple the limit is $2,220 a year except that if the spouse is blind within the meaning of the Blind Persons Act, income of the couple may not exceed $2,580 a year.

The federal contribution may not exceed 50 per cent of $75 a month or of the allowance paid, whichever is less. As with blind persons allowances, the province administers the program and, within the limits of the federal Act, may fix the amount of allowance payable, the maximum income allowed and other conditions of eligibility.

As with blind persons allowances, a province may elect to aid needy disabled persons under a general assistance program with cost shared under the Canada Assistance Plan. Thus, provinces may discontinue acceptance of applications or transfer current recipients of disabled persons allowances to their general programs provided that there is no decrease in benefits. To date six provinces (Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, Ontario, Saskatchewan and Alberta) have discontinued acceptance of applications for Disabled Persons Allowance.

For March, 1969, a total of 30,663 persons received benefits under this program. The total cost to the federal government during the 1968-69 fiscal year was $14,340,547, including payments received by Quebec.

The costs of allowances to persons with disabilities who are not being assisted under the Disabled Persons Act or the Blind Persons Act are shareable with the federal government under the Canada Assistance Plan. The costs of supplemental allowances provided on a needs test basis to recipients of disabled or blind persons allowances are also shareable under the Canada Assistance Plan.

(iii) Unemployment Assistance Program

The Unemployment Assistance Act was passed in 1956 with retroactive effect from July 1955. It authorized the federal government to enter into an agreement with any province to reimburse it for 50 per cent of the unemployment assistance expenditures made by the province and its municipalities to persons and their dependents who are unemployed and in need. Payments to both employable and unemployable persons are shareable, as are the costs of maintaining persons in homes for special care, such as nursing homes and homes for the aged, and the costs of supplementary aid to recipients of old age security pensions, old age assistance, blind persons' allowances, disabled persons allowances and unemployment insurance benefits where the amount of assistance is determined on the basis of need. Federal sharing was extended to mothers' allowances for April 1, 1966.

The costs of provincial assistance programs based on need are now shared by the federal government through agreements under the Canada Assistance Plan, which took effect from April 1, 1966. The Unemployment Assistance Act remains in effect in the Yukon and Northwest Territories (pending the implementation or signing of agreements with them under the Canada Assistance Plan) and, for a transitional period in a few provinces, to cover the costs of aid to residual groups of persons under certain means tests programs during the process of conversion to needs test programs.

In March 1965, under agreements in force with all provinces and territories, a total of 722,944 persons were assisted. Federal contributions during the fiscal year which closed at the end of that month were $112,932,814. During March, 1969, a total of 69,378 persons were assisted in the Territories and three provinces (Quebec, Ontario and Alberta). The corresponding federal contributions were $15,250,238. Of the 1969 figures, Quebec alone accounted for 65,549 persons and $14,268,680.

(iv) Canada Assistance Plan - Provisions

Costs shareable under the Canada Assistance Plan, which were not shared under the Unemployment Assistance Act, include assistance to needy employed persons and mothers with dependent children,⁽¹⁾ maintenance of children in the care of provincially approved child welfare agencies, health care services to needy persons, and the extension of welfare services designed to prevent or remove causes of dependency or to assist recipients in achieving self-support.

Health care services may include medical, surgical, obstetrical, optical, dental, and nursing services; drugs; dressings, prosthetic appliances; and other items associated with the provision of such services. Welfare services may include rehabilitation services; casework; counselling and assessment services; adoption services; and home-maker, day-care and similar services supplied to persons in need or to persons to whom the service is essential if they are to remain self-supporting.

The only eligibility requirement for financial assistance specified in the Canada Assistance Plan is that of need, which is to be determined through an assessment of budgetary requirements as well as of income and resources. Eligibility requirements for welfare services are somewhat broader, in that federal sharing may extend to such services, when provided, not only to persons in need, but also to persons who may become needy in their absence.

A province must not require previous residence as a condition of eligibility for assistance or for continued assistance. Rates of assistance and eligibility requirements are set by the province. The Plan thus enables the provinces to adjust their rates to local conditions and to take into account the needs of special groups. It requires that the provinces establish procedures for appeal from decisions that relate to the provision of assistance.

"Assistance" comprises any form of aid to or on behalf of persons in need for the purpose of providing basic requirements such as food, shelter and clothing; items necessary for the safety, well-being, or rehabilitation of a person in need, such as special food or clothing, telephone, rehabilitation allowance, or items necessary for a handicapped person; care in a home for special care such as a home for the aged, a nursing home, or a welfare institution for children; travel and transportation; funerals, and burials; health care services; welfare services purchased by or at the request of provincially approved agencies; and comfort allowances for inmates of institutions.

The cost of improving and extending welfare services may be calculated either (1) as the amount by which the cost of providing welfare services exceeds that of the period from April 1, 1964, to March 31, 1965, or (2) as the cost of employing persons who are engaged wholly or mainly in the performance of welfare service functions and who are employed in positions filled after March 31, 1965. No province has followed the second alternative. Included for shareable purposes are the costs of salaries and employee benefits, travel, research, consultation, fees for conferences and seminars, and certain costs of staff training.

There is no dollar limit on federal contributions to shareable costs. These may include expenditures of provincial and municipal funds made through provincially approved non-governmental agencies.

The sharing of costs of work activity projects and the extension of provincial welfare programs to Indians on reserves, on Crown lands and in unorganized territories is governed by special agreements. Work activity projects are designed to prepare for entry or return to employment people who have unusual difficulty in obtaining or holding employment or utilizing regular training or rehabilitative programs. The federal government contributes 50 per cent of specified costs of such projects. In recognition of the initially high costs of extending regular assistance and welfare programs to the Indian population, the Canada Assistance Plan enables the federal authorities to offer contributions based on the cost of welfare to Indians relative to the cost of welfare to the population as a whole. Under present circumstances, the contribution would range from around 85% to over 95% of such cost, with progressive reduction in those percentages as the per capita costs of services to Indians approach those for the general population.

Agreements with respect to general assistance and welfare service programs are in force with all provinces, and the Yukon, and are being negotiated with the Northwest Territories. The agreements with the provinces were all signed between March and August 1967, and that with the Yukon in December 1969; all were made retroactive to April 1, 1966. No agreements have been concluded with respect to the extension of provincial welfare programs to Indians. Agreements relating to work activity projects have been signed with seven provinces. Federal expenditures under current agreements, to March 31, 1969, are shown in the following table.

(v) Canada Assistance Plan - Objectives

As an anti-poverty measure the objectives of the Canada Assistance Plan are:

- to assist the provinces in providing adequate levels of assistance to persons in need.
- to encourage the development and extension of welfare services designed to help prevent and remove the causes of poverty and dependency on public assistance.
- to strengthen efforts of public welfare departments to prepare and motivate assistance recipients to take advantage of opportunities for vocational training, rehabilitation services and other measures designed to return them to employment.
- to encourage the recognition of assistance as a right, under specified statutory conditions, and to remove any barriers in the form of provincial residence requirements.

- to encourage the progressive extension of provincial assistance and welfare service programs to Indians on the same basis as the general population.
- to encourage the development of integrated comprehensive provincial assistance programs which would enable them to meet the various requirements of different groups within a single program and administrative framework.
- to provide a basis for effective federal-provincial collaboration in the development of more effective assistance and welfare service programs across Canada.

Adequacy of Assistance: While provinces have made substantial progress toward the improvement of assistance levels, further movement is hindered by three major factors. One is the scarcity of financial resources, bearing in mind that 50 per cent of costs must be found within the province; the poorer provinces assert that they cannot afford to provide a desirable standard of assistance and services to eligible persons. A second is the absence of consensus about the standard of living that such programs should support. A third problem is the relationship of assistance levels to work incentives.

Budgetary needs now recognized as basic necessities include food, shelter, clothing, fuel, utilities, household supplies and personal requirements. While some programs provide reasonably adequate food allowances, the effect of these has been weakened by inadequacies in other areas, among them: clothing, household supplies, personal needs, and limitations on shelter allowances.⁽¹⁾ Assistance rates have not kept pace with rising living costs. Generally speaking budgetary requirements are limited to essentials, and recognize only under special circumstances elements which are necessary for meaningful family functioning and participation in the life of the community. Specific examples are costs of telephones, transportation, upkeep of household appliances and furnishings, reading and recreation.

There are obvious difficulties in the way of attempting a definition of minimum standards of living. Among these are differences in community and cultural standards and in spending patterns between regions and in urban as opposed to rural areas. Nevertheless, the establishment of such standards is essential, as the Economic Council of Canada has pointed out, if social policies are to be assessed from the standpoint of what they are really doing for those living in poverty.

Since poverty and sickness are often closely associated, adequate health care services are a necessary anti-poverty measure. The comprehensive provisions of the Canada Assistance Plan in this respect have enabled the provinces to strengthen significantly their health care programs for needy people. Costs of such care are shareable, not only when provided to persons receiving financial assistance, but also to others, such as many aged people, whose income from other sources may be sufficient only for the material necessities of life.

The Development and Extension of Welfare Services: Agreements with respect to general assistance and welfare service programs between the federal government and the provinces under the Canada Assistance Plan commit the latter to the development and extension of welfare services "as may be necessary and expedient." This means that the pace and direction of their evolution and the priorities to be assigned to various service areas are determined by the provinces. Broadly speaking, the growth of such services has been concentrated in areas for which the provinces are directly responsible. A major reason for this trend is the assumption by provincial departments of functions previously performed by municipalities and private agencies. In New Brunswick, for example, the municipalities have been relieved entirely of welfare responsibilities. Elsewhere most provinces have completely taken over from municipalities responsibility for long-term assistance cases, leaving the latter to deal essentially with short-term aid. Child welfare, at one time regarded mainly as a private agency concern, has become largely a public responsibility. These developments help to explain why most provinces have not used non-governmental agencies to a greater extent for implementing welfare service programs shareable under the Canada Assistance Plan. There is, however, a growing recognition of the importance of involving non-governmental agencies in the provision of services that prevent and reduce the need for public assistance. Examples of such services are family life education, family counselling, day care of children, homemaker services and family planning services.

Work Activity Projects: Work activity projects are designed to prepare for entry or return to employment, people who have unusual difficulty in obtaining or holding employment or utilizing regular training or rehabilitative programs. Agreements with respect to cost-sharing of work activities have been signed by seven provinces and experimental projects are in operation in Quebec and Saskatchewan. Discussions are under way with other provinces looking to the development of additional projects. This program constitutes a venture into a relatively unexplored area, and the governments concerned are likely to proceed with caution until they can evaluate the results of projects now in process. Close collaboration is being maintained between the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Department of Manpower and Immigration in administering this part of the Canada Assistance Plan. All projects are reviewed prior to approval by an interdepartmental committee which also reviews evaluation reports on projects in operation.

Appeal Rights and Residence Requirements: Agreements under the Canada Assistance Plan embody an undertaking by each province to ensure the provision by law of a procedure for appeals from decisions of provincially approved agencies with respect to applications for assistance or the granting of assistance by persons directly affected by such decisions. Each agreement also includes an undertaking by the province to provide for an adequate method by which that procedure is brought to the attention of applicants for and recipients of assistance. Since the coming into operation of these agreements, appeal procedures have been the subject of discussion and correspondence between the federal department and its provincial counterparts. Reference papers have been produced by the Department of National Health and Welfare as a basis for such discussions. Several provinces have significantly improved their appeal procedures since their agreements came into operation. There is, however, considerable variation in the scope and adequacy of such procedures. In addition, as noted by the Sixth Annual Report of the Economic Council of Canada, applicants for the recipients of assistance are often less than adequately informed of their right to appeal. The Department of National Health and Welfare is continuing to work with the provinces towards the improvement of this situation.

Agreements with the provinces further require that a period of residence in the province shall not be a condition of eligibility for assistance in any provincial program shareable under the Canada Assistance Plan. This requirement has effectively eliminated residence within a province as a condition of eligibility under general welfare assistance programs. It does not, however, eliminate residence within a province as a factor in responsibility for the cost of assistance. Where the province takes complete responsibility for welfare, this problem does not arise. However, in provinces where municipalities are involved in the administration of such programs and contribute to the cost, local residence may be a determinant of responsibility for the municipal contribution to the cost of assistance, which is most often 20 per cent. Where a person applies for and receives assistance in one municipality and has residence in another within the same province, provincial law may provide for a "charge back" to the municipality of residence.

Extension of Provincial Welfare Programs to Indians:

There has been considerable discussion with the provinces on this subject but none have signed the type of special agreement provided for under the Canada Assistance Plan. This portion of the Act appears to be less likely to be utilized in view of the statement of the federal government policy on Indians made in June, 1969. It is assumed, however, that the assumption by the provinces of responsibility for providing welfare assistance and services to Indians on the same basis as to all other provincial residents will continue to be a long-term policy objective of the federal government. The Department of National Health and Welfare will continue to work closely with the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development toward the achievement of this objective.

Integration of Provincial Programs: The emphasis in the Canada Assistance Plan upon need as the sole criterion of eligibility for assistance has assisted the provinces to consolidate a number of predecessor programs into a single comprehensive measure. Parts of the federal statute were designed to facilitate the elimination of separate provincial programs, hitherto required by federal legislation, of assistance for the needy aged, blind, disabled and unemployed. Similar special programs formerly excluded from federal sharing, such as mothers' allowances and means test allowances for widows and spinsters under 65, have also been largely consolidated into revised provincial general assistance programs. The Canada Assistance Plan requires that when a recipient is transferred from a previous program shared by the federal government, he shall continue to receive benefits at an equal or higher level. This is not possible in some instances because of differences in allowable income and asset levels. In such cases the persons concerned must be retained, for sharing purposes, under the old program. The Department of National Health and Welfare is examining with the provincial governments possible means of overcoming this difficulty so that the former arrangements can be terminated, permitting the repeal of outworn statutes and a consequent saving in administrative costs to both provincial and federal governments.

Federal-Provincial Collaboration: The Canada Assistance Plan itself was the product of extensive prior consultations between the federal government and the provinces. This collaboration has continued and expanded in various ways. These include meetings of ministers, deputy ministers, and other officials concerned with the development of programs and administrative arrangements. The agreements provide, among other things, for the exchange of statistical and other information between the provincial and federal departments and the provision, at the request of the provinces, of a variety of consultative services to assist in developing and refining provincial programs. These services have been of significant value to the provinces but their development has been hampered by difficulties in recruiting personnel with the required experience and professional qualifications.

Within the current year, the task force has emerged as a promising means of federal-provincial collaboration toward improving the administration of welfare programs and making them more effective as means of preventing and reducing poverty. A federal-provincial meeting of welfare ministers in January, 1969, authorized the appointment of three joint task forces to study and recommend in specified areas. These task forces made interim reports to the next meeting of ministers in October, 1969, and will present further progress reports in September, 1970. Their major recommendations show a sharp awareness of current trends and needs in the social assistance field.

The Task Force on Costs of Welfare Programs was authorized to continue its work with concentration in two main areas. The first is the improvement of statistical data by both levels of government. The second is to devise means of applying cost-benefit analysis to welfare programs. The report also urged the provincial welfare departments to allocate more adequate funds to program administration with special emphasis on research and planning activities.

The Task Force on Alienation recommended three areas for further study. The first was how welfare recipients can be better included in the decision-making process relating to welfare policies. The second was how the formation of responsible organizations of welfare recipients and their inclusion in the administration of policy through active consultation can be best fostered. The third was how best to effect reform in the treatment of individual welfare recipients by administrators in order to reduce gaps of understanding and a sense of frustration.

The Task Force on a Developmental Approach to Public Assistance recommended the establishment of minimum adequate standards of living as a basis for evaluating the adequacy and effectiveness of assistance programs. It also made proposals to simplify the administration of public assistance and build into such programs greater incentives for recipients to supplement their income by earnings. The report further recommended that efforts be made to link the administration of assistance more closely with the provision of employment opportunities, and suggested that welfare authorities place more emphasis on identifying emerging economic and social trends that are creating the problems with which they have to deal and on working with other authorities in devising solutions. The most far-reaching was the recommendation that some alternative to public assistance be developed which would achieve more effective redistribution of income, particularly for persons who are fully employed but have inadequate incomes. It was recognized that further study in depth would be required before any decision could be taken on this subject.

Summary: In conclusion, it may be said that the Canada Assistance Plan permits the development of a wide variety of programs aimed at prevention, amelioration or rehabilitation of the poor, excepting services relating mainly to education, recreation and corrections. Most provinces have liberalized eligibility requirements and raised assistance levels, and a few have started to plan preventive and rehabilitative projects. More needs to be known, however, about the dynamics of poverty. and more needs to be done to secure such knowledge through experimentation. Closer integration with other programs, both federal and provincial, is needed. Staffing is a serious problem.

Nevertheless, the Canada Assistance Plan has made a significant contribution to improving the circumstances of the poor who are excluded from the labour market by factors such as age, illness, disability, and responsibility for the care of dependent children. It has been less effective in relation to those who have partial earning capacity, because of the low level of earned income exemptions provided by provincial assistance programs. As several critics have observed, it has had virtually no impact upon the working poor--those unable to earn a minimum adequate living although fully employed. The reasons for this situation are complex, involving economic, social, psychological and ethical considerations over which experts as well as laymen are deeply divided.

IV DEPARTMENTAL HEALTH PROGRAMS

The fundamental objective of Departmental health programs is to reduce or eliminate the gap between health services and health needs. Since low income presents a financial barrier, programs must be designed to minimize the effect of financial considerations in the decision to seek health services.

Secondly, provision must be made to ensure that adequate health services of high quality are readily available and geographically accessible to the deprived elements of the population.

Thirdly, the delivery of services should be infused with the rehabilitation approach to health care with emphasis on the restoration and maintenance of employability or improved self care.

Fourthly, the importance of preventive services must be recognized and available measures must be implemented to the fullest extent.

Finally, psycho-social-cultural barriers to the full use of health services must be identified and means developed to motivate and promote an understanding of the value of good health practices.

The organization and delivery of health services are carried out mainly at the provincial and local levels, although the federal government provides services to certain special groups of persons within its area of jurisdiction. Except for its function of supplying health services to the native peoples and in the northern territories, the Department's principal role is to assist the provinces by means of grants-in-aid for health care programs, designated services and facilities, the training of health personnel, and public health research, establish standards and guidelines, extend technical consultant services on request and co-ordinate and evaluate the efforts made to ensure equality of opportunity for achieving adequate standards of health across the whole country.

(a) Indian and Northern Health Services

Over the past several years the Department has been strengthening its program of Indian and Northern Health Services. Under current arrangements the Medical Services Branch makes available medical and public health services to registered Indians and Eskimos who are not included under provincial services and who are unable to provide for themselves. The objective is to assist the responsible provincial agencies to improve the health of Indians living on reserves and to arrange treatment if unavailable due to lack of local facilities or because of inability to pay. Similar services are provided for residents of the northern Territories on a cost sharing basis with local governments.

(i) Health Profile of Native Groups

The effects of a marginal existence, which is the common experience of most Indians and Eskimos is apparent in related health statistics.

The infant mortality rate in 1968 was 21 per 1,000 live births for all Canadians, 49 per 1,000 for Indians, and 89 per 1,000 for Eskimos. Among Indians as a whole, infant mortality has declined during the past decade from three times the national rate to just over twice the rate. The following regional differences merit attention:

Province or Territory	Indian Infant Mortality Rate per 1,000 live births (averaged over 1965-1968)	Provincial Infant Mortality Rate per 1,000 live births (from "Vital Sta- tistics" 1967)	Ratio of Indian Rate to relevant provincial rate
Nova Scotia	42.77	22.78	1.9:1
New Brunswick	23.48	25.10	0.9:1
Quebec	38.97	23.13	1.7:1
Ontario	35.80	19.72	1.8:1
Manitoba	56.25	21.59	2.6:1
Saskatchewan	62.34	25.84	2.4:1
Alberta	47.61	20.04	2.4:1
British Columbia	63.98	21.37	3.0:1
Yukon	70.31	23.38	3.0:1
N.W.T.	51.80	61.98	0.8:1
Canada	51.89	21.98	2.4:1

Additional information available for the Northern Region indicates that in 1968, 56 per cent of all Eskimo deaths, and 35 per cent of all Indian deaths involved children under five years old. High death rates reported for Indian and Eskimo babies occurred in spite of the fact that 90.6 per cent of all births in the Northern Region took place in medical institutions under professional supervision. The chief causes of early mortality were respiratory infections such as pneumonia and bronchitis, followed by gastro-enteritis and associated disorders.

In all provinces and at all ages, except the older age brackets where little significant difference occurs, mortality among Indians who have left the reserves falls substantially below that of Indians remaining on the reserves. This observation has all the more interest in that Indians who have moved off reserves into towns and cities are generally noted as not engaged in the more affluent occupations or trades, nor for the excellence of the accommodation they can rent nor, for that matter, has city life generally been rated healthier than rural life:

The causes of low health status are complex. In addition to serious financial deprivation, many Indians and Eskimos are affected adversely by cultural and educational deprivation, racial prejudice, and often, geographic isolation in undeveloped areas lacking natural resources or undeveloped for lack of capital and knowledge. The underlying condition is a deep-rooted social malaise. Its cure will require much more than adequate funds, good housing, or the best of medical care. What is needed is the restoration to the Indian of a sense of dignity, purpose and meaning, the elimination of his all too well justified suspicion of the white man, and free and full acceptance into the mainstream of Canadian society

(ii) Delivery of Services

Much of the service in treatment and health education is rendered through 30 departmental out-patient clinics and 93 health centres staffed by medical and other public health personnel. In remote areas, the key facility is frequently the departmental nursing station, a combined emergency treatment and public health unit usually having two to four beds under the direction of one or two nurses; 47 of these are operated throughout Canada. At present the Department maintains 14 hospitals at strategic points and co-operates elsewhere with community, mission, or company hospitals. Indians are included under all provincially prepaid insurance plans for hospitals care and other forms of insured medical care.

Underlying organization and delivery of services are many special problems not encountered in more settled areas. Chief among these special difficulties are:

Staff recruitment problems - including isolation and low pay scales, plus the lack of trained personnel with the necessary personal qualities required for work in isolation and without direct supervision.

Location of treatment centres - low population density makes the establishment and operation of large health centres unfeasible, while small units and transportation and communication problems present serious difficulties for more serious cases.

Separation of facilities for Indian and Eskimo patients from those provided for other citizens. Wherever specialized facilities are provided, the high cost of duplication of services, coupled with the shortage of trained personnel and the scattered native population, all serve to make it difficult to provide treatment facilities comparable to those provided for non-Indian and Eskimo patients.

(iii) New Developments

Where practicable, there has been an increasing integration of Indian provincial and municipal health services, so that the number of hospitals and other facilities provided specifically for Indians has been reduced accordingly. This is a necessary step towards a truly equitable system of health services for all citizens.

Further developments to improve delivery of health services in the North have recently been instituted as a result of the Department's negotiations with the medical faculties of a number of Canadian universities. For example, McGill University will provide the services of two doctors and two fifth-year medical students to the Baffin Zone. Assisted by a $150,000 federal grant, these rotating health personnel will aid regular medical staff, while acquiring valuable experience in northern health problems. In addition young Eskimos are to be trained to perform a major role in the expanded health care programs.

Other universities presently involved in similar services to outlying areas include the Universities of Toronto, Western Ontario, Manitoba, McMaster, Montreal, Queen's and Dalhousie.

An agreement has been signed by the National Indian Brotherhood and the Minister of National Health and Welfare to promote improved communications and joint participation in policy development. An Indian Health Committee of the Brotherhood will meet twice yearly with the Minister to discuss recommendations for improved policy and administration, and to direct attention to problems of poor or inadequate health services.

In order to bridge the communication gap between the native groups and medical staff, liaison officers are being appointed by the provincial Indian Brotherhoods. The Department of National Health and Welfare will pay $10,000 to each Indian association to meet salary and other expenses.

The Community Health Worker Training Program which was instituted in 1962, will continue to train Indians and Eskimos to assist in providing health services to their own people. By 1967, the Community Health Training Program had graduated 75 Indians and Eskimos.

Additional training facilities to meet the special problems related to provision of health services in northern regions were established in 1966, when Dalhousie University offered a two-year diploma course related to the problems of outpost nursing. The second year of the course includes internship at hospitals and nursing stations in the northern regions.

Communication difficulties which complicate all problems to be coped with in isolated areas will be lessened somewhat with the announced appropriation of $500,000 to be used to improve radio communication facilities in the North.

(b) Hospital and Institutional Care

The federal government shares approximately 50 per cent of the cost of active and chronic hospital care under the provincial hospital insurance programs through the provisions of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act. This legislation stimulated the development of provincial programs in all provinces and territories. About 99 per cent of the Canadian population is insured for hospital care benefits, and care is available without charge to all indigent residents. Among the major objectives of the program are: to make insured services available to all residents under uniform terms and conditions; to provide insured benefits that include basic in-patient and out-patient hospital services; to distribute the costs of insured benefits over all income earners in all areas of Canada in an equitable manner; to establish a systematic method of paying hospitals for services rendered; and to encourage the provision of high quality hospital care.

Federal contributions have also been made toward the cost of maintaining needy persons in "homes for special care" under the provisions of the Unemployment Assistance Act enacted in 1956 and under the Canada Assistance Plan since 1966. Included among these facilities are nursing homes, homes for the aged and child care institutions.

Support has also been available for the improvement of services in mental hospitals and tuberculosis sanatoria through financial assistance to projects provided by the Tuberculosis Control Grant and the Mental Health Grant as part of the National Health Grants Program.

The federal government has stimulated the construction of all types of hospital facilities through the Hospital Construction Grant initiated in 1948. Federal assistance, of $2,000 per hospital bed and up to one-third of the cost of renovations, must at least have been matched by the provinces. The Hospital Construction Grant Program will be terminated on March 31, 1970, except for approved projects then under construction, but federal assistance will continue to be available under the Health Resources Fund Act. The sum of $500 million will be available under this Act, during the period 1966-1980 inclusive, for sharing up to 50 per cent of the capital costs of health training and research facilities, including certain hospitals.

In summary it may be stated that large-scale financing by federal and provincial governments, together with the pre-payment feature under hospital insurance, has greatly improved hospital facilities and services and rendered them widely accessible to the low income group. With respect to long-term care, one emerging pattern has been the upgrading of levels of service in facilities approved for participation in the hospital insurance program, as well as in facilities approved as "homes for special care" under the Canada Assistance Plan. Elimination or reduction of the financial barrier to hospital or domiciliary care has facilitated better provision of care in accordance with real health and dependency needs, but has sharply increased the demand for service. Financial factors may have exerted pressure for inappropriate use of higher level facilities, for example, a chronic hospital providing free care is probably preferred to a nursing home where pension income must be used for payment. The increasing acceptance of institutional care has aroused much concern as to whether attention should be redirected back to the community and home care services that could extend the time and scope of independent living at home.

A brief description of provincial arrangements for the provision and financing of hospital and institutional care in general and allied special hospitals, mental hospitals, tuberculosis sanatoria, and "homes for special care" is contained in Appendix V.

(c) Medical Care and Related Services

Access to high quality medical and related services is a special problem for the poor. Low income is clearly a factor that affects the ability or the willingness of the individual or family to make full use of available services. It means frequently that a family lacks resources to purchase health care services directly or to purchase insurance. The alternatives are to go without needed care or to accept episodic services from practitioners on a basis of charity.

Two new programs have been developed by the federal government to remove the financial barrier to health care and render the services more accessible. These are the provision for federal sharing of the costs of health care for public assistance recipients under the Canada Assistance Plan implemented in 1966, and the Medical Care Program which came into effect in 1968.

(i) Public Assistance Recipients

Under the Canada Assistance Plan Act, enacted in June, 1966, the federal government undertook to pay half the costs incurred by provinces and municipalities, in respect of health care provided to recipients of cash assistance on a needs test basis. Other "medically indigent" persons not receiving cash assistance, may be supplied with health care on an episodic basis after having had a similar test of need. Modes of paying suppliers of services are left with the provinces. Health services are defined to include "medical, surgical, obstetrical, optical, dental and nursing services... drugs, dressings, prosthetic appliances and any other items or health services necessary to or commonly associated with the provision of any such specified services..."

All provinces now include physicians' services in their programs; in seven provinces these services are administered under their general medical care plans; five cover dental care; five include drugs; four provide optical appliances; several have additional benefits including prosthetic appliances, physiotherapy, home nursing, podiatry, chiropractic and transportation. Appendix VI shows in detail the variety of arrangements that exist to provide health care to categorical groups of public assistance recipients.

(ii) Medical Care Insurance

Proposals for a plan of comprehensive medical insurance for all Canadians, administered by the provinces and with federal fiscal contributions, found expression in the Medical Care Act, passed in December, 1966, and made effective from July 1, 1968.

Among the stated broad objectives of this federal legislation, two stand out as having special relevancy to the poor. These are first, to ensure that all Canadians have access to available medical care regardless of financial resources, and, second, to improve health by thus facilitating early diagnosis and treatment.

The federal commitment to contribute half the costs of insured services in participating provinces is contingent upon the medical care insurance plan of each province meeting certain minimum criteria related to the comprehensiveness of the insured services, the universality of coverage, portability of benefits, and public administration. Each provincial plan must:

- (a) be operated on a non-profit basis by a public authority subject to provincial audit;
- (b) make available all medically necessary services rendered by medical practitioners as insured services on uniform terms and conditions to all residents of a province;
- (c) cover not fewer than 90 per cent of the total number of insurable residents of the province during the first year of operation, with a commitment that coverage must rise to 95 per cent within three years;
- (d) provide for "portability" -- that is, full coverage of services after three months of residence in a province, and out-of-province coverage during the periods of waiting while a person establishes residence in another province.

The Medical Care Act, in addition, empowers the federal government to include additional health-care services provided by non-physician professional personnel, under terms and conditions specified by the Governor-in-Council. So far, such additional services are limited to specified procedures carried out by dental surgeons in a hospital setting.

Provinces can finance services in any manner they wish, but the Act contains a proviso the intent of which is that no insured person shall be impeded or precluded from reasonable access to insured services as a consequence of direct charges associated with the services received. A province may adopt any method it wishes of paying the providers of services, subject only to the proviso that the tariffs of authorized payments are on a basis that assures reasonable compensation for the services rendered.

The formula for calculating federal contributions to the cost of provincial plans is such that provinces with relatively low per capita costs would be assisted by something more than half their provincial costs. In general terms, the federal contribution to a participating province is an amount equal to (a) 50 per cent of the per capita cost for the year of all insured services in all participating provinces (b) multiplied by the number of insured persons in each province respectively. The federal government makes no contribution to administration costs incurred by the province.

Two provinces, British Columbia and Saskatchewan became participants in the federal plan from the date of its inception, July 1, 1968. Manitoba, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland entered on April 1, 1969, Alberta on July 1, and Ontario on October 1.* Provisions of these provincial plans are described in Appendix VII.

It should be noted that the federal government recognizes as an insured service towards the cost of which it will contribute, only that portion of the physician's charge that is actually paid by the provincial administering authority. Thus, co-charges and extra-billing which are direct patient responsibilities may continue as constraints, and could have important adverse implications for families on the margin of poverty. For families so poor that they are eligible for welfare assistance -- the constraints may not apply since they are typically relieved of any responsibility for payment of premiums or co-charges; and in most provinces the attending doctors do not extra bill, and accept the percentage of the authorized charge paid by the public programs as payment in full. For families on the margin of poverty, however, certain emerging developments may present possible hindrances to the early achievement of the two broad objectives of the federal legislation:

(1) High premiums -- Levies in Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia are high enough to constitute a significant percentage of disposable income for families just above the cut-off lines entitling them to premium subsidies. Voluntary enrolment, as in British Columbia and for individuals not in employee groups in Ontario, can result in failure of some families to enrol because the demands upon them for food, shelter, transportation, and clothing may be even more immediate. Compulsory enrolment in Alberta can result in a diversion of available funds from spending requirements that marginal-income families may believe to be even more pressing, such as food.

(2) Co-charges -- These are levied in Saskatchewan with a two-fold intent: first, to transfer some of the cost of service (from as low as 5 to 10 per cent up to 50 per cent) -- from the administering authority to the family obtaining service; second, to deter undue demands for medical care. The deterrent payment is mainly nominal for families of moderate to affluent means, but may represent a significant burden for low-income families just above the margin of poverty. Such charges could tend, then, to reduce accessibility to service among those who are poor.

(3) Modes of paying doctors -- The right of doctors to deal directly with patients as regards their accounts, could work a financial hardship on those marginal-income families who are not in the habit of keeping cash reserves on hand.

(4) Extra-billing -- A limited amount of extra-billing was anticipated when medicare plans got underway in 1968, but the Medical Care Act conveyed the thought that these additional charges upon the patient should not be so high or so extensive as seriously to hinder access to services. Notwithstanding, potentials exist in some provinces such as to suggest that extra-billing, beyond what the public authority is prepared to pay, could become a practice of significant dimensions. Two problems at least would be posed. Doctors would be in the position again of income-testing their marginally-low-income patients to decide if the charges should be imposed. And such patients could find that the charges, where imposed, would constitute a financial hardship.

(d) Rehabilitation Services

Physical and mental impairments that diminish earning power are major causes of dependency and poverty in Canada. These comprise congenital anomalies, conditions resulting from chronic physical disease or accident, and mental disorders. Recent analysis of the National Health Survey (United States) statistics has indicated that the proportion of the civilian, non-institutional population not employed or seeking work because of chronic conditions during the fiscal year, 1962, equalled seven per cent of the labour force.⁽¹⁾ Disabilities tend to be more prevalent among the lower income groups who ordinarily do not have protection against income loss, except for work-connected disability.

(i) Physical Rehabilitation

The goal of rehabilitation services is to enable the individual to develop his existing capabilities to the highest possible level. There is great variation in individual potential due not only to the severity and nature of the disability but also because of other personal factors and the social circumstances. Because of the progressive nature of many conditions, early detection and remedial treatment to prevent or limit disability and any resulting handicap is the most significant phase of rehabilitation. Consequently, all the health agencies, starting with the family doctor or medical officer of health, are concerned with casefinding, diagnosis and restorative treatment. Registries of the handicapped, which have been established by a number of provincial and local health services, afford a systematic method of casefinding, co-ordination of restorative, education and vocational services and follow-up of registrants. Research workers who study the distribution of impairments and diseases identify causes and develop preventive and ameliorative techniques in both the medical and social sciences, also contribute to improvements in services, prostheses and personal aids.

Full rehabilitation potential, however, can be achieved only through a continuous flow of counselling, treatment, training and social adjustment services, each carefully selected and timed for maximum effectiveness to the individual. Lengthy delays or interruptions can precipitate recurrent breakdowns and lead to chronic dependency. As has been often noted, the proper distribution and utilization of the numerous types of rehabilitation services in the community depends upon a high degree of administrative co-ordination, always difficult when services are fragmented among numerous agencies. The most effective programs, such as those for disabled workmen, integrate all needed services in the one system.

Among the problems that hinder effective results are shortages of qualified personnel. Also, the special clinics and rehabilitation centres in the larger cities are not easily accessible to persons living in outlying towns and rural areas. Beyond this there is a lack of awareness or unwillingness on the part of some physicians to make full use of available services on behalf of their patients. And finally there are factors of motivation and expectation which block some patients from obtaining maximum benefit from these services. It has been found that physical disability is accompanied frequently by mental disturbances.

The main objective of the Department's Rehabilitation Services, together with the General Health Grants designated for Rehabilitation, has been to assist provincial health departments and hospital services in planning and developing comprehensive rehabilitation services on behalf of the disabled and chronic sick. The activities of the Rehabilitation Services, which are medically oriented, are directed to four specific areas: consultant and advisory services in medical rehabilitation, blindness prevention activities, development and organization of disability assessment for blindness allowances, disabled persons' allowances and the Canada Pension Plan, and operation of a national prosthetic service.

Prosthetic services consist of 12 prosthetic centres across Canada and a national Prosthetic Centre at Sunnybrook Hospital in Toronto, which procures and manufactures prosthetic appliances for distribution to the local centres that carry out the fitting operations. Services are available to both veterans and non-veterans. The Prosthetic Services activity has been also concerned in the establishment and operation of four regional prosthetic and orthotic research centres in Fredericton, Montreal, Toronto and Winnipeg that are supported by health grants.

The Department assists the provinces financially through the Medical Rehabilitation and Crippled Children Grant. In 1968-69, about one million dollars were spent to assist out-patient rehabilitation centres and therapy departments, speech and hearing clinics, mobile diagnostic and treatment clinics, thalidomide patient programs and research studies. In addition, home care programs in the majority of provinces have been extended with Health Grant support. Additional financial aid to rehabilitation programs is provided through the federal share of the costs of hospital insurance plans in the provinces, which cover in-patient rehabilitation hospital units and separate centres, and in some cases out-patient care. Encouragement and advice have been given to university teaching programs in physical medicine and allied therapies and in community health and chronic diseases.

(ii) Mental Health

Because mental disorders tend to be widespread, chronic and incapacitating, they may serve as contributory factors in precipitating a condition of poverty for a patient and his family. For this reason, prevention, early detection and expansion of existing treatment and aftercare services are essential components of a successful war on poverty.

There can be little doubt that better understanding of the environmental and psychological stresses that affect behaviour has improved the therapeutic outlook. It is now believed that, if recognized and treated early enough, the majority of persons affected by mental disorders can recover to lead useful and satisfactory lives. With respect to chronic impairments such as mental retardation, much can be done to promote an improved level of self-care and independent living.

However, major barriers to the delivery of mental health services to the poor prevent successful implementation of many programs. The high cost of treatment and aftercare is somewhat less of a problem with the development of comprehensive hospitalization and medical care programs and improvements in the public mental health services. However, shortages of trained personnel are severe. The ability to work effectively with persons affected by mental disorders requires long and expensive training; this type of personal service is not always pleasant and is often unrewarding, particularly in relation to low-income groups. Personnel shortages may be expected to continue until higher financial rewards in this area are offered to general practitioners, psychiatrists, clinical psychologists, psychiatric nurses, social workers and others for this type of work.

The social distance which exists between many professionals and the poor also creates real difficulties in comprehension. For example, treatment is defined by the poor in relation to medical and surgical procedures with which they are familiar. A psychiatric patient who receives psychotherapy will not necessarily understand that this is a particular type of treatment. The placebo and real effects of medical care may be lost to him. In addition, the psychiatrist may feel that lack of response to treatment indicates the severity of his patient's disability. Differentials in treatment are then not always a product of the patient's inability to pay for services, but arise out of this social distance which limits the effectiveness of many services available.

The function of the Department's Mental Health Division is to provide consultation and assistance to the various local and provincial agencies in order to improve and extend services in the field of mental health. Included in the duties of the Division are the development and maintenance of standards of care and treatment, the stimulation and support of mental health research, the provision of consultant services, the publication of survey and technical reports, and the operation of a public information service which includes the publication of a bimonthly journal, "Canada's Mental Health."

Expenditures under the Mental Health Grant in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1968, reached $8.4 million. An additional sum allocated under the General Health Grants, amounting to $200,000 per year for five years, starting in 1967-68, has been designated for special health studies in the field of mental retardation. Funds allocated for mental health research under the Public Health Research Grant in 1968-69 amounted to $783,100.

Under federal-provincial cost sharing agreements, patients receiving treatment in general hospitals are covered by hospitalization insurance plans. Also, through federal-provincial agreements under the Medical Care Act, there is coverage of psychiatrists' services.

In response to the mounting evidence of drug abuse, especially among the young, the Minister has formed a Drug Abuse Secretariat and an Interdepartmental Committee on Drug Abuse, under the Mental Health Division. In addition, in May, 1969, a Commission of Enquiry into the Non-Medical Use of Drugs was established by Order-in-Council. Its hearings are now being held in various centres across the country to receive briefs from concerned citizens as well as professionals.

(e) Preventive Health Services

Public health measures are designed to protect the health of the community and to prevent disease. Demographic and social changes as well as varying disease patterns and scientific advances have greatly influenced the range and complexity of public health activities. Local health departments have traditionally carried out the basic preventive health services, but increasingly, the joint action of provincial health departments, the hospitals and voluntary agencies is required to cover the whole field.

The main thrust of community health services continues to be maintenance of a sanitary environment including supervision of water, food and milk supplies, control of communicable diseases and other preventable illnesses, disabilities and premature deaths, and promotion of maternal and child health. This last activity extends to health counselling and services in family planning, nutrition, mental health, dental health, accident prevention and other aspects, for example, the prevention of crippling conditions in children. Early detection and treatment of children with hearing and vision defects and other congenital abnormalities is an important objective. Genetic counselling services, although not widely available, can contribute significantly to prevention of many disabilities.

The health problems of adults have also demanded more attention, especially to treatment of mental health, alcoholism and other drug addictions, dietary deficiencies, and to community and institutional care and rehabilitation of the handicapped and chronically ill. The use of preventive measures is limited but mass screening programs, with medical follow-up to detect tuberculosis, syphilis, diabetes, glaucoma, cervical cancer and other chronic conditions is becoming more widespread. Altogether, many pressures, besides population increases and shifts, are placing unprecedented demands on the community health agencies for more and better service.

Much more symptomatic pathology is being diagnosed - for example, battered children, suicide attempts and drug dependency. Also better recognized are the health needs of working mothers and their children, youth, the aged and homebound who require appropriate delivery of services in order to prevent health breakdown.

The majority of preventive health services in Canada are administered by city health departments and regional or county health offices accountable to the provincial health departments or district health boards. In most urban areas and large health regions, many direct service and control functions are delegated to subsidiary local or district health units. Responsibility for comprehensive treatment programs for mental illness, mental retardation, alcoholism, venereal disease and tuberculosis has been mainly provincial, with services decentralized to local offices or facilities where population density warrants. Other provincial operations, the public health laboratories, vital statistics, evaluation, research and personnel training functions are usually centralized.

The imminent threat of environmental health problems to human and other forms of life has led to joint federal-provincial as well as provincial action in an enlarging sphere of preventive activities that depend upon the co-operation of local health authorities. Examples of these are measures to reduce water pollution such as proper sewage disposal, to prevent air pollution, to control pesticide use, to regulate waste disposal, and to develop accident safety programs of various types.

The scope of the consultant divisions of the Department's Health Services Branch parallels the fields of interest of the provincial and local health services. The federal role, vis-à-vis the provinces, has been to provide grants-in-aid to the provinces in support of public health programs, the training of health and hospital personnel and research in public health, and to extend consultant and advisory services for health planning. One of the advisory functions has been to assist in the review of projects submitted by the provinces under the National Health Grants Program.

(i) Environmental Health

A total approach to a satisfactory living environment, encompasses numerous aspects: firstly, the broad fields of water supply, sewage and waste disposal, pollution and noise control; secondly, housing that will satisfy the physiological and psychological needs of men, women, and children, including provision for specialized groups such as the handicapped, the aged and the young family; thirdly, public transportation to enable ready access to places of work, institutions and services; and lastly, the provision of schools, day care centres, hospitals, clinics and care facilities, recreational centres, libraries, etc., nearby so as to best serve the residents. Since human health requirements enter into all these aspects, public health has a specific part to play in community planning in developing standards for housing and environmental health generally, together with the architects, engineers, sociologists, and others.

A number of Departmental divisions grouped under environmental health engage in programs to improve the environment as it affects the health of Canadians. The Department's activities are centralized at the Environmental Health Centre in Ottawa.

The Public Health Engineering Division carries out four broad programs, one of which is to provide consultant services on water supply, sanitation problems and industrial waste abatement to federal and provincial agencies and departments. It also carries out water pollution investigations and other research as well as responsibilities to the International Joint Commission on water problems.

The Occupational Health Division is interested in all aspects of the health of workers and air travellers, and the effects of air pollution, and pesticides on the health of all Canadians. Its extensive advisory, research and teaching services, which are made available to health agencies and universities, cover environmental and clinical surveys; physical, chemical, and biological laboratory services; consultative services on medical, nursing, engineering and other aspects; and publication of educational materials. Its responsibilities in air pollution involve special studies conducted for the International Joint Commission and others related to developing standards of air sampling and air quality criteria and improving methods for air pollution control.

The Radiation Protection Division protects the health of radiation workers in industrial, medical and research facilities and monitors the exposure of the general population from all sources of ionizing radiation including fallout from nuclear tests. As principal health advisor to the Atomic Energy Control Board, the Division assesses all radioisotope licence applications and carries out a personnel monitoring service and field inspections to ensure their safe use; it has also established standards for commercial x-ray machines and other devices and safety guides for their operation.

The Laboratory of Hygiene which has operated as the national reference and typing laboratory for public health and research since 1919, provides diagnostic and technical advisory services to the provincial laboratories and health departments and other agencies. Under the authority of the Food and Drugs Act, it also establishes standards for biological products such as sera, vaccines, toxoids, and antibiotics, and inspects and controls their manufacture. The Laboratory's research activities are directed to improving vaccines for protection against infectious diseases, new diagnostic and control methodology in bacteriology, surveys of the incidence and importance of zoonoses and other areas.

(ii) Nutrition

There is universal recognition that nutrition is a critical factor in poverty. Dietary inadequacies and under-nutrition combined with the other deprivations, attendant on poverty, cause health deterioration. This sets up the cycle of decreased performance of all activities, mental apathy, and incapacity for initiative or self-help. Medical research has linked malnutrition to anemia, low resistance to infectious diseases, mental retardation and mental illness. The risk of malnutrition is greater for specific population groups, regardless of income, due to certain life styles, such as itinerant workers, and also to increased needs at certain stages of the life cycle. Particularly vulnerable are pregnant and nursing women, infants, adolescents, the aged and the disabled.

Undernourishment may reduce the ability to acquire the education necessary for escape from the poverty cycle. Quite apart from impairment of mental development arising from deficiencies of nutrition during foetal life and early infancy, the complex of mental and physical lassitude attendant on undernourishment, the distraction of attention caused by the distress of nagging hunger, and unfitness because of recurring illness all can stultify the education of a child of even normal mental endowment(1) (2) (3).

A broad ranging investigation in the United States, as reported to the Senate Select Committee on Nutrition and Human Needs, suggests that malnutrition occurs to an unexpectedly high degree in the sample population under study. Estimates from that country are that about two-thirds of the poor are malnourished, especially older persons over 60 years and children under 16. Several Canadian studies suggest that a comparable situation may exist among the Canadian population. A survey of the diet of members of a Nova Scotia fishing community lists 37 per cent of the population with only fair diets, and 39 per cent with either poor or very poor diets(4). Barsky reports an increase in the incidence of rickets in children's Hospital of Winnipeg from 1962-67(5). The situation is considered serious in Quebec where fluid milk is used in feeding; a yearly average of 50 cases have been admitted for treatment in Montreal Children's Hospital over the past five years with estimated annual bed care expenditures for rickets by the province reaching $350,000(6).

These reports emphasize the need for definitive data on the nutritional Status of Canadians. A proposal for a National Nutrition Survey(7) has been considered as the best means of providing basic information on the incidence of nutritional diseases and disorders and dietary intake among groups of the Canadian population, characterized by income, age and sex groups. The proposed sampling of a total population of 21,000 persons (1 per 1,000), would be distributed proportionately among the provinces. Studies of communities considered to have nutritional problems have also been suggested. Preliminary cost estimates are $90 per person sampled or roughly $1.9 million.

The Nutrition Division of the Department recommends food consumption practices among Canadians that will promote health, fitness and well-being. To achieve these objectives, the Division has developed recommended levels of nutritional intake as guidelines for studies of food consumption and the nutritional status of Canadians. In furthering its concern about the ability of Canadians to obtain nutritious foods, the Nutrition Division's program, which is effected primarily through its consultant function, includes activities in the areas of nutrition research and education, which stress the practical application of scientific knowledge. It works closely with the Canadian Council on Nutrition, a co-ordinating body representative of the health professions most concerned with nutrition, that advises the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

(iii) Communicable Disease Control

The most prevalent communicable diseases, tuberculosis and the venereal diseases, persist as threats to the public health. In addition, scarlet fever, streptococcal sore throat, infectious hepatitis, dysentery, whooping cough, influenza, and food poisoning are the other chief infections. Several preventable diseases believed to have been eradicated, such as diphtheria, have recently occurred in several provinces. Because the communicable diseases are more prevalent where there is substandard housing and sanitation and poor nutrition and personal hygiene, concerted approaches to eliminate these conditions are needed as well as specific measures.

The Epidemiology Division in the Department has a special co-ordinating role to help develop programs that prevent or lessen the burden of diseases. Its activities include disease surveillance, the study of causal factors of genetic, social or environmental origin, and the analysis of such data in relation to community programs for the prevention and control of disease. The Division provides advice on disease control programs and epidemiological studies to federal and provincial health agencies, and through its field unit, directly assists provincial health departments in dealing with epidemics.

(iv) Child and Maternal Health

The Child and Maternal Health Division promotes the optimum health of mothers and children in Canada in co-operation with provincial health departments, other health agencies and professional groups. It has developed criteria for assessing the health status of mothers and children and standards of services, and provides a national consultant service and educational materials to all interested health agencies, the universities and voluntary agencies. Generally, the Division supports the study and evaluation of problems in maternal health and child development through the Maternal and Child Health Advisory Committee, which is representative of provincial and professional interests. By means of technical advice regarding administration and utilization of federal health grants, the Division stimulates and supports service, demonstration and research programs of benefit to mothers and children, and the training of needed personnel.

(v) Dental Health⁽¹⁾

Dental public health specialists testify to the extremely high prevalence rate of dental diseases among all age groups of Canadians. Although almost all the population is affected, the available data suggest that a majority of the population do not seek dental care except for the relief of pain. There is also evidence that persons having the least income and education are least likely to seek a dentist and have the poorest teeth. There is no doubt that poor dental health decreases employability, especially when personal appearance is affected.

All provinces are co-operating with the Department in a nationwide dental health survey of a representative sample of 30,000 children, started in 1966. Using the data received for each province, it is planned to develop a National Dental Health Index on a continuing basis, while each province can use the data to establish its own provincial dental health index; they will provide the first reliable tool for evaluating the various dental programs in operation.

The objective of the Dental Health Division is to improve the dental and oral health of Canadians by supporting programs for the prevention and reduction of dental problems. It provides consultative services on dental health programs and research studies, prepares and distributes dental health information and educational materials, conducts an active intramural research program and carries out certain functions relating to dental manpower, research studies, etc. With respect to research supported by the General Health Grants, the Division appraises service and research projects of dental pertinence. It also advises on applications to the Health Resources Fund relating to the building of dental facilities for training and research, and is concerned with the education, supply and distribution of dental health personnel, especially dental hygienists and other auxiliaries.

V. RESEARCH, TRAINING AND CONSULTATION

The Department from its beginning, has recognized the great importance of a vigorous program of research, of making available resources for the training of manpower, of demonstrating the value of particular innovations and of consultation.

In general the health of the Canadian population--and this includes Canadians with low incomes-- has continually improved. One must keep in mind, however that such improvement as has taken place has not been equally distributed--just as there are differences in general health between the poorer and the richer provinces (note for example, differences in infant mortality rates) so there are differences in the improvement in general health between the poorer Canadians and the more affluent Canadians. Further, as certain illnesses (for example, smallpox and tuberculosis) are virtually eliminated through vigorous public health programs, other illnesses take their place. That is to say the quest for the improvement of the health of all Canadians is a never-ending one.

While it has been established that the health of poor people is not as good as that of the rest of the population, there is at the same time irrefutable evidence that it has greatly improved. A combination of factors has led to this encouraging result which, of course, cannot simply be attributed to Health Services; they include a general rise in the standard of living, including that of the poor, as a result of general economic growth and the income redistribution as a result of income security measures discussed earlier. Poverty, however, has not been eliminated, because the causes of poverty are many and not as well-known as is often believed. While we have a fairly good idea about the characteristics of people who live in poverty, we know very little--except in terms of broad generalizations--when it comes to the dynamics of poverty. The complexity of a modern industrial society makes the isolation of the ultimate causes of poverty an extremely difficult task.

The Department has, however, some research capability in the area through the Research and Statistics Directorate. Extramural research is encouraged and financed under the National Welfare Grants Program established in 1962. Under this same program training grants and fellowships are provided to encourage and support the development of professional skills in the field. Compared to ongoing social science research, particularly that of an applied nature, the amounts made available for research under this program are considerable. In view of the needs for high quality research into the dynamics of poverty the program is, however, still a modest one.

Since programs such as Welfare Grants develop in response to expressed needs, it may be inferred that there has not existed a great interest in research on poverty on the part of social scientists. While it would be impossible to provide a comprehensive picture of the reasons for this lack of interest, one may isolate an important one, namely, the mistrust which has existed and still exists on the part of social scientists when it comes to research which is aimed at providing quick answers to disturbing questions. Another reason which may be singled out is the fact that much applied social research has been done by those who are immersed in social welfare. Keen observers have noted for some time that this leads to research which tends to confirm that what these practitioners have been doing all along is adequate and that required changes are not of a qualitative nature but rather of a quantitative one.

It is, therefore, of the utmost importance that research in the area of poverty be conducted by those who are not committed to a particular solution of the problem. Such research should be of two different kinds: (a) longitudinal studies which isolate those factors which contribute to people getting into poverty, those which keep them in poverty and those which get them out of poverty; (b) studies based on comprehensive conceptualizations of the problem which can be translated into testable propositions. The first kind of study is imperative in order to come to grips with the actual facts that determine the life of people in poverty, the second type in order to develop, not just means of ameliorating the problem nor yet of rehabilitating the poor, but rather to develop models which would make the prevention of poverty possible.

The Department also provides consultative services to the provinces in health and welfare matters of common concern or shared responsibility. For example, consultants in family and child welfare, welfare institutions, community development, welfare services and work activity and public assistance standards are attached to the Canada Assistance Plan administration and a consultant on aging is attached to the Research and Statistics Directorate; they are available for consultation to the provinces and for participation in conferences, seminars and training programs.

Two recent developments which are most interesting from a research point of view are the establishment of the National Council of Welfare which advises the Minister on matters related to welfare and the agreement reached with the National Indian Brotherhood which will establish an Indian Health Committee which is to make recommendations for the improvement of health services for Indians. In both cases channels of communication have been established which will permit a continuous flow of relevant data to the decision-making centres. The National Council of Welfare is a practical application of the findings of small groups and education research. These findings have demonstrated the importance of participation in group activity for the development of several important skills, skills which are greatly needed in the attack on certain problems of the poor by the poor themselves.

In the following sections this program and programs of research supported under health and welfare grants are outlined and a brief description of the activities of the Research and Statistics Directorate is provided. Additional information on these topics is contained in Appendices III, X and XI.

(a) NATIONAL COUNCIL OF WELFARE

As part of the Government Organization Act, 1969, the National Council of Welfare, which had previously been a largely governmental body patterned after the Dominion Council of Health and including in its membership the deputy ministers of welfare of each of the provinces, presided over by the federal deputy minister, was reconstituted as a citizens advisory council and its terms of reference broadened. The role of the Council is to advise the Minister of National Health and Welfare on such matters related to welfare as it deems appropriate.

The new National Council of Welfare consists of 21 private citizens, roughly half of whom are drawn from organizations of consumers of welfare services and half from institutions involved, directly or indirectly, in the provision of welfare services. In the former category are representatives of low income and welfare rights groups (four of whom are presently recipients of social assistance) and spokesmen for organizations of economically disadvantaged minority groups such as Indians, Métis and Black people. In the latter category are persons involved in the social service delivery system, at both the staff and volunteer levels, and representatives of institutions of social work education.

The new Council was constituted in January of this year and held its first meeting earlier this month. The particular constituency which it will seek to represent is that of the consumers of welfare services. To this end it will invite submissions from organizations of low income citizens and disadvantaged minority groups and consider and report on the views advanced by these groups.

The creation of this Council with its special mandate to seek out the views of the poor reflects an awareness that the social service system, while designed to service those in need, has historically failed to involve the people it sought to serve in the definition of their needs and the development of programs to meet these needs. It is intended that this Council will provide a vehicle through which the poor can make their views known to government and a forum in which these views can be considered by a body which encompasses all elements in the social service spectrum and on which the poor will have substantial representation.

The program of the Council is expected to involve additional representatives of low income and disadvantaged minority groups, through their participation in Council committees. A division has been established in the Department of National Health and Welfare to act as a secretariat for the Council and to provide a continuing link between the views expressed to the Council by consumers of welfare services and the program activities of the Department.

(b) NATIONAL HEALTH GRANTS

General Health Grants. - The General Health Grants program of federal grants-in-aid to the provinces was started in 1948 and had the objective of strengthening public health services and hospital services in those areas where provincial authorities recognized the need. Prior to fiscal year 1961-62, the health grants program included Hospital Construction Grants, but since then it has been separated under two Parliamentary votes, General Health Grants and Hospital Construction Grants (see below).

Since January 1, 1965, with the exception of the Public Health Research grant and demonstration projects, federal contributions to Quebec under the health grants program have been made by the Department of Finance under the terms of the Established Programs (Interim Arrangements) Act.

The grant structure has been modified several times but the basic objectives have remained unchanged. The individual health grants now in effect assist the provinces in the principal fields of public health as follows:

Professional Training Grant - to train additional health and hospital workers;

Mental Health Grant - to aid in prevention of mental illness by improving and extending facilities for treatment and rehabilitation, the training of mental health personnel, and the progressive extension of free treatment;

Tuberculosis Control Grant - to extend programs of prevention and case finding, rehabilitation and free treatment, aimed at eradication of the disease;

Public Health Research Grant - to encourage and assist public health research including the conduct of surveys and studies;

General Public Health Grant - to develop new and extended public health organization facilities and services in both rural and urban areas;

Cancer Control Grant - to assist programs for the detection and treatment of cancer and the maintenance of specialized treatment and research centres;

Medical Rehabilitation and Crippled Children Grant - to assist in the provision of medical and ancillary rehabilitation facilities and services and programs for the prevention and correction of crippling conditions in children and adults, including the training of personnel;

Child and Maternal Health Grant - to assist in reducing infant mortality and to improve maternal, infant and child health services and facilities.

Hospital Construction Grants. - Formerly included in the general Health Grants program (see above), these grants have been administered since 1961-62 under a separate Parliamentary vote. Their purpose is to aid in new hospital construction and renovation for general treatment and allied classes of care and for mental and tuberculosis treatment beds. These grants may also be used for the construction of other health facilities, such as community health centres and residences for nurses and interns.

Health Resources Fund. - This forms one of three closely-related parts of the Health Resources Program, the main purpose of which is to help meet the increasing need for trained people to provide more and better comprehensive health services. The other two parts of the program are (a) health resources studies and (b) the provision of a consultative service in the fields of health, manpower and education.

The Health Resources Fund Act was enacted in July 1966 and supporting regulations were passed in February 1967. A sum of $500 million has been appropriated for the Fund, the purpose of which is to provide assistance to the provinces of up to 50% of the capital costs of constructing, renovating, acquiring and equipping health training and research facilities, which include schools, hospitals or the institutions or any portion thereof. Although planning and designing costs are eligible for support, the costs of land, interest charges and residential accommodation are excluded. The $500 million is to be expended over a 15-year period ending in 1980.

The Fund is divided into three parts: $300 million to be distributed among the provinces in proportion to their populations, $25 million as a special additional allocation to the four Atlantic provinces for joint projects and the remaining $175 million to be allocated by the Governor-in-Council.

(c) NATIONAL WELFARE GRANTS

The National Welfare Grants program was established in 1962 to help develop and strengthen welfare services in Canada through a general welfare and professional training grant and a welfare research grant. For the year ending March 31, 1970 $2,500,000. has been allocated to the program. The variety of provisions within the program, along with associated consultative and technical services, allow it to operate as a flexible instrument in the development of welfare services and to give a major emphasis to experimental activities in the welfare field. By assisting with the strengthening of welfare and related services, by stimulating self help approaches by citizen groups, by helping to increase the supply of social welfare manpower, and by supporting research designed to develop greater understanding of social problems and the effectiveness of services, the program relates directly or indirectly to various aspects of social or economic deprivation.

Under the program matching and non-matching grants are made available to provincial and municipal departments, national provincial and local voluntary welfare agencies and organizations, schools of social work and research institutions for projects submitted and approved in accordance with the terms of the annual Welfare Grants Rules, and to individuals for scholarships and fellowships provided for in the Rules. Consultative services are made available to assist with the initiation, implementation and evaluation of projects.

The National Welfare Grants program complements other federal and provincial programs restricted in their financial support to services directed to specific categories of people. In its experimental role assistance is given to research and demonstration projects that contribute to the growth of knowledge in the welfare field, that make possible the collection of comprehensive and reliable data essential to program development, or that lead to the practical application of knowledge and experience to welfare services for the purpose of improving those services, encouraging their wider use and by building new qualities or innovations into them.

The basic purpose of the demonstration project component is to assist and strengthen the welfare field through the funding of experimental activities that are new or innovative in nature. Despite the limited resources available the program has been able to assist with a wide range of projects in the established social services field and in areas where new problems are emerging. In the past year an increasing priority has been placed on social development activities concerned with an involving citizens groups living in underprivileged socio-economic circumstances. The project activities are aimed at developing the capacities and skills of such citizen groups through their involvement in the identification of these problems and in the implementation of such programs and activities. Demonstration projects currently being supported are listed in Appendix III.

Grants on a matching basis are made available to provincial departments of public welfare to assist those departments in undertaking a number of staff development and training activities, and to assist them in strengthening or extending certain services or programs not eligible for federal sharing under the Canada Assistance Plan. Bursaries are provided for full-time graduate training in Canadian schools of social work. Training and staff development grants are available for personnel employed, or to be employed in public and non-governmental welfare agencies where such costs are not shareable under the Canada Assistance Plan.

Welfare scholarships are awarded for graduate study in Canadian schools of social work and fellowships for advance study in Canadian and foreign universities. Planning and organization grants exist to stimulate the development of new departments or schools of social work in Canada, and teaching and field instruction grants support certain program activities of existing schools.

Grants are made to national voluntary welfare agencies for a wide range of projects. While particular attention has been given in the past to staff development and training programs sponsored by those agencies, increasing emphasis is being given to projects designed to assist national agencies in carrying out planning and coordinating functions.

The welfare research component of the National Welfare Grants program has been developed with three objectives in mind - to encourage the greater use of research in program planning and development - to support research projects of potential national significance - (and by so doing) to increase the supply and capability of research personnel working in the social welfare field. A wide variety of projects have been assisted including research design, survey and experimental projects whether undertaken by public or voluntary welfare agencies, universities and schools of social work or research institutions. Particular attention has been given to projects designed to produce new knowledge of general interest to the welfare constituency and wide application to welfare services, and to projects which advance the methodology of social research applied to welfare problems or services. The 86 projects supported since the program was inaugurated in 1962 are listed in Appendix X.

Expenditures under the National Welfare Grants program for the year ended March 31, 1969 totalled $1,999,014. Details appear in Appendix X.

Effective April 1, 1967, a special Mental Retardation Grant was established for a five year period. A portion of this grant is being administered in conjunction with the National Welfare Grants program. With the need to emphasize prevention in this field support is being given to research and demonstration projects designed to expand knowledge and to demonstrate new ways in which knowledge can be applied to the provision of services for the mentally retarded. In the year ending March 31, 1969, $272,483. was expended for projects in this field.

(d) RESEARCH PROGRAM OF THE RESEARCH AND STATISTICS DIRECTORATE

Statutory Basis for Departmental Research and Statistical Services

Authority for the departmental research and statistical service was specifically provided in the Department of National Health and Welfare Act which assigns to the Department responsibility for:

5. (b) investigation and research into public health and welfare; and
- (h) subject to the provisions of the Statistics Act, the collection, publication and distribution of information relating to the public health, improved sanitation and social and industrial conditions affecting the health and lives of the people.

In exercising these responsibilities, the Department established its Research and Statistics Division in 1945, which for the last 23 years has acted as the principal federal agency for socio-economic research in the fields of health, welfare and social security, and has provided a statistical service for the Department.

Other acts administered by the Department make specific reference to the statistical data required by the Minister for the proper administration of the statutory programs. The Department requires detailed statistical information in order to evaluate and report on these departmental programs.

The departmental authority is of course circumscribed by the provisions of the Statistics Act, which allocates the major responsibility for routine data collection to the Bureau of Statistics. The Department therefore makes a distinction between the specialized information it needs to fulfil its responsibilities, and the comprehensive statistics on the health and welfare of the people that can be more effectively gathered through the Dominion Bureau of Statistics facilities. The statistical research of the Department is problem-oriented or program-oriented. The Department conducts research to find answers to problems in the fields of health, welfare and social security. It conducts research to evaluate the effectiveness of its programs in these fields, and to enable it to plan new programs. Naturally, in the conduct of research in sociological, economic, epidemiological, and administrative questions, the tools used are frequently statistical tools, and the observations made are statistical observations. In exercising its statutory responsibility, therefore, the Department is careful to distinguish between the application of statistical methods to diverse problems on the one hand and the routine collection and analysis of data for the publication of annual statistical series, where the Dominion Bureau of Statistics has a primary role to play.

A portion of the general authority given the Department to carry out investigations and research into public health and welfare by Section 5 of the Department of National Health and Welfare Act was specifically delegated to the Research and Statistics Directorate most recently in a memorandum from the Deputy Ministers dated February 9, 1968, which set forth general guidelines on the allocation of responsibilities for the collection of health and welfare statistics and for the planning and conduct of research on the economic and sociological implications or facets of health and welfare problems and developments. Included were the following specific guidelines:

a) All branches are encouraged to seek the advice and, if required, the services of the Research and Statistics Directorate, with respect to any needs that are identified for the collection and analysis of statistics needed to evaluate or monitor the consequences of current policies and programs.

b) All economic, statistical, and sociological studies and surveys involving the analysis of statistics required by more than one program branch and all innovative studies to be undertaken in these fields are to be assigned solely to the Research and Statistics Directorate.

c) The Research and Statistics Directorate is responsible for the Department's official liaison with the Dominion Bureau of Statistics.

Within these guidelines, officers of the Directorate provide advice and help in problem-solving, in new program planning, and in evaluation of existing programs, to the directors of the various programs operated by the Department. On request, they initiate, plan, and execute research studies and surveys of an economic, sociological, or statistical nature.

Role of the Directorate

The Research and Statistics Directorate is primarily a service-oriented organization established to assist the Department in meeting its responsibility for "investigation and research into public health and welfare". Its functions include the collection, analysis and evaluation of basic information on the socio-economic aspects of health, welfare, and social security.

In carrying out these functions, research is conducted on three levels. A number of senior research officers serve as consultants to the health and welfare management of the Department, in the planning and development of new programs, and in the evaluation of existing programs. To this end, research is conducted which entails testing various assumptions regarding development of future programs or modification in existing programs. A second level of research deals with the collection, preparation, and dissemination of scientific information relating to health and welfare. A third level is concerned with the conduct of applied research in the health and welfare fields. This involves testing specific hypotheses, analyzing and evaluating data collected, and reporting on findings or conclusions to be drawn from the study.

Organization of the Directorate

Headed by a Director, who is directly responsible to both the Deputy Ministers, the Deputy Minister of National Health and the Deputy Minister of National Welfare, the Directorate is organized into four divisions and a unit on International Welfare and Special Projects. Each division is composed of several sections as listed below.

- (1) Health Research Division
 - i) Medical Care Section
 - ii) Hospital Care Section
 - iii) Public Health Section
 - iv) Health Expenditure and Resources Section
- (2) Welfare Research Division
 - i) Social Assistance and Family Welfare Section
 - ii) Community Studies Section
 - iii) Welfare Economics Section
- (3) Social Security Research Division
 - i) Income Maintenance Section
 - ii) Canada Pension Plan Section
 - iii) Financial Analysis Section
- (4) Biostatistics Division
 - i) Medical Statistics Section
 - ii) Hospital Statistics Section
 - iii) Program Statistics Section
- (5) International Welfare and Special Projects
 - i) Special Projects
 - ii) Consultant in Aging

Scientific Data Collection

Within the Directorate, the responsibility for scientific data collection largely rests with the Biostatistics Division. A number of statistical reporting systems have been developed during recent years. One of the largest systems deals with the Hospital Insurance Program, and serves in the preparation of a Preliminary Annual Report and the final Annual Report tabled by the Minister in Parliament. The data for the disability allowances program for a number of years have been processed to provide an Annual Report on this program. The data provided from the Poison Control Program of the Food and Drug Directorate have been processed annually to provide a comprehensive administrative and epidemiological report on poisonings occurring in Canada. The Admission/Separation forms for the Yukon and Territorial Hospital Insurance Plans have been processed annually to provide the ten standard morbidity tables approved by the Advisory Committee on Hospital Insurance. Annual statistics are prepared for the Virus Isolation Reporting System for the Virus Laboratory, the reports of radiation exposure by film monitoring are processed routinely, and periodic reports are prepared providing a comprehensive statistical analysis of the program.

Traditionally information is collected routinely from the voluntary medical care insurance programs in Canada. With the advent of a national medical care program, however, emphasis is on the development of a provincial statistical reporting system.

Scientific and Technical Information

The Directorate provides scientific and technical information regarding health and welfare in response to inquiries made by national and international agencies, governments of other countries, research workers and students. Information is obtained from the provinces concerning the organization and administration of health and welfare services. Provincial legislation is also reviewed annually to up-date legislative changes in provincial programs. The information provides the basis of our annual publication, Health and Welfare Services in Canada, which is incorporated into the Canada Year Book.

The Directorate conducts research studies and surveys, and provides consultation services with regard to economic, statistical and scientific research related to the health and social services. It publishes a substantial amount of original data on health and welfare services and resources. Unpublished studies are completed for use in departmental planning or are carried out at the request of individual agencies or persons. Other publications, however, are prepared for the use of the general public.

The services provided by the Directorate are used by various divisions and branches of the Department, Royal Commissions, Members of Parliament, committees of the House of Commons and of the Senate, agencies or individuals engaged in specialized studies, provincial and voluntary agencies, universities, and such international bodies as I.L.O., I.S.S.A., and W.H.O.

The Directorate has instituted the publication of inventories of research projects in health and welfare fields compiled from returns provided by research workers responsible for the projects. Three publications are published and distributed periodically: Inventory of Welfare Research, Research Projects and Investigations into Socio-Economic Aspects of Health, and Research Projects and Investigations related to Hospitals.

Statistical Services

The main purpose of the statistical services operated by the Department is to provide management with valid information necessary:

- (a) to discharge its statutory responsibilities relating to the promotion or preservation of the health, social security and social welfare of the people of Canada; and
- (b) to meet its regular obligations through participation in international health and welfare programs.

Statistical services are defined as those activities concerned with the collection, analysis and interpretation of quantitative data, and the application of statistical methods in problem-solving, in order to meet the Department's responsibilities and obligations. Statistical information is a basic requirement for all phases of the administrative process in the Department. It consists of answers to specific questions obtained through the application of statistical methods, regular reports on program operations indicating degrees of success and failure in achieving program objectives, or the product of a scientific investigation which will be disseminated to those members of the public who can use it to promote or preserve the health and social welfare of our people.

The planning and evaluation of major programs in the health, welfare and social security fields are an essential responsibility of the Department. (see Appendix XI) Evaluation entails analyzing provincial programs in these fields, or shared-cost programs like hospital insurance, medical care, and welfare assistance. For this purpose, the statistics needed are obtained from a variety of sources.

The provinces report such data to the Department on a uniform, standardized basis, and these statistics are passed to the Research and Statistics Directorate for analysis and program evaluation. Departmental statisticians, economists, and sociologists are responsible for consolidating national statistics on the costs and operations of each program for analyzing the caseloads of each program, and for evaluating the services provided, the extent and nature of the protection provided, and the effectiveness of each program in achieving its objectives.

Grants in Aid of Research

The Directorate provides technical assistance and advice in the development of research projects which are supported by departmental grants, and contributes to the appraisal of proposed projects, particularly for welfare research grant applications. It also provides on request consultation to outside agencies on research design and methodology of collecting, examining, analyzing and evaluating data.

Volume and Cost of Research

The Directorate does not finance any extramural research projects. Its total budget, amounting to $890,000 in the current year and a forecast $1,050,000 for the next year, is committed to intramural research projects. For the last departmental inventory, a total of 65 health research projects were identified. To this sum should be added another 20 to 25 welfare and social security research projects. No separate financial accounting for these individual projects is yet available.

APPENDICES

HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENT OF CONCEPTS AND MEASURES OF MINIMUM LIVING STANDARDS*

By the end of the 19th century, many countries in Europe had enacted poor laws but these statutes failed to define the degree of poverty which gives claim to relief. In fact, one of the early researchers on the subject, Louise Twining, The Guardian of the Poor at Kensington, wrote in 1881 about this difficulty in defining poverty "Destitution is everywhere stated to be the definition and the test, but as far as we are aware, the exact understanding and interpretation of this term has yet to be given". (1) She compared the legislation on poverty of most European countries and found that nearly everywhere distress from incapacity for work, mental imbecility, sickness or old age had a legitimate claim to public support. Thus the poor were considered eligible for assistance outside the work house only when they were disabled or elderly but not when they were able-bodied. Louise Twining was not too much concerned about defining and studying a minimum living standard. Her main purpose was to criticize the English "outdoor relief system" i.e. (relief given to persons outside the work house) which she thought would have disastrous effects on the country. Reflecting the thinking of her time she thought that this practice would have catastrophic results because "the dread of poverty is diminished and he who is half poor works less instead of more so that he speedily becomes a complete pauper". She was also concerned about the country's morals and said "The morality of the poor man suffers, for he looks upon his provision as a right, for which he therefore need not be thankful. And the morality of the rich man suffers, for the natural moral relation between him and the poor man has become completely severed, there is no place left for the exercise of his benevolence, being obliged to give, he gives with reluctance and thus is the highest principle of charitable action, Christian love, exposed to great danger of destruction." (2)

The first attempts in defining poverty were undertaken by Engel in Germany, Seeborn Rowntree, and Charles Booth in England towards the end of the 19th century.

ERNST ENGEL

Ernst Engel (1821-96), a disciple of the German liberal school, was one of the first statisticians who believed in the application of the quantitative method to the study of social phenomena. He was the first to demonstrate the fruitfulness of the use of statistics in the study of consumption. He calculated and examined the proportions of the types of expenditures in the family budgets of workmen and deduced the law of consumption known as Engel's law which still is used by economists as a quick way to assess the relative well-being of dissimilar groups. As generally formulated, that law states: that as income increases, families spend more money for food, but this larger amount takes a smaller share of income, leaving proportionately more funds for other things. Accordingly, a low percentage of income going for food can be equated with prosperity and a higher percentage with deprivation. Expressed in more technical terms the law simply states that income elasticity of demand for food is less than one. He also devised a new measure of consumption taking unity as the value of consumption for a child of up to one year of age and adding 0.1 for every further year up to the age of 20 for women and 25 for men at which time they measure 3.0 and 3.5 respectively. (3) He used this method in a comparative study of Belgian workmen's budgets and found a considerable increase in the living standard between 1853 and 1891. He attempted also to establish a standard of living called "Volkswohlstand" which he stated to be that level of well-being at which people spend a maximum of 80 per cent of their income for "reasonable" satisfaction of physical needs with the remainder to be spent for higher cultural satisfaction. This form of standard of living was taken over and used in a modified form by many studies dealing with standards of living and poverty lines. After the general acceptance of Engel's law, a number of unsuccessful attempts were made to find similar laws for other categories of necessities such as shelter and clothing. However the demand for these two separate categories is subject to so many factors that regular patterns of demand are difficult to determine.

While Engel was the first social scientist to derive meaningful relationships from seemingly arbitrary observations of family budgets, his theories could not be developed in his day. It was not until social researchers began to understand the significance of results that can be obtained from analysis of budget data and until more sophisticated statistical techniques became available that studies could be undertaken to investigate the relationship on how the expenditure on or the consumption of a particular commodity varies with the income level of families. By using econometric analysis a number of consumption studies are being made which are based on Engel's law. Such studies are particularly useful for social and economic development programs, the construction of cost of living index numbers and the comparison of living standards.

CHARLES BOOTH

In England, Seebohm Rowntree and Charles Booth did pioneering work in defining poverty lines. Both Rowntree and Booth recognized that there is no universal and absolute definition of poverty and that its meaning was relative as to place and time. They agreed that poverty must be related to some minimum standard of economic welfare based on provision of the primary needs of the people concerned. Charles Booth defined poverty in terms of income, "By the word 'poor' I mean to describe those who have a sufficiently regular though bare income, such as 18s. to 21s. per week for a moderate family".⁽¹⁾ He added that the incomes of the poor are nearly always exceeded by their admitted expenditure. The explanation may lie in the understating of regular earnings, the use of credit met either by final evasion of repayment or by some windfall of income received outside regular earnings.

B.S. ROWNTREE

Rowntree was the first to attempt a more adequate determination of poverty. In his first study of poverty in York in 1899⁽²⁾ he estimated the cost of buying those goods and services which at that time were absolutely necessary for the maintenance of merely physical efficiency.⁽³⁾ To do this he drew up a list of necessities under the headings of food, clothing, fuel and household sundries and estimated how much it would cost to buy these. His estimates were based on interviews with a number of working class families. Families whose incomes were too low to enable them to purchase these necessities were said to be living in primary poverty. People said to be living in secondary poverty were those who had adequate income to purchase these necessities but who through mismanagement could not make ends meet and who were in the judgement of the interviewers living in visible poverty.

To estimate a required subsistence income, Rowntree made an inquiry into the quantity and kinds of food necessary to maintain families of various sizes in a state of physical efficiency. In order to do this he used a number of food studies prepared by experts in nutrition. His estimates were based upon the assumption that the necessary diet is selected with a careful regard to the nutritive values of various food stuffs and that these are all purchased at lowest current prices. To limit the quantity and quality of the food to a minimum he allowed for a diet less generous in quality and variety than that supplied to "the able-bodied paupers in work houses".(1) He limited the clothing allowance to that absolutely necessary for health. In order to determine rents he ordered a survey of rents paid by working classes. His minimum weekly budget for a family of two adults and three children was the following:

Food	12s 9d	59 per cent
Rent	4s	18 " "
Clothing	4s 11d	23 " "
	21s 8d	100 per cent

Rowntree conducted two subsequent surveys at York, one in 1936 and one in 1950. In each of these studies he adopted progressively more liberal yardsticks and extended his budget to include new components.

(a) Food Budget

In establishing a minimum food standard Rowntree anticipated that the work of nutritionists would be used increasingly in social services. In his first two surveys he leaned heavily on the work of the American nutritionist Atwater(2) who in 1895 published a nutrition study which was based on the number of calories found to be required at different periods of physical development under varying requirements for muscular activity in varying types of occupation.

In his latest study of 1950 Rowntree based his survey on the report of the British Medical Association dealing with nutritional needs.(3) Having obtained nutritional requirements Rowntree then translated these into the cheapest possible diet. Rowntree also assigned certain factors representing the nutrients required by children of different ages and women as compared with adult men. The various factors which he has adopted are as follows:

Men		10/10
Women		8/10
Boys	14 to 16	= 8/10
Girls	14 to 16	= 7/10
Children	10 to 13	= 6/10
Children	6 to 9	= 5/10
Children	2 to 5	= 4/10
Children	0 to 2	= 3/10

He was of the opinion that by the use of these factors the food consumed by any given family can be readily expressed and the nutrient required for families of varying sizes can be easily compared.

(3) Report of the Committee on Nutrition, London, British Medical Associates, 1950.

In establishing the cost of food he investigated cash prices paid for various food stuffs by the working classes.

He took into account that the poor buy their food in small quantities and thus pay a higher price for it. The average of these prices had been adopted in estimating the cost of the standard diet except in those cases where the articles could be purchased at lower prices in co-operative stores.

(b) Rent

In estimating the necessary minimum expenditure for rent, Rowntree would have preferred to take some reliable standard of the accommodation required to maintain families of different sizes in health and then to take as the minimum expenditure the average cost of such accommodation. This method however would have assumed that every family could obtain the needed minimum accommodation which was far from being the case. In view of the difficulty of estimating the rent of standard accommodation, Rowntree chose to use current rental payments as the basis for the necessary minimum expenditure. By choosing this latter method, he accepted the then current conditions instead of developing a minimum standard for shelter.

(c) Household Sundries

Expenditures involving clothing, fuel and light were estimated on the basis of information collected from a number of working people. In 1936 and 1950, 29 families were interviewed to ascertain how much they spent on clothing and various other items. The poverty line was then based on the average expenditure of the three families whose expenditures on these items were the lowest.

(d) Personal Sundries

Provision was made to include personal sundries in the 1936 and 1950 budgets, and included insurance premiums, trade union dues, newspaper subscriptions, transportation, reading and writing materials and radio. The estimates as to what should be included and their costs were based on a number of interviews but the final results reflected Rowntree's decisions and value judgements.

Evaluation of the Rowntree Method

While on the face of it, the method used by Rowntree seems to be well founded, his approach has several limitations. The reports of the British Medical Association indicate that calculations of nutritional requirements are rough estimates and that calculation of protein and vitamin requirements as well as desirable intakes of calcium and iron are still a matter of guess work. (1) In addition, later social researchers point out that the determination of the income needed to purchase nutrition for the maintenance of physical efficiency is at best a risky exercise since nutritional content of certain food stuffs varies from place to place and from season to season.

It is also doubtful whether poor families have the knowledge or opportunity to purchase a diet that gives adequate nutrition at the lowest possible cost.

The main shortcoming of Rowntree's budget was that his value judgements were arbitrary in the determination of basic needs.

The fact remains, however, that Rowntree did much to awaken Britain's social conscience and to reveal the deprivations of the poor. The principles developed by Rowntree at the end of the last century are still broadly followed by contemporary social scientists and governments. When devising a new system of social security in England, Lord Beveridge recognized Rowntree's "subsistence" standard, with the result that the rates paid under National Assistance after the second World War bore a close resemblance to the standards which Rowntree had used in his 1936 survey.

PETER TOWNSEND

Peter Townsend wrote a number of articles on the development of a minimum living standard. The aim of his first article 'Measuring Poverty'(1) is to consider how detailed knowledge can be acquired about the living conditions for the poor. First, he examined the past standards developed for measuring poverty especially those developed by Rowntree. He found Rowntree's standard too arbitrary.

If clothing, money for travel to work and newspapers are considered to be necessities in the conventional sense why not tea, handkerchiefs, laundry, contraceptives, cosmetics, hair dressing, shaving and life insurance payments? Are we indeed so sure that the list of necessities must exclude cigarettes, beer, toys for children, Christmas gifts and cinema entertainment?(2)

The question of what was regarded or what ought to have been regarded as necessities was very rarely raised in any of Rowntree's surveys. In Townsend's opinion the only defensible constituent of a poverty budget is the amount allocated to food, but even with this approach there is a lack of relationship of the budget to the customs and habits of the working people.

How those on the border line of poverty ought to spend their money is a very different thing from how they do spend their money. It would be unrealistic to expect them, as in effect many social investigators have expected them to be skilled dieticians with marked tendencies toward puritanism..... In considering the spending habits of poorer people, it seems that due regard must be paid to the conventions sanctioning membership of their community, to the influence of economic and social measures currently adopted by society as a whole, such as rationing, welfare, food services, food subsidies and indirect taxes and to the standards encouraged by advertisers, the press, the BBC and the church.(3)

Townsend suggests the following procedure for new studies:

1. The collection of data relating to the food consumption and expenditure as well as the income of working class people.
2. The comparison of these data, assembled according to constitution of household and income group, with a scale of nutritive needs.....
3. The isolation, from all those securing minimum nutrition of, say, the 25 per cent in the various household groups who achieve it on the smallest incomes, or rather, the smallest incomes less one or two fixed involuntary overheads, such as rent and compulsory insurances. The average total expenditure of these households, less the overheads, according to their different sizes, can be taken as the poverty line.(4)

He justified the resulting standard on the ground that it is attained by a fair proportion of working class people and therefore realistic. He thinks that the application of the method would obviate the need for subjective decisions about money required for clothing and other budget components. He agrees that the method suggested is basically one of measuring the extent of malnutrition "not attributable to wasteful spending" but he thinks that if the results given were correlated with findings based on housing standards, education etc. it would yield a realistic picture of poverty.

In another article written in 1962 "The Meaning of Poverty"(1) Townsend restated his main thesis that both poverty and subsistence are relative concepts and that they can only be defined in relation to material and historical resources available at a particular time to the members of a particular society. He repeated his criticism on the subsistence concept as used by earlier writers, mainly Rowntree, and even questioned the approach he (Townsend) had suggested in his earlier article based on the calculation of nutritional requirements. He now points out that it is important to remember that the estimation of income needed to purchase minimum nutrition is a hazardous exercise.... "calculations of nutritional requirements are rough estimates subject to wide margins of error"(2). In recommending new approaches to solve the problem of measuring poverty, he suggests the return to the relative concept of defining "necessaries" as done by Alfred Marshall(3) and Adam Smith(4). He also suggests the studying of expenditure patterns of those who suffered a reduction in income in relation to the previous standards of living to find out what individuals actually treat as expendable and as necessities.

Using Galbraith's quotation from his Affluent Society: "People are poverty stricken when their income, even if adequate for survival, falls markedly behind that of the community", Townsend suggests that a possible definition of poverty could be developed on the basis of measuring how many households have a total income of less than 50 per cent of the average.

He suggests other measures of poverty such as the differential enjoyment of housing standards and educational resources by different classes and types of households. His concluding remarks are "our general theory then should be that individuals and families whose resources, over time, fall short of the resources commanded by the average individual or families in the community in which they live, whether that community is a local, national or international one, are in poverty."(5)

A joint study(5) was constructed by Townsend and Abel-Smith to find out the number and characteristics of persons with low levels of living from family expenditure surveys, carried out in 1953-54 and 1960 by the Ministry of Labour. Another purpose of this study was to examine the differences in levels of living that existed among households of similar size and composition. The principal measure of poverty used is the level of living of National Assistance Board applicants in each of these years. Townsend's usage of this measure did not imply that this level of living was an appropriate measure or that the households of different composition living at national assistance standards have comparable levels of living. He did indicate that regardless of what could be said of the adequacy of this measure, it did have the advantage of being an official operational definition of a minimum living at any particular time.

(3) Alfred Marshall said in 1890 "...differences in climate and differences in custom make things necessary in some places, which are superfluous in others.... But.... a careful analysis had made it evident that there is for each rank of industry, at any time and place, a more or less clearly defined income which is necessary for merely sustaining its members; while there is another and larger income which is necessary for keeping it in full efficiency.... Every estimate of necessities must be relative to place and time." A. Marshall, Principles of Economics, London 1946, pp. 68-70.

In this study Townsend repeats his criticisms on the subsistence standard used by earlier writers. "Saying who is in poverty is to make a relative statement - rather like saying who is short or heavy. But it is also a statement of a much more complex kind than one referring to a unilineal scale of measurement".⁽¹⁾ He does not make any suggestions about how to define poverty nor does he recommend new methods for its measurement.

In talking about implications for government information and research, he mentions the need for social information about the poorest section of the population. He says that no government can expect to pursue national policies in social security and welfare unless information about living conditions, particularly the living conditions of the poor, is regularly collected, analyzed and reported.

In Townsend's opinion the government should develop various standards to indicate need. This applies to nutritional as well as environmental requirements such as housing. The government should also collect information regularly from family expenditure surveys. The purpose of these surveys should be not only to show general trends, but also to indicate particular circumstances of poor families as compared to those of middle and high income classes. Information should also be collected on those groups who usually do not respond to surveys. Complementary reports to family expenditure surveys should be published showing sources of income, incomes and expenditures of families receiving social benefits and of families with special problems. Finally the government should attempt to improve family expenditure surveys to the extent that they can be reliably used to describe the socio-economic conditions of particular groups of the population.

Evaluation of Townsend's Proposals

Summarizing Townsend's views in developing a minimum living standard we find that he develops two main thoughts. One is that in drawing poverty lines, the budget maker has to avoid arbitrary decisions about people's basic needs. The second is that since poverty is a relative concept it should be measured in relative rather than absolute terms.

In his first article "Measuring Poverty" he criticizes the subsistence level used by earlier writers. His main criticism is directed against the arbitrary method of determining necessities. However, he appears to accept their basic approach, namely: to base the calculation of the poverty line on food requirements because "nutritional needs are more susceptible of measurement than clothing, fuel and other needs". In his second article "The Meaning of Poverty" he questions his basic approach mentioned above and recommends "that instead of seeking the minimum cost of adequate nutrition and finding how many families do not have an income sufficient to meet this cost, we could study random samples of the population to find which and how many families and at what level of total income, only just achieve or fall short of a certain level of nutrition". He does not give any explanation about how the studying of random samples of the population would give an indication of the number of people falling short of a certain level of nutrition nor does he define this level of nutrition. In this article he also suggests other relative concepts such as the level of education as possible approaches.

In his third paper The Poor and the Poorest he did not define poverty. Instead, out of necessity, he used the level of living of National Assistance Board applicants to indicate the poverty line. In the same paper he also recommended the development of various standards to indicate need but does not indicate how this should be carried out.

DEVELOPMENT OF A MINIMUM LIVING STANDARD IN THE UNITED STATES

In the United States a number of studies have been prepared recently to define a minimum living standard. A poverty formula was advanced by the President's Council of Economic Advisers in their 1964 Annual Report. This formula classified as "poor" a family if its annual income was under $3,000 and a single person if his annual income was below $1,500. Because of regional differences in the cost of living and other factors the Council noted that these were crude and approximate measures. Another yardstick which could be used in defining and measuring poverty is based on the "market basket" approach in terms of food, clothing, shelter and services. This kind of yardstick gives a more precise definition of poverty than an income bench mark because it forces the community to spell out a minimum standard of living for different groups and individuals. It leads to the identification of goods and services that compose the market basket, and the people living in poverty can be defined as those whose incomes are too small to acquire the market basket. Among the studies prepared to develop such a market basket, Mollie Orshansky's approach described in her paper "Counting the Poor"⁽¹⁾ can be considered one of the most important. It was her method that was adopted by the Office of the Economic Opportunity as a working tool pending completion of further research.

The Orshansky Approach

In developing a minimum living standard, Miss Orshansky based her calculations on the amount of money needed to purchase the food for a minimum adequate diet as determined by the food consumption studies made by the Department of Agriculture. This food budget is the lowest that could be devised to contain all essential nutrients using foods readily available in the U.S.A. The minimum standard or poverty line was then calculated at three times the amount needed to purchase the components in this food budget.

The food budgets are based on food plans prepared by USDA. These plans represent a translation of the criteria of nutritional adequacy into quantities and types of food compatible with the preference of families as revealed in food consumption studies. The food budgets and the derivative poverty incomes were estimated in detail for families of differing size and composition. Allowances were made for the lower cash requirements of families on farms who can produce some of their own food.

To solve the problem of translating food costs into total income requirements Miss Orshansky used the principle of Engel's law which states that the smaller the family income the greater the proportion of income spent on food. She assumed that the equivalent levels of adequacy were reached when one-third of total income was sufficient to purchase an adequate diet. This assumed proportion of income required appears to be subject to an arbitrary decision. Her decision was based partly on a value judgement and partly on a study made in 1960-61 which revealed that families with incomes of $6,000 and more spent on the average 23.5 per cent of their aggregate income for food. Miss Orshansky estimated the food budgets and the derivative income cut-off points in detail for families of different size and composition with a farm - non-farm differential for each type.

Similarities in the Orshansky and Townsend Methods

Miss Orshansky, as mentioned earlier, in establishing her method took advantage of the existence of a minimum food standard with regional variations as established by USDA. Townsend has indicated in his booklet The Poor and the Poorest that he too favours the collection and usage of similar information. It is also assumed that he would take into account family size and composition when measuring poverty as well as the differences in the cost of living in urban and rural areas, in the same way as developed by the Orshansky method. It appears then that the main difference in the two methods used is that Miss Orshansky calculates poverty line incomes by multiplying the actual cost of the food budget by three, a factor based partly on the actual relationship between food and total expenditures indicated in expenditure surveys and partly by value judgement. Townsend on the other hand proposes to isolate data on incomes of 25 per cent of those working class families who achieve or live up to the minimum food budget on the smallest incomes. He takes, then, the average total expenditure of those households, according to their different sizes and compositions as the poverty lines.

Both methods contain a number of value judgements. For the Orshansky method this is in the assumed one-third food-income relationship. In the Townsend method on the other hand the value judgement lies in the selection of lowest spending average of 25 per cent of the working class people, probably representing the lower one-third of all income groups whose average spending will determine the poverty line.

While the Townsend method appears to be less arbitrary than most other approaches, it will be recalled that he moved away from his original proposal of defining poverty in absolute terms because he feels that poverty is a relative concept and should be measured in relative terms.

Redefining poverty in relative terms (Victor R. Fuchs)

Victor R. Fuchs(1) in an article on "Redefining poverty and redistributing income" proposes that we define as poor any family whose income is less than one-half the median family income. He suggests that in implementing such measures it would be necessary to modify the national standard to take account of family size and composition, regional variations and other relevant variables. The author agrees that the use of any fraction of the median income is an arbitrary decision, but he points out that the selection of the actual proportion should be established openly through the political process and as a national value judgement. He thinks that such a process would be preferable to the present approach "which is subject to political manipulation under the guise of technical budget studies".(1) The main advantages of the method is that it provides a poverty standard that changes with the growth of real national income instead of static subsistence budget based on contemporary standards which will be soon out of date. It focuses attention on the distribution of income and provides a realistic basis for appraising the success or failure of government anti-poverty programs. The proponents of the income distribution approach also maintain that there are powerful arguments of different nature in favour of redistributing income especially from raising the productive ability of the poor. Thus "if we define poverty as having much less than anybody else, then we must measure progress by the extent to which we have been able to alter distribution of income at the lower end of the scale. By this standard.... we have not made any progress at all in the post war years".(1) From a quite different point of view the main advantages of the method is its simplicity and its relatively low development cost, since most of the data needed on incomes is being collected regularly.

Those who favour the market basket method point out that this approach concentrates too much on income distribution, per se, and leads to the promotion of income guarantee programs. They also think that the method would not show with certainty who are the poor since they would be lumped together in the lower fraction of the income distribution. Professor Oscar Ornati(2) says that "if we define the poor as making some part of the bottom of the income distribution, some kind of lower fifth, eighth, tenth or whatever fraction you will, their actual permanence is guaranteed."

DEVELOPMENT OF THE MINIMUM LIVING STANDARD IN CANADA (J.R. Podoluk)

In Canada Miss J.R. Podoluk prepared a paper on the "Characteristics of Low Income Families"(1) in which she estimates the number of low income families and provides information on the characteristics of families living in poverty. In defining poverty she follows Miss Orshansky in adopting some modified version of Engel's law. As did Ernst Engel and Mollie Orshansky, she too measures the well-being of families by the discretionary income left after expenditures on basic necessities. She considers families as being poor if they allocate more than 70 per cent of the family income to expenditures on necessities. She bases her judgement on the examination of data derived from the 1959 Family Expenditure Survey which indicates that, on the average, families of different sizes and incomes allocate about half their incomes for buying shelter, food and clothing.(1) "It has been assumed that where expenditures on these components were well above average and accounted for 70 per cent or more of family income available these families might have difficulty in managing to meet all of their needs out of their incomes." She found that unattached individuals with incomes below $1,500, a family of two with less than $2,500, and families of 3, 4, 5 or more with less than $3,000, $3,500 or $4,000 respectively spent more than 70 per cent of their incomes for basic necessities. These income levels which determine the poverty line are very close to those arrived at by the Orshansky method in the U.S.A. The basic difference between the two methods is of course that, the Orshansky method is based on a minimum food standard arrived at by comprehensive and highly reliable food studies and surveys, while Miss Podoluk's method lacks the basis of a scientifically designed food budget and represents a value judgement based on observation of existing spending patterns.

CONCLUSION

From the end of the nineteenth century to the present a considerable change in the concept and measurement of "Minimum Living Standards" took place. In the days of Louise Twining at the end of the last century the poor were generally considered eligible for outdoor relief only if their distress originated from incapacity for work, e.g. sickness, mental imbecility and age. As a result of more progressive thinking this concept changed in the beginning of the twentieth century to a concept of poverty defined solely in terms of subsistence criteria. Thus, Rowntree defined the poor as those "whose total earnings were insufficient to obtain the minimum necessities for the maintenance of merely physical efficiency". Even though he did not explain what he meant by "merely physical efficiency," his concept was useful in the earlier phases of industrialization. However, it appears to be of less use in today's modern industrial communities as they exist in Canada, U.S.A. and the Western World. In these countries with increasing industrialization, a considerable affluence emerged which liberated large segments of the population from subsistence levels of living. As subsistence poverty declined in these countries social and economic inequalities continued to prevail. It became evident that poverty was a consequence of such inequalities and that it became a relative condition in that the improved standard of living of the poor is now related to a much higher general standard of living. This development led to the Townsend concept of poverty which states that people living in poverty are those whose resources over time fall seriously short of the resources commanded by the average individual or family in the community in which they live. This definition comes close to Fuchs' definition of poverty stating that the poor are those families whose income is less than one-half of the median income. However the view suggesting that poverty is entirely a relative matter appears to be too extreme to be accepted generally. A workable compromise method had to be developed which combines absolute and relative measurement. This has been achieved by rediscovering Engel's law and by attempting to measure the well-being of families by the discretionary income left after expenditures on food and the basic necessities. This method has been adopted in the United States by Miss Mollie Orshansky and by Miss J. Podoluk in Canada.

FAMILY BUDGETS IN CANADA*

Family budgets have been developed and published in four cities of Canada: Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg and Halifax. It appears however that original research on the subject has been limited to that conducted by the Montreal and Toronto councils of social planning agencies. The budgets published by these two agencies serve as the basic studies for the other reports. Thus The Minimum Financial Needs Investigation(1) published by the Age and Opportunity Bureau of Winnipeg is based on a study by Montreal Diet Dispensary, while the Halifax Family Budgeting Guide is based on the Guides for Family Budgeting(2) prepared by the Social Planning Council of Toronto. Both the Winnipeg and the Halifax budgets were adjusted to local conditions. Of the four budgets only three relate to families of all types while the Winnipeg budget is limited to retired couples only.

TORONTO'S "GUIDE TO FAMILY BUDGETING" (3)

Among all studies, Toronto's budgeting is the most comprehensive and will be discussed first.

The main purpose of the Guide is to provide "a reference on adequate standards of living for specific categories of family expenditure and to serve as a statement of costs in meeting special categories of family need".

Concept

Basically the Toronto budget is a "moderate" budget. The level of living reflected is sufficiently above the subsistence survival level to secure good health and a sense of self respect. On the other hand it is well below any level that could be called luxurious. Thus, the budget includes goods and services identified as bare or conventional necessities and a selection of those commonplace wants which are so important to the well-being of families that they rank with necessities.

Methods

Selected budget items were allocated to four technical committees (food, housing, clothing and miscellaneous family needs) consisting of experts in the respective fields and social workers with considerable knowledge of patterns of family life. Committee members determined the quantity and quality of goods and services needed, and arranged for their pricing. Pricing was done by the Prices Division of DBS and volunteers who priced goods and services in outlets throughout Toronto. In updating prices the Consumer Price Index was used to revise cost categories where possible. Other categories were repriced in stores.

Development of the food budget

The five food groups of Canada's Food Guide were expanded to eleven categories to provide the complete range of food generally in use.

Studies of family food purchases provided guidance and judgements on the individual foodstuffs to be included in the food budget and on their relation, importance, or frequency of use.

* Prepared by Dr. Otto Wayand, Research and Statistics Directorate in the Fall of 1968.

A normative food budget was developed based on theoretical quantities of foods for individual consumption and then tested using the Canadian Dietary Standard (4) and Canada's Food Guide(5) as references.

Nine families carried out a one-week test with regard to quantities. Where amounts warranted revision in the light of actual experience, changes were made.

(i) Elderly people

The study points out that food needs of the older person differ from those of the average adult. The differences arise from the lower calorie requirement of the aged on one hand and the need for high protein food on the other. In terms of food prices these two factors tend to offset each other and in the respective budgets, food allowances for the aged are the same size as those provided for other adults with light employment.

(ii) Employed Mothers

The food budget includes sufficient convenience foods (prepackaged and frozen foods) to reflect current patterns of usage. With careful planning, employed mothers need spend no additional money on food.

Clothing

When developing clothing standards, the clothing committee was considering hygienic requirements, growth needs for children and teenagers, and social acceptability.

The clothing budget represents average annual expenditures required to purchase sufficient clothing to maintain an adequate stock. The annual replacement rates are shown for specified age-sex groups and by employment status. Costs of dry cleaning and shoe repairs are included in the clothing budget.

Housing

Housing costs are based on the results of a telephone survey of 200 different apartment advertisements appearing in daily newspapers and involving a minimum of 429 unfurnished units. This information is presented as a general guide only since costs for unfurnished flats and houses were only approximately determined.

The following table gives a range of housing costs for Toronto:

Bachelor	95	- 115
One bedroom	118	- 135
Two bedroom	145	- 158

were supplied by utility companies. As there are no accurate means available to develop quantity standards, by family size, the quantities shown for electricity consumption by family size are estimated or adjusted to local average consumption.

Miscellaneous Family Needs

These needs include home furnishings, household operation, medical care, personal care, transportation, communication, reading, school and leisure time needs, insurance, gifts, contributions and relative personal needs.

None of the categories can be considered necessary for physical survival (except medical care). Those that were considered as conventional necessities were identified as such by the committee using as guides, studies of family expenditures and other budget standards.

Commonplace wants were identified, where possible, by application of a statistical norm: if 90 per cent or more of the reference population possessed or purchased a given good or service, it was assumed that it was of major importance to a sense of social acceptability and self respect and was included (television set). One exception to this rule was made: an article possessed by less than 90 per cent of the reference population was included if, in terms of practicality and economy, in the judgment of the group it was necessary: e.g. a washing machine for families of four and more.

The standard for house furnishings and equipment was developed through three sources: studies of family expenditures and possessions, examination of other budget standards, and the inclusion of what seemed to be reasonable requirements for families meeting the minimum standard. The budget for home furnishings and equipment assumes gradual replacement of these items over the years, or depreciation over the expected period of use. Thus the average costs shown really represent savings required to maintain basic inventories of furnishings and equipment. The replacement rates shown reflect the expected life durability of the article. Thus if a chair expected to last 10 years is shown, one-tenth of the cost is included in the annual budget.

Personal

This item represents articles and devices ordinarily needed by individuals, according to age, sex and employment status. The standard for personal care was developed through the use of existing budget standards and consumption studies and guides.

Transportation

The transportation budget for travel within Metropolitan Toronto is based on current fares of the T.T.C. For outside Toronto, the budget has made provision for an annual total of 200 miles (round trip) outside Metropolitan Toronto.

Communication, Reading and School Needs

The budget covers the costs of a telephone and nominal amounts of writing paper, greeting cards, postage and related supplies. The budget for reading includes the cost of an annual subscription to a local newspaper and a Canadian magazine.

Special School Needs

Expenses incidental to schooling vary from school to school and costs were estimated according to the situation in various areas.

Household expenditures

Amounts required for all items of household operation were developed through analysis of other budget standards, in addition studies of family consumption and expenditures were consulted.

Health and Medical Care

Ontario hospital insurance has been adopted as the standard on which to compute individual hospital care costs.

To compute medical care costs Ontario's Medical Services Insurance Plan premiums have been taken as a basis.

Dental costs were computed with the assistance of specialists in the field. Premiums of Blue Cross prepaid dental care plan were used to determine average yearly dental costs. Costs represent an average yearly cost in the long run.

Costs of other medical care needs including prescription drugs were estimated by adding a proportion to medical, dental and hospitalization costs. This proportion is derived from percentage of expenditures on personal health care in Canada for 1961(6) for the same services.

Gifts, Contributions, Leisure Time and Related Personal Needs

Extreme variability in individual practices marks this area and costs shown are intended only as general guides in family budgeting. These costs were developed by assuming expenditures for certain items although the actual use to which these amounts will be put will vary with individual customs.

BUDGET PREPARED BY THE MONTREAL COUNCIL OF SOCIAL AGENCIES(7)

The agency prepared in 1963 a minimum and a moderate cost family budget. The minimum cost budget relates to elderly persons living alone, retired couples and families of 3 to 6 persons. The moderate living cost budget deals with newly married couples and families of 3-6 persons with a monthly income from $300 to $600.

Only the minimum cost family budget is being updated, and hence is discussed here. This budget includes the commodities and services required to meet basic needs for the maintenance of a minimum standard. It does not provide for new furniture or furnishings, savings, medical and dental care or drugs, gifts, recreation and telephone.

Methods

A budget committee was formed which began its work with an examination of various budgets being used by local welfare agencies. Contents and scales of these were studied in relation to the philosophy and objectives of welfare programs. Based on the results of this study the committee then developed a desirable minimum budget for families and individuals who are in need of financial aid in the Montreal area.

Eight components were selected by the Committee and priced by volunteers and students under the supervision of various committee members. They are as follows:

Food

Kinds and amounts of foods as required for each individual according to age and sex were selected by experts to meet nutritional requirements recommended by the Canadian Council on Nutrition in the Canadian Dieting Standard of 1948. These items were priced and are being repriced in a number of food markets and at least one independent store. Pricing takes place in January, May and September. Its purpose is not only to keep up-to-date with market conditions but also to keep track of new products. A copy of pricing instructions is shown in Appendix 1.

Clothing

The allowances were based on a survey of homemakers who were asked about the kinds and amounts of clothing which are required for individuals according to age and sex to meet minimum clothing needs for health and self respect. The results were then modified and corrected. In doing so the agency took advantage of relevant information published in Annual Price Survey of Family Budget Costs by the Budget Standard Service of the Community Council of greater New York ⁽⁸⁾

Housing

The standard of housing adopted by the Agency is relatively low. Allowances for rents are based on the survey results of low cost housing in Montreal in 1963. Only cold water unheated flats were selected for this survey, as the rent of this type of accommodation even after adjustment for cost of fuel is considered as much cheaper than heated apartments.

In addition to the survey conducted in 1963, the agency is also informed on current rents by the provincial housing authority which provides rent data on both controlled and market rents.

Rents for single persons were derived from a survey on allowances paid by the various welfare agencies in the area.

Personal care

In determining a standard for minimum adequate personal care the Family Budget Standard of New York was adopted as a guide. The kinds and amounts of goods and services selected for the individual schedules represent the minimum necessary for the care of teeth and hair and personal cleanliness.

Household supplies

The Committee selected the kinds and amounts of goods which in their opinion would provide minimum supplies for cleanliness and effective operation of a household.

Utilities

Quebec Hydro and one of the fuel companies acted as consultants in providing consumption data for cooking and heating. Schedules for electrical power consumption are calculated according to family size and fuel consumption according to number of rooms to be heated.

COMPARISON OF THE TORONTO AND MONTREAL FAMILY BUDGETS

The two budgets as seen in the table below are not quite comparable. The Toronto budget, being more liberal in concept includes allowances for a number of items, not provided for in the subsistence level Montreal budget. Thus, medical, dental and nursing care as well as life insurance and union fees are excluded from the Montreal budget. It should be noted however that the Quebec Hospital Plan provides in- and out-patient services for all persons and together with other provincial and municipal health programs provide some of the services needed.

An item by item comparison of these budgets as reflected in the table below, indicates that Toronto's food allowances are slightly higher than those of Montreal for adults and much larger for growing children. Allowances for clothing are also larger in Toronto. While allowances for shelter are not yet finalized, indications are that shelter allowances in Toronto will be higher because of the higher housing standard adopted and the method used in determining rents. Montreal shelter allowances are based on two bedroom unheated flats. This choice reflects the thinking that the heating of a dwelling unit with a space heater is considered more economical than central heating adopted in Toronto. Toronto makes allowance for the usage of a telephone while in Montreal no such allowances are made, not even for the aged. Replacement costs in the Toronto budget include annual replacement rates required to maintain adequate inventories of house furnishings and equipment to operate the household. No allowances for replacement of furnishings are made in the Montreal budget. Allowances for personal care are also much lower in Montreal.

(3) Within Metropolitan Toronto only

A comparison of budgeting for retired couples indicates differences of the same nature as for families. There is one exception however, the food allowance for retired couples in Montreal is higher.

After deducting federal and provincial contributions and allowances the net income needed to cover the budget for an old aged couple amounts to $43 in Montreal. No such calculation was prepared in Toronto.

On the whole, budgeting methods used in both cities were rather similar. There was one exception however, the determination of rents. Toronto conducted a rent survey limited to vacant dwellings, while Montreal relied on statements of the City's Housing Authority. In normal circumstances housing authorities have more reliable data on rents since they have information on rents of both occupied and vacant units. Also they themselves must conduct rent surveys in order to price their own rental units. A rent survey on vacant units as conducted by Toronto on the other hand may result in overstatement of rents especially in a rapidly increasing rental market.

Other differences in budgeting may be the result of basing the calculation of the cost of various budget components on different U.S. budget studies. Ideally such calculation should be based on data derived from Canadian surveys which should show regional and intercity variations. However because of the lack of reliable data for low income families on city basis this is at present impossible. Unless adequate data are produced by DBS, agencies will have to continue to base their calculations on data derived from U.S.A. surveys.

COMPARISON OF BUDGET METHODS USED IN CANADIAN CITIES AND BY THE BUREAU OF LABOUR STATISTICS OF THE USA

In 1966, the Bureau of Labour Statistics constructed family budgets to translate a generalized concept of a moderate living standard into a list of commodities and services which were then priced. Two kinds of data were used, (a) nutritional and health standards based on laboratory experiments or derived from scientific observation, (b) data based on spending practices of representative samples of urban families of the same type as that for which the budget was to be prepared. These latter data were derived from the Bureau's survey of Consumer's Expenditure and related consumption studies.

The two kinds of data represent two different concepts. Scientific data are based on the studies of the relation between consumption and health and are expressed in form of normative statements. Spending practices on the other hand as shown in expenditure surveys represent the choices made by consumers. In the BLS method of budgeting, the two concepts are blended to the extent that scientific standards are used where available and applicable, supplemented by the analysis of statistical data on family spending.

The two concepts were combined in the following way. For food, the National Research Council had developed scientific standards which were translated in food plans at different cost levels. Regional consumption patterns for specific foods were used in estimating costs. The data were taken from the 1965 Food Consumption Survey of the Department of Agriculture. For shelter, rents were derived from a rental survey of standard dwellings. The standards were those established by the American Public Health Association and the U.S. Public Housing Administration. For transportation and medical care as well as for the remainder of the consumption total, the prevailing practices based on analytical studies of the Bureau's Survey of Consumer Expenditures were used in developing allowances.

In the light of the BLS approach the Canadian method of determining budget quantities and qualities can be easily criticized as being normative and not based on the collective judgement of the consumer families. However, it should be kept in mind that the BLS budgets are for middle income people whose spending habits can be easily adopted in moderate budgets. The Montreal and Toronto budgets on the other hand are designed for low income people whose spending habits will not conform in certain aspects to prevailing customs.

The question arises, then, to what extent should budgets be determined by scientific or normative judgements and to what extent by current consumer patterns. It appears that the closer budgets are to a mere subsistence level the more scientific judgement should be used for developing a "standard to maintain health and self respect". This applies mainly to those budget components which represent basic necessities. For components representing commonplace wants, results of family expenditure surveys and other budget studies may be used. Unfortunately adequate Canadian data are scarce and both the Toronto and Montreal budgets have had to resort to American studies rather than to current Canadian data derived from national or regional surveys.

CONCLUSION

The foregoing examination of family budgets in Toronto and Montreal and the contrast of these budgets with each other and with family budgets developed by the Bureau of Labour Statistics represents a preliminary examination of family budgets which may be suitable for determining a minimum living standard for low income families in Canada. The two low income budgets developed for Toronto and Montreal are the most comprehensive that we have in Canada, and were designed to provide a living standard adequate to preserve health and decency. These two budgets have their limitations because they are essentially normative budgets and do not take into consideration the spending patterns of low income families. While the Bureau of Labour Statistics combines the normative and empirical approaches to budgeting, they do so for persons with moderate living standards. In our study on minimum living standards, we are concerned with persons with low incomes. In Canada there are no adequate data on the consumer spending patterns for low income families. The DBS consumer expenditure and food expenditure surveys essentially concentrate on middle income families. Even when DBS takes low incomes into account, it is felt that the low income families and individuals are not adequately represented in the Labour Force sample used by DBS for these surveys.

MONTHLY BUDGETS FOR ITEMS OF BASIC NEED UNDER PROVINCIAL SOCIAL ASSISTANCE PROGRAMS*

Federal-Provincial Responsibility

With the exception of certain special groups, (1) the responsibility for the administration of aid to needy persons comes within the jurisdiction of the provinces.

The federal government shares with the provinces the cost of assistance to persons in need under the Canada Assistance Plan administered by the Department of National Health and Welfare (2). The Canada Assistance Plan requires that need be determined on the basis of a test established by the provincial authority that takes into account the applicant's budgetary requirements and the income and resources available to him to meet such requirements. The provinces determine who the persons in need are and the level of assistance required to relieve need.

Provincial Assistance Programs

All provinces now use the budget deficit method of determining need. Needs of the applicant and his dependants are calculated according to a prescribed schedule or budget in which specified amounts are allocated for the various items of need. These include items of basic need, that is, those items required by all persons - food, clothing, personal care, shelter, fuel and utilities - and items of special need, that is, those items which are required only by some recipients because of their particular or individual needs. The difference between the amount which the individual or family needs determined according to the provincial schedule, and the amount of the family's income available to meet these needs is the budget deficit or amount of the allowance.

Municipalities administering assistance are required to use the budget standards and the schedule of allowable income set by the province in calculating the amount of an allowance, except in two provinces, Alberta and Manitoba, where municipalities set their own rates. Amounts granted are subject to any ceilings established (see below).

Determination of Allowances

A number of factors affect the amount of the allowance granted to cover items of basic need. These include: the family size; the age of the children and in one province, sex; income available; and the policy in regard to an overall ceiling on the total allowance payable.

* Prepared by Miss R. Brown, Research and Statistics Directorate

- (1) The federal government is responsible for social allowances to veterans, Indians and Eskimos. The federal government also administers the Guaranteed Income Supplement program under which allowances are paid to certain recipients of the old age security pension whose eligibility is determined by an income test.
- (2) Assistance to needy persons is also shared under the Blind Persons Allowances Act and the Disabled Persons Allowances Act. These are means test programs under which the maximum shareable allowance is $75 a month. The old age assistance program disappeared in January 1970 when the qualifying age for old age security pensions was reduced to 65 years.

Size of Family. Allowances for families vary by family size, since the budget deficit method of determining need takes the number of dependants of the applicant into account.

Allowances for food, clothing and personal care are usually specified for each adult and child in the schedules for the various budget items. The allowance for the family for these items is the sum of the individual allowances, but some adjustment may be made for family size. For example, a number of provinces increase the food allowance for the smaller assistance units by a specified percentage or amount for a single person and for a two- or three-person family unit, and reduce the total by a specified percentage or amount for larger families, usually those of five or more persons. Adjustments for family size are incorporated in pre-added budgets, which combine the individual rates for food, clothing and personal care for families of varying size and composition as in Ontario. In a number of provinces the basic allowances for rent, utilities or fuel are increased for families whose members exceed a specified number.

Ages of Children. The age of children is a factor in the food and clothing rates in most budget schedules. Except in Alberta where rates are specified by single year of age, in British Columbia where no differentiation is made between adults and children, and in Newfoundland where a single rate applies to children under eighteen, rates are specified by age group.

Sex. Alberta is the only province in which there is a variation in allowances by sex. Rates for food and clothing vary by sex for both adults and children.

Income. The amount of income considered available to meet the needs of the applicant will reduce the amount of the allowance otherwise payable. Although the definition of "income" (other than assistance) varies by program, in all provinces there are specified exemptions which include such items as casual earnings up to a specified amount, (1) a proportion of income from roomers and boarders, earnings of school children, and family and youth allowances. These exemptions constitute allowable income, which does not affect the amount of the allowance given.

Ceiling on Allowances. Allowances are limited by the dollar amounts allocated to certain items of basic need in the predetermined schedule of rates. Allowances may be further limited by the setting of a family maximum which may be less than the sum of the individual budget items for each member of the family, or by setting the allowance at a fixed percentage of the budget deficit, or by limiting allowances to an amount considered to be a reasonable standard in the community.

Allowances for Items of Basic Need

The following tables for nine provinces (2) cover monthly budget standards set for food and clothing for adults and children, and monthly allowances based on these cost standards covering items of basic need for selected types of families with no other income as defined above.

- (1) In a number of provinces, the amount permitted for casual earnings varies between $20 and $30 a month, and in some this amount is increased if there are dependants.
 - (2) Major changes are in process in the social assistance program in Quebec and therefore rates for that province are not included.

The rates shown represent amounts allocated to the various items of basic need and the total for such items. However, most of these totals do not include the cost of fuel, some do not include utilities, and none include the extra allowances that may be granted for items of basic need such as special diets or an extra fuel or rent allowance given under special circumstances. Maximum monthly allowances for items of basic need may therefore exceed the amounts shown.

Also, it must be emphasized that in addition to the amounts indicated items of special need such as an allowance for special clothing, school expenses, essential household equipment, etc. are available in most provinces. It should be noted also that all provincial schedules exclude the costs of health care. Recipients are covered under the hospital insurance programs and medical care programs, and various arrangements are made for other health needs.

Food and clothing are the items most readily comparable among provinces. Children's rates vary in most provinces by age of child, and in Alberta, also by sex. In one province (Ontario) food and clothing rates are combined with other basic items (household and personal needs and in the provincial schedule, utilities) in a pre-added budget, in one (British Columbia) the clothing allowance is combined with fuel and personal items, and in another (Newfoundland) clothing is combined with personal care items.

Personal care items, where these are specified, usually vary for children by age group. The allowances granted for food, clothing and personal care also have some limitations in any comparison: in some provinces they incorporate an allowance for household supplies or for other items; in Alberta, allowances for items other than food and clothing are paid in accordance with community standards; and in New Brunswick the amount paid may not exceed an amount considered to be a reasonable standard in the community.

Comparisons among provinces for fuel and utilities and shelter are difficult because of the variables involved, including differences in methods of allocating dollar amounts to these items and regional variations in costs.

A fuel allowance may cover only certain months of the year and be paid only during those months or payment may be spread over the year. In some provinces it may be paid on the basis of actual cost, or on the basis of cost up to a specified maximum. A schedule of fuel rates may vary by number of rooms in the house, by the number of persons in the family, or by location (rural, town or urban area), and may also vary by type of fuel (wood, coal, gas, electricity). If fuel is included in the rent, a higher rental allowance may be allowed.

Utilities may be included in the rent allowance, a separate allowance may be specified, or the actual cost (with or without a specified maximum) may be paid. In some provinces, the allowance for utilities varies by size of the family unit and may also vary by location (rural, town or urban area). In British Columbia utilities are included in the allowance which also covers clothing and in Newfoundland utilities are combined with an allowance for household maintenance.

Shelter includes a rental allowance or an allowance to cover the cost of mortgage payments and taxes. Rental allowances vary in some provinces between urban and rural areas, and in others, by size of family unit, or rent may be paid on the basis of the actual cost to the recipient with or without a specified maximum. The amount allowed for mortgage payments and taxes is usually limited to that authorized for rent.

Assistance Levels

Provincial allowances for a single adult living alone for basic necessities are in the $75 to $117 range. These amounts compare with $75 a month under the federal-provincial programs of DPA, BPA, and $109.20 to recipients of the Guaranteed Income Supplement. For a married couple the range is $125 to $181 (Table 1).

The amount allocated for children under provincial programs, represented by the difference between the allowance for adults without children and that for families with children, indicates an approximate range of $20 to $35 a month for children in the two-parent families. The upper range for children in the one-parent families, particularly for the first child, is higher than that in the two-parent families and reflects a higher increment for a second person in the family, although in most provinces the total allowance for a parent and one child is less than the allowance for two adults.

The following table indicates the range in provincial allowances for children by type of family.

Type of Family	Range of Monthly Assistance for Child(ren) (approximate)	Range of Average Monthly Assistance per Child (approximate)

Family and Youth Allowances

Family and youth allowances are specifically excluded from the calculation of income in most provinces. Family allowances are payable by the federal government at the rate of $6 a month for children under 10 years of age and at $8 a month for children 10 years and over but under 16. Youth allowances, payable by the federal government (in Quebec by the provincial government) are $10 a month for each child of 16 or 17 years attending school or who is prevented from doing so by mental or physical disability. In Quebec, supplements to the federal family allowances program are also paid.

Comparison with Wage Rates

Minimum wage rates are designed to protect the unorganized and unskilled workers. They are intended to establish the minimum that a worker can legitimately be paid with the implied assumption that this amount is sufficient at least to cover basic needs. The minimum wage is not necessarily the prevailing wage in a particular area or jurisdiction but constitutes a floor above which trade unions or individuals may bargain for a higher standard.

In point of fact, many low-income workers, particularly women, are employed in industries such as the retail trade and the service industries where wages are at, or close to, the minimum wage level and where there are the fewest fringe benefits. In September, 1968, the average weekly wage was $76.59 in retail trade, $70.65 in recreational services and $58.67 in personal services.(1)

Almost all employment is now covered by federal or provincial legislation governing minimum wages. General minimum rates vary by province and in some provinces vary by zone or sex. These rates range from 85 cents an hour to $1.35 an hour.

The following table gives weekly and monthly earnings at varying hourly rates of pay.

Earnings of an Employed Person
At Varying Hourly Rates of Pay

Rate Per Hour	Earnings Per Week (5 days - 8 hour day)	Earnings Per Month (4 1/3 weeks)
$ 1.00	$ 40	$ 173.33
1.25	50	216.66
1.50	60	260.00
2.50	100	433.33

It can be seen from the above that an hourly wage of $1.50, equivalent to $260 a month, is required to approximate in most provinces the social allowance budget covering items of basic need for a family consisting of two parents and three children (See Table 1).

The wage earner's income, however, is not adjusted to family size and must cover not only items of basic need but other needs such as insurance, recreation, unemployment insurance, Canada Pension Plan contributions, work-related costs such as transportation and work clothes, and for families headed by women, the cost of child care services. Unless provided for in the wage contract, workers are also expected to assume full or partial responsibility for health needs. In many areas, low-cost housing for low-income workers is in short supply or not available.

Before any valid comparisons can be made of the relative positions of welfare recipients and low-income workers in any area, some estimate has to be made of the value of the free services granted the former and the imputed value of any subsidized services available to the latter.

In any case, it is clear that the minimum wage provides less for most families than is considered adequate by provincial budget standards for welfare recipients. It must be borne in mind, however, that the budget standards set by the provinces for welfare recipients often do not correspond to the actual amounts paid, which may be subject to a specified ceiling or limited to amounts considered reasonable in the community.

1/ Amount for the pre-added budget covers food, clothing, utilities, household supplies, and personal requirements. An increase may be authorized for special diets.

2/ A fuel allowance may be authorized for unheated accommodation for the period October to April, or if the recipient resides in a territorial district, September to May, in a monthly amount up to a maximum of $32 based on the local cost of coal calculated according to the number of rooms and number of pounds of coal per month required. This allowance may be increased by 20 per cent if necessary.

3/ Heated premises. Rates for unheated premises are $10 less for married persons with or without children.

4/ The maximum allowance payable is $300 up to four beneficiaries, and is increased by a further $10 monthly for each beneficiary in excess of four. Supplementary aid of up to $20 a month may be paid by the municipality under the General Welfare Assistance Act to recipients who require assistance to meet shelter or extraordinary needs.

^{1/} There is no differential in rates between adults and children. Separate standards for purposes of supplementary aid apply to recipients of Old Age Security, Blind Persons Allowances and Disabled Persons Allowances.

^{2/} Allowance covers clothing, fuel, operating and sundries.

^{3/} Basic rate. An additional amount up to 50 per cent of the basic rate may be granted under special circumstances, or if necessary, the actual rent paid may be allowed.

^{4/} The amount shown for families includes the supplementary children's grant of $8 a month for each dependent child in the family unit. In addition, the following allowances may be made for children: a supplementary community recreation program grant of $15 a year for children over 6 years of age; and a supplementary school supplies grant of $15 a year for each school child. Also, the allowances specified in the provincial schedule may be exceeded in special circumstances.

PROVINCIAL PROGRAMS FOR HOSPITAL AND INSTITUTIONAL CARE*

Mental hospitals now are operated mainly by provincial governments; the provinces pay the cost of indigent care although an element of local contribution remains in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Some provinces provide free care to all residents, but the majority charge patients to the extent that their families or relatives can afford to pay. The small proportion of revenue derived from paying patients -- less than 4 per cent for Canada in 1967 -- may indicate a generous means test but also suggests the possibility that a large number of persons of low income status may be housed in these institutions.

Tuberculosis sanatoria, too, are operated mainly by the provinces, most of which have introduced free care to remove any possibility that financial deterrents might interfere with effective control programs. Municipal financial responsibility for a share of the cost has been retained only in Saskatchewan and British Columbia.

The development of other types of long-term care facilities for the chronically ill and physically infirm has been mainly under voluntary and proprietary auspices, although some facilities are maintained by local authorities and provincial governments. Types of facilities include geriatric chronic and convalescent hospitals, nursing homes and infirmary sections of homes for the aged. All provinces in varying degrees make capital grants toward the construction of homes for the aged. Prepaid public-ward hospital care in approved chronic hospitals and some high standard nursing homes forms a part of the hospital insurance program in all provinces. Nursing home care as a benefit with co-insurance charges is available for qualified residents in Alberta without a test of financial need, outside the provisions of the hospital insurance program. In all provinces maintenance payments are made on behalf of needy persons in nursing homes and homes for the aged as part of provincial social assistance programs; municipalities contribute a share in most provinces.

In the realm of active treatment hospital care, comprehensive hospital insurance with universal coverage was preceded in some provinces by free hospital care for certain diseases and free care for public assistance recipients, as well as by prepayment for part of the general population in Alberta and Newfoundland. Comprehensive prepayment schemes for the whole population were introduced by Saskatchewan in 1947, British Columbia in 1949, Manitoba, Alberta and Newfoundland in 1958, Ontario, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island in 1959, the Northwest Territories and Yukon Territory in 1960, and Quebec in 1961.

In seven provinces and two territories where programs are financed through the general tax system as well as in Manitoba where premiums are payable, coverage is automatic and universal for all residents. In Saskatchewan and Ontario, eligibility for benefits is dependent upon payment of a premium in addition to residence qualifications. Compulsory premiums in Manitoba and Saskatchewan finance about one-quarter of hospitalization costs. In Ontario, the premium payment, which is compulsory for residents employed by firms with 15 or more employees and voluntary for others, is expected to finance about one-third of the cost of the plan.

* Prepared by W. Arrowsmith, Research and Statistics Directorate.

In Saskatchewan, persons in need may be nominated under the Saskatchewan Assistance Plan and receive immediate free hospital insurance coverage. In Ontario beneficiaries under provincial public assistance programs receive free hospital insurance coverage. Municipalities may pay premiums on behalf of resident indigents. Resident indigents for whom the premium has not been paid, together with normally self-supporting persons who have not paid the premium and are deemed unable to pay for specific hospital care, are termed "hospital indigents". This group received episodic care free of charge subject to a means test and is considered to be insured under the plan; however, entitlement to services is established in each case after the need for care arises. Substantial numbers of local relief recipients are covered in this way.

Benefits in all provinces include basic public ward care in general and allied special hospitals, inclusive of psychiatric units in general hospitals and approved chronic hospital facilities. Co-insurance charges are levied in Saskatchewan, Alberta, British Columbia and the Northwest Territories, but are paid by the province on behalf of public assistance recipients. The range of outpatient benefits has been increased in most provinces in recent years, and fairly comprehensive coverage is now provided by the majority of provinces. It may be added that in addition to insured services, many hospital outpatient departments and clinics, particularly teaching hospitals have provided medical care at no charge or at a reduced charge on a means test basis; such medical care is now a benefit under provincial medical care plans functioning in seven provinces.

HEALTH CARE PROGRAMS FOR PUBLIC ASSISTANCE RECIPIENTS*

Provincial programs providing certain medical care and other health care benefits to recipients of welfare allowances were in operation in each province prior to the introduction of province-wide medical care insurance. Organized provincial schemes providing stipulated health services were introduced in Ontario in 1942; Saskatchewan in 1945; Alberta in 1947; British Columbia in 1949; Nova Scotia in 1950; Manitoba in 1960; Quebec in 1966; Prince Edward Island in 1966; and New Brunswick in 1967. Newfoundland has for many years operated a plan that provided care as required for persons in need. The total number of persons eligible for benefits under such programs are estimated to have reached 1,150,000 in the fiscal year 1967-68.

Hospital care insurance programs in every province provide automatic coverage to welfare allowance recipients without payment of premiums or co-charges by them.

Physicians' Services

Following the implementation of public medical care insurance plans in the provinces of Saskatchewan, Alberta, British Columbia, Ontario, Manitoba, Nova Scotia, and Newfoundland provincial welfare recipients became automatically enrolled and without premium payment, where applicable. Additionally, old age security recipients may be enrolled without premium payment in Ontario on the basis of a special means test, and in Saskatchewan on the basis of a needs test; in Alberta any person unable to pay may be enrolled without premium payment. Under such programs, benefits and payment rates to physicians in respect to recipients of welfare are identical to those applicable to the general population. Co-charges and extra-billing are usually waived.

Programs expressly covering welfare recipients and providing a virtually comprehensive range of physicians' services continue to operate in Quebec, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, with costs shareable under the Canada Assistance Plan.

Provision of other health care benefits on a cost shared basis continues to follow a variety of patterns established under provincial or municipal programs.

Prescribed Drug Benefits

In British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, New Brunswick, and Newfoundland virtually all provincial public assistance recipients are enrolled under schemes providing prescribed drug benefits. In Manitoba a drug program covers persons designated as aged and infirm, recipients of mothers' allowances and their dependants, government wards and indigent persons in unorganized territory. A variety of systems of drug benefit and non-benefit lists are employed and payment rates to pharmacies or dispensing physicians are negotiated by provincial governments. Under several schemes co-charges are levied on patients.

Drugs provided at local initiative in Ontario, Nova Scotia and Quebec are shareable under provincial legislation as well as under the Canada Assistance Plan.

Dental Care Benefits

Dental benefit plans are operated for selected recipients of welfare in the four western provinces and in Ontario. In British Columbia, special means tests are applied to public assistance recipients in order to qualify them for enrolment. A separate program is operated in that province for the children under 13 years of age of all welfare recipients. The Ontario program provides dental benefits to persons in receipt of mothers' allowances and dependent fathers' allowances. This includes parents and their children under the age of 18. All provincial public assistance recipients qualify for dental benefits in schemes operated in Alberta and Saskatchewan.

Benefits under these dental plans typically exclude specified services and require prior authorization for some services. In the three westernmost provinces, posterior bridgework, prophylaxis and paedodontics are excluded. Prior authorization is required in British Columbia and Saskatchewan for dentures, relines, gold inlays, orthodontia and periodontia. Payments to dentists are at negotiated fixed rates under each of these plans. The patient is required to pay a co-charge of approximately 50 per cent of the cost of dentures in Alberta and Saskatchewan.

All dental care expenditures by municipalities in Ontario in respect to welfare recipients are shared by the province and through the Canada Assistance Plan.

A limited range of in-hospital dental surgery performed by physicians and dentists is a benefit under provincial medical care insurance plans.

Optical Care Benefits

Health benefit schemes for welfare recipients included certain optical care services and eyeglasses in the four westernmost provinces.

With the implementation of public medical care insurance schemes in those provinces, Ontario, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland refractions performed by physicians became general benefits under these schemes, and refractions by optometrists were also included except in Nova Scotia and Newfoundland. Thus previously existing special authorization requirements for refractions in respect to welfare recipients were removed.

Frames, lenses and fittings continue to be benefits of the provincial health benefit schemes in the western provinces. Certain restrictions typically govern the amount which will be paid for frames, e.g. for cosmetic purposes.

Other Health Care Benefits

Other health benefits which are provided under programs in some provinces include home nursing, appliances, physiotherapy, podiatry, chiropractic, and emergency transportation usually at the discretion of the provincial authority. All such payments are shareable under the Canada Assistance Plan including those initiated by municipalities. Some of these benefits are now included under provincial medical care insurance plans.

Federal Programs

Traditionally the federal government has provided a range of health benefits to needy war veterans, Indians and Eskimos.

These groups are now covered under provincial public hospital and medical insurance plans where such programs have been set up. In the remaining provinces the Federal Government continues to provide services directly and continues to provide such extended health care as is necessary where it is not among benefits of provincial health insurance programs.

PROVINCIAL MEDICAL CARE PROGRAMS*

Traditionally, and up to a couple of decades ago, most self-paying patients in Canada paid directly for personal health care services. In recent years, and for the services of physicians, especially, prepaid insurance has been replacing direct payment. At the end of 1966, the most recent year for final figures, about 12.0 million Canadians or 60 per cent of the population had some private voluntary insurance protection against the cost of physicians' services. When plans of all types, private and public, are considered together, the total with some form of protection was about 16.4 million persons or 82 per cent of the population.

Under the provisions of the Federal Medical Care Act, 1966, seven provincial governments have introduced programs intended to ensure that all residents can have physicians' services insurance. Coverage of all residents is automatic or compulsory in Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta; in Ontario enrolment is partially compulsory and partly voluntary; in British Columbia enrolment is voluntary.

Most of these plans, in addition to the comprehensive range of physicians' services and specified oral surgery in hospital that can be cost-shared under the Medical Care Act, also make provision for other health-care benefits to be included as part of the basic contract. Typically, refraction services by optometrists are now included (i.e., in all provincial plans except Nova Scotia and Newfoundland). Additionally, a restricted volume of services by chiropractors, podiatrists, osteopaths and naturopaths may be insured.

Residents may if they wish continue to seek insurance protection for additional services -- i.e., dental care, prescribed drugs -- from private voluntary agencies both commercial and non-profit.

Five of the seven plans employ premiums to help finance their portions of total costs. Two plans, in Newfoundland and Nova Scotia, finance the provincial portion of costs from general revenues only. In these provinces there is, of course, virtually no direct cost to low-income families apart from extra-billing that doctors may in some instances impose. The premium levy is kept low in Saskatchewan and in Manitoba (effective November 1) to minimize the financial burden to low-income families, although in Saskatchewan this effect may be offset somewhat for certain physician-visit services by provision for "utilization fees", i.e., direct payments to the doctor by the patient of $1.50 to $2.00 for certain services as they are rendered. The problem of minimizing the financial burden is approached differently in Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia: premium-levies are substantial in these provincial programs, but premium subsidies are available to reduce the cost of premiums to families and individuals with little or no taxable income in the preceding year (see below for details).

Modes of paying doctors can also have an effect upon how much of the total cost of physicians' charges continues to be borne directly by patients. In three provinces, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Newfoundland, an undertaking by the doctor to submit his bill directly to the insuring authority for payment carries with it a requirement, usually, that the amount paid (i.e., typically, 85 or 90 per cent of the approved fee for the claim) represents payment in full for the service. In the other four provinces the direct-billing-to-public-authority mode of seeking payment does not preclude extra billing provided the doctor indicates his intention to the patient beforehand. In Nova Scotia and British Columbia the physician is also required to obtain prior written agreement from the patient, and to notify the public authority of the extra charge.

In all participating provinces a doctor electing, alternatively, to submit his bill to the patient, rather than to the public authority, for payment may legally charge the patient any amount. The patient will be reimbursed by the insuring authority only on the basis of what the authority defines as the approved fee. It must be remembered, however, that under these arrangements doctors typically waive the right to collect extra amounts from low-income patients.

Each of the seven plans is described briefly in the paragraphs that follow:

Saskatchewan -- This program which was introduced in July, 1962, requires enrolment of the entire eligible population. The premiums are compulsory and are for a family, $24 per year and for a single person, $12. These premiums cover only a small portion of the costs of the program. Welfare recipients are automatically covered and no premium payment is required.

Among the medical services insured are home, office and hospital visits, surgery, obstetrics, psychiatric care outside mental hospitals, anaesthesia, laboratory and radiological services, preventive medicine, and certain services provided by dentists. There are no waiting periods for benefits and no exclusions for reasons of age or pre-existing health conditions. Refractions by optometrists are also an insured benefit but the costs are not shared under the Medical Care Act.

The Medical Care Insurance Commission pays for approved services on the basis of 85 per cent of the listed fee, except for certain classes of services where a utilization fee applies. These fees are $1.50 for each office visit and $2.00 for each home and out-patient call and are payable by the patient to the attending physician. In these instances the financial responsibility of the public authority is reduced by the amount of the applicable fee. To avoid financial hardship to patients in exceptional cases there is provision for a family maximum on the total amount of such fees that must be paid. Welfare recipients are not required to pay utilization fees: instead, the medical profession by agreement accepts 85 per cent as payment in full for all services rendered to welfare patients. The co-charges are thus paid by the public authority.

Physicians may elect to receive payment in three ways. First, the physician may receive payment directly from the public authority of 85 per cent of the tariff in the current fee schedule of the medical association less the utilization fee, and accept this payment, along with the utilization fee to the patient, as payment in full. Secondly, patients and physicians may enrol voluntarily with an "approved health agency" that serves as intermediary, with respect to payment, between the public authority and the physicians; here also the physician receives 85 per cent of the tariff less the utilization fee. Thirdly, a physician may elect to submit his bill directly to the patient who pays him either before or after seeking reimbursement from the public authority; the physician may bill the patient directly for amounts over and above what the public authority has paid. No physician is compelled to confine himself to one or the other of these modes of payment.

Alberta -- Alberta became a participating province on July 1, 1969, under the federal Medical Care Act with administration by a Health Care Insurance Commission. Registration, as in Saskatchewan, is compulsory for all eligible residents (except that failure to pay premiums is not a barrier to receipt of insured services) and the levels of benefits are similar to those in Saskatchewan for the services of doctors and oral surgeons. Additionally, the plan provides limited coverage for such paramedical services as refractions by optometrists, podiatry, chiropractic and osteopathy. Doctors are paid at 100 per cent of the 1968 fee schedule of the medical association. Physicians can elect several modes of submitting claims for payment. In all instances, though, the Alberta doctors retain the right to extra-bill patients if they wish, subject to prior agreement by the patient.

Premium structures are $5.00 per month for single persons, and $10.00 per month for families. No premium payment is required from welfare recipients. Premium subsidies for low-income earners reduce premiums to the following levels: $2.50 per month for single persons if taxable income in the previous year did not exceed $500, and $5.00 per month for families if the combined taxable income in the previous year did not exceed $500. Additionally, there is a temporary provision that the provinces will pay up to full premiums for those residents who can prove financial need.

British Columbia -- The province became a participant under the federal Medical Care Act on July 1, 1968. The plan is governed by a public commission with jurisdiction over a number of "licensed carriers", that is non-profit agencies charged with responsibility for day-to-day management of the separate components of the program. In addition to physicians' services and a limited range of oral surgery in hospital, the benefits include refractions by optometrists, some orthoptic services, limited physiotherapy, special nursing, chiropractic and naturopathy.

Participation in the program is voluntary. Premiums are $5.00 per month for single persons, $10.00 per month for 2-person families, and $12.50 per month for families of 3 or more. For eligible residents, the government offers subsidies totalling 90 per cent of the premium for persons with no taxable income and 50 per cent of the premium for persons with taxable income from $1 to $1,000. Welfare recipients are automatically covered and no premium payment is required.

Payment is made at 90 per cent of the current fee schedule. Physicians either accept all payments directly from a licensed carrier or elect to bill all their patients for services rendered. In the latter case the physician has to notify the patient in writing before rendering a service that he is a non-participating physician, and the patient has to agree in writing that he is prepared to pay more than the amount of reimbursement from a licensed carrier to which he is entitled. In the former case, the physician may also charge a fee in excess of the tariff provided the patient has been duly notified, agrees in writing to the extra charge, and the amount of the extra charge is made known to the Commission.

In British Columbia, by agreement between the Plan and the medical profession, fees have been adjusted on the basis of a formula that takes into account changes in price and wage levels in the consumer and industrial sectors.

Manitoba -- Manitoba began participating under the federal Medical Care Act on April 1, 1969. Enrolment is compulsory for all eligible residents but failure to pay the required premiums is not a barrier to receipt of insured services.

The insured benefits cover all medically-required services provided by medical practitioners and limited dental surgery in hospitals. There is provision also to include, with limitations, the services of chiropractors and refractions by optometrists.

Physicians may elect to participate in the Plan, and to accept all payments for the public authority, or they may elect to receive payments direct from all their patients. In the former case the amount received (85 per cent of the fee schedule) must be accepted as payment in full. A non-participating physician must give a patient "reasonable notice" if he intends to extra-bill.

Premium levies are $4.90 per month ($0.55 per month after October 31) for single persons and $9.80 per month ($1.10 per month after October 31) for families. Coverage of welfare recipients is automatic and no premium payment is required. There are no premium subsidies because the premiums themselves are nominal.

Ontario -- Ontario began participating on October 1, 1969. Enrolment is compulsory for persons in specified employed groups and voluntary for others. The insured benefits cover all medically-required services of medical practitioners and of oral surgeons in specified hospital settings, and refractions by optometrists.

Payments are made at 90 per cent of the current fee schedule. Physicians may choose various modes of payments, but they are not required to enter into a formal commitment to confine themselves to any given mode. Regardless of the mode of payment selected, a physician is required to advise the patient of any intention to charge more than is provided under the Plan.

Premiums are $5.90 per month for single persons, $11.80 per month for 2-person families, and $14.75 for families of 3 or more. Coverage is automatic for welfare recipients and no premium payment is required. Premium subsidies for low-income families modify premium-requirements as follows:

- (1) No taxable income in the previous year -- full premium assistance;
- (2) Some taxable income --
 - $2.95 per month (i.e., 50%) for single persons if taxable income in previous year was $500 or less;
 - $5.90 per month (i.e., 50%) for 2-person families if combined taxable income in previous year was $1,000 or less;

- $5.90 per month (i.e., 40%) for families of 3 persons or more if combined taxable income in previous year was $1,300 or less.

There are two additional provisions relating to financial aid. Three month's coverage is paid for families qualifying for temporary assistance, and recipients of Old Age Security pensions are entitled to full subsidy of premiums at permissible income levels higher than the ceilings set under the general subsidy program.

As in British Columbia, the public authority in Ontario makes use of administering agencies. In Ontario these agencies can be non-profit, or commercial insurance companies handling this component of their activities on a non-profit basis. Agencies can be "designated" or "participating" depending upon their degree of involvement in enrolment and claims processing functions. Most of their enrolment is of employee and other groups. Additionally, the government itself administers the Health Services Insurance Plan, which also enrolls members and processes claims and covers the majority of non-group and subsidized beneficiaries.

Nova Scotia -- Nova Scotia became a participating province on April 1, 1969. All eligible persons are covered by virtue of residence. Registration is required but there are no premiums, the entire amount of the provincial portion of the costs of insured services being obtained from general revenues.

The insured services include all medically necessary procedures by practitioners, plus a limited range of oral surgery procedures in hospitals. Refractions by optometrists are not a benefit.

Benefit payments by the Plan are made at 85 per cent of the current fee schedule. Physicians must elect to either participate, that is accept all payments directly from the Plan, or not to participate. In either case physicians may extra-bill, but they must obtain written consent from the patient prior to rendering the service, and the amount of the extra charge has to be made known to the Commission.

The Nova Scotia plan is administered by a non-profit carrier which has been designated by the public authority as its sole agent. This agency carries out all functions relating to eligibility checking and the processing and payment of claims, all subject to review and audit by the public authority.

Newfoundland -- This province, like Nova Scotia and Manitoba, became a participant on April 1, 1969. The plan covers all medically-required services by doctors, plus a limited range of oral surgery in hospital settings. Refractions by optometrists are not a benefit.

All eligible residents are covered and there are no premium levies, the provincial portion of total costs for insured services being met from general revenues.

In this province benefit payments are limited to 90 per cent of the fee schedule. Physicians must formally select, and use exclusively, one of the modes of payment available. A participating physician must accept 90 per cent of the fee schedule as payment in full. A non-participating physician may impose additional charges provided he informs the beneficiary that he is not a participating physician and that he reserves the right to charge in excess of the amount payable by the Plan.

NATIONAL NUTRITION SURVEY*

In November, 1968, it was pointed out that there was considerable doubt that Canadians were as well fed as has been assumed. The need for definitive data on the Canadian situation was stressed. Since November, 1968, additional information on the nutritional status of groups of individuals in North America has become available. Dr. A.E. Schaefer, reporting to the Senate Select Committee on Nutrition and Related Human Needs on January 22, 1969, stated that their "studies to date indicate clearly that there is malnutrition, and in our opinion it occurs in an unexpectedly large proportion of our sample population". Seven cases were found of what was diagnosed as severe malnutrition. Thirteen per cent of the population had blood serum levels of vitamin A considered to place the subjects on a high risk category. Five per cent of the population had goitre, and 15% had anemia.

These preliminary findings have resulted in a broad ranging investigation of the incidence and treatment of malnutrition in the U.S. An expert panel of consultants to the U.S. Public Health Service has already made proposals for a continuing programme for the evaluation and treatment of the various aspects of the problem. They have suggested that a 5 year programme for this work would cost $150,000,000.

In Canada, Barsky has reported (Can. J. Pub. Health, 60, 29, 1967) that the incidence of rickets in children from 3 months to 2 years of age has increased from 1962 to 1967. A review of the incidence in Quebec and other provinces (Med. Post, Feb. 25, 1969) suggests that the situation is much more serious in Quebec where fluid milk is used in infant feeding. Over the past five years an average of 50 patients per year, with rickets, were reportedly admitted to the Montreal Children's Hospital. The province estimates that bed care expenditure for rickets amounts to $350,000 per year.

The above data serve to emphasize again the need for detailed information on the nutritional status of Canadians.

Objectives of the Survey

The objectives of the survey have been re-examined in the light of discussions by the Expert Panels as follows:

To provide basic information on the nutritional well-being of Canadians for the planning of public health programmes and the development of Food and Drug Regulations. In order to accomplish this it has been agreed that a survey be undertaken:

1. To estimate the incidence of nutritional diseases and disorders in groups of the Canadian population, characterized by such factors as geographical location, type of community, income level, and the age, sex and physiological state of the individuals. This will be accomplished by assessing clinical evidence, anthropometric measurements, biochemical determinations and dietary intakes.

* Prepared by Food and Drug Directorate.

2. To identify the types of foods and estimate the quantity normally ingested by individuals in these groups in order to determine the levels of ingestion of nutrients, food additives, non-nutritive substances and pesticide residues.

Progress with Feasibility Study

As indicated at the previous meeting of Council, Dr. Sabry had been employed as a consultant to the Food and Drug Directorate to carry out a nutrition study. He has visited all provincial Departments of Health, all interested University departments and other interested organizations. Expert groups were set up on specific subjects which would be the basis of the survey. These were:

1. Survey Design and Sampling
2. Dietary Studies
3. Clinical Examinations
4. Biochemical Measurements

An overall Coordinating Committee on Standards and Data Interpretation was set up to coordinate the activities of these groups.

Results of the deliberations of the Expert Group on Survey Design and Sampling have been circulated for comment to officers of the Department and to a group of 25 outside experts for comment.

All groups met jointly and together on March 9, 10, 11, and 12, 1969, in Ottawa. The results of their deliberations were collected and edited to form a document describing a proposed plan for the Survey. This document was then circulated to a wide group of consultants who are knowledgeable in the various phases of the study. Representatives of all provincial governments as well as all University departments interested in nutrition were included in this group.

The following points summarize present thinking regarding the survey.

1. It is proposed that the population will be sampled at the rate of 1 person per 1000 for a total sample of 21,000.
2. Plans call for sampling of individuals in provinces in proportion to provincial population. This will result in approximately equal precision of estimates from most economic regions of the country.
3. It is proposed to divide the population into groups on the basis of physiological (age and sex groups) and income characteristics (two groups - low and others).
4. It is considered desirable to estimate each of the measurements of interest (incidence of nutritional disease and food consumed) with equal precision in each of the groups. We are, therefore, recommending that an approximately equal number of observations be taken in each of the groups.

Special Senate Committee

5. Consideration will be given to the addition of communities which are considered to present particular nutritional problems. Additional funds would be required for this purpose.
6. Preliminary estimates of cost suggest a figure of $90.00 per person sampled.

Proposed Plans For Organization of Survey

Dr. Sabry has now been appointed as National Coordinator and Dr. Bray as Associate Coordinator for the Federal Department of National Health and Welfare. There will also be three facilities to be developed nationally.

1. Data Processing Centre
2. Central Laboratories
3. Training Programmes

All methods used in the laboratory, computer programmes, survey forms and short courses for training programmes will be published as a reference book for field use.

In preparation for the Survey at the provincial headquarters, an administrative organization will be worked out by agreement between the National Coordinator and the Department of Health concerned. This organization will include a Director to undertake the overall field planning and administration within the province, and an administrative assistant.

It will be necessary to reach agreement, as soon as possible, with each of the provinces on the nature and degree of participation. Such agreements will specify the responsibilities and the commitments of the Food and Drug Directorate and the Provincial Department of Health to the field operation of the Survey in the province.

It is recommended that budgets for field operations be worked out on a provincial basis. Since the survey will be of relatively short duration, it is hoped that provinces will take the opportunity of participating in the survey to the fullest extent possible. It is realized, however, that arrangements will have to be made for the normal duties of staff to be carried out.

At present, plans call for a pilot study to be initiated after April 1, 1970 and for the actual survey to commence in September, 1970.

POVERTY AND DENTAL HEALTH
GENERAL OBSERVATIONS*

The Influence of Poverty on Dental Health

Dental diseases are in a different category than most other diseases. They are not self-limiting, there is no natural repair and the prevalence rate is extremely high - practically 100% of the Canadian population is affected by the ravages of these diseases.

With only 1/3 of our people receiving reasonably adequate dental care it can be easily understood that we have a public health problem of major importance. The Hall Commission Report left no doubt as to the gravity of this situation with about 1/4 of the recommendations pertaining to dental health.

With dental diseases being practically universal amongst Canadians there is, of course, no doubt that for economic reasons a reasonably large segment of our population receive no dental care except for relief of pain.

Certain provinces have established dental welfare plans where recipients of social allowances are eligible for dental care. In some provinces this care is provided to children only and in others to all recipients of social allowances.

In Canada we have a situation where those with practically no source of income and those with a reasonably adequate or better source of income are receiving dental care, but for that rather large so-called "grey group" dental care is not, except for emergencies, within their reach. Frequently no funds remain after the bare necessities of life are provided. Of course, there are always exceptions whereby dental health has a very low priority within a family and funds are expended well beyond the 'necessities' leaving very little for health care.

In general, however, we may unequivocally say that poverty has a marked affect on dental health. The situation has a "snowballing" effect and not only does the dental situation worsen amongst this segment of our population, but the overall health of the individual cannot help being adversely affected. Pain and infection in the oral cavity plus eventual loss of the masticatory function are not situations which one finds in "a healthy person".

In the data available from surveys of school children carried out in conjunction with dental public health programs the prevalence of untreated dental caries and periodontal disease, tooth mortality, etc. is directly related to the socio-economic situation of a given area.

One could give many examples but it is obvious that funds for dental care are necessary if one hopes to remain in a reasonably good state of dental health, and therefore it follows that poverty directly affects dental health.

INFLUENCE OF DENTAL HEALTH ON POVERTY

There is one aspect of dental health namely, esthetics, in which the poor are at a particular disadvantage.

* Prepared by Dental Health Division

The cost of restoring appearance where major reconstruction or replacement of anterior teeth are involved is relatively beyond the means of the poor, and, often not among the services available to them from charitable or other subsidized sources. To the extent that appearance affects their employability, the poor have their condition reinforced by poor dental health.

The practical significance of this factor has never been established by any known study. It is questionable that it could be verified by any simple short-term study.

Two additional aspects of dental health could have the effect of contributing to poverty:

- (a) infection of the teeth and/or supporting structures tend to make one unfit for certain types of employment;
- (b) absence from employment due to pain and infection. The latest information in this respect comes from England; it is a quotation by the Royal Society of Health (1) "Teeth cost money. The National Health Service spends over 100 million a year on dentistry - more than the cost of heart disease, bronchitis or tuberculosis. Only mental illness is more expensive." and further "in 1967, nearly two million working days were lost through dental disease".

BASIC PHILOSOPHY - DENTAL PROGRAMS

To bring about an improvement in the dental health of our people we must begin with children and the first step is a rapid expansion of dental public health programs with dental health education as the central theme stressing the utilization of all control methods by the community, the family and the individual, to reduce the need for dental care. Dental diseases are largely preventable - herein lies our hope. Controlled fluoridation of water supplies is to this day the most economical, practical and effective public health measure to reduce the incidence of dental caries.

In conjunction with educational programs and the adoption of control methods, dental care utilizing an incremental plan must be available for children and gradually extended to older age groups.

OTHER ASPECTS, INCLUDING STUDIES

The prevention and control of dental disease in an individual involves three levels of action:

the individual as a member of the community, e.g. water fluoridation;

the individual himself, e.g. personal oral hygiene reduced frequency of sugar ingestion and fluoride dentifrices; and, the individual and a dentist or dental hygienist, e.g., topical fluoride, treatment per se.

At each of these levels there is evidence that poverty, with its often attendant low educational level, adversely affects the chances that the poor have the same statistical opportunity of enjoying good dental health as do those of more favourable socio-economic situations.

"The frequency with which dental service was sought bore a striking relation to family income. (The relation of dental utilization to income is not perfect; there is no level of income, no matter how low, at which some people are not receiving care.)"

"Very similar differences existed when the individuals were classified according to educational attainment."

"The study indicated that family income and the education of the family head were related independently to the frequency with which dental care was sought."

"The cost of care was cited as a reason for neglect only 14 per cent of the time by the group who reported that they did not see a dentist regularly, although, some at least might hesitate to give this response to an interviewer" (where) cost (was listed) as a primary barrier to obtaining care. The answer was correlated sharply with family income. Cost was listed as a barrier by only 8 per cent of families making $7,500 a year or more, but by more than half of those making less than $2,000.

"Twenty-one per cent said they were afraid to go (to the dentist). Socio-economic factors did not appear to influence the responses listing either ignorance or fear".

POSSIBLE STUDIES TO CONFIRM THE GENERAL FINDINGS FROM U.S. DATA AS BEING TRUE OF THE CANADIAN SITUATION

On Children of the Poor

Data could be secured from the Directors of Provincial and Municipal Dental Programs across Canada correlating the results of schoolroom examinations with the economics of the areas in which the schools are located.

On Poor Adults

There is no existing body of Canadian data unless the "Condition on Entry" forms of a random sample of recruits to the Armed Forces were examined against a random sample of adult males of the same age group from more favoured economic levels. (The inference here is based upon the fact that recruiting, in peacetime, is best where unemployment is highest).

A more elaborate design would be required to cover both sexes and all age groups.

There is, however, no known reason to anticipate that the conclusions from a Canadian study would differ in any significant way from those of existing U.S. studies, namely: that a low standard of education as much as economics, contributes to the relatively low standard of dental health of the poor; that nutritional adequacy of the diet has little to do with their poor dental state, but, poor dietary habits, specifically the repeated intake of sweets, has. This latter habit, however, is not the peculiarity of any one socio-economic group in Canadian society.

NATURE OF SERVICES RELATED TO POVERTY AND DENTAL HEALTH

Most of the provinces welfare plans do not provide dental care as a public dental service, except as follows:

In Nova Scotia some wards of Children's Aid Societies receive treatment on a fee-for-service basis through local arrangements between the societies and individual dentists.

In Prince Edward Island dental treatments for indigent groups are provided by the Director of Dental Services, through the Department of Health, to children in the Orphanage and in clinics held in the two main urban cities.

In Quebec, such clinics are held in most of the health units. No provision is made for allowances to private dentists for dental care to indigents except perhaps by some charitable organizations.

In Ontario the Royal College of Dental Surgeons has contracted with the Department of Public Welfare, for the provision of dental care by private practitioners on a pro-rated fee-for-service basis, to eligible children up to 17 years of age. The Department of Health also provides dental care on a similar basis to children of recipients of Mothers' Allowances, and also to persons entitled to rehabilitation. Recipients of direct relief in this Province can obtain extractions only.

In the Province of Manitoba, all persons eligible under the Social Allowance Act may obtain comprehensive dental treatment benefits. Age is not a factor. Some provincial Welfare dental assistance may be obtained by persons not destitute but requiring some social assistance. In such cases the emergency treatments provided by private practitioners are remunerated in accordance with a dental agreement based on the fee schedule of the Manitoba Workmen's Compensation Board. For comprehensive dental treatments approval by the Director of Dental Services of a written case report including an estimate of fees is required.

In Saskatchewan, the Medical Services Division accepts responsibility for the payment of fees, in accord with an accepted fee schedule, for dental services for all persons qualified for social aid and so nominated by the Department of Social Welfare.

The Alberta Government provides the Alberta Dental Association with an annual grant of 53 cents per eligible person. This fund provides dental services to eligible pensioners: Old Age Pension, Old Age Assistance, Widows, Blind and Disability, Mothers' and Child Wards, as well as the spouses and dependents of each of these groups where applicable. Also eligible are persons under the Department of Welfare but who are not holders of a pensioners card. Welfare patients of the cities of Edmonton and Calgary are also provided dental care under arrangements between these cities and the Association. In all above cases the private practitioners are remunerated by the Association according to a pro-rated fee schedule.

In British Columbia non-native indigent persons and native indigent persons living off the reserve are supplied dental services following a means test to those in receipt of Health Services. To be eligible for Health Services, one must be unemployed and have received social assistance continuously for 3 months. This 3 months waiting period before receipt of their medical card is waived for those who qualify for Health Services and belong to the following categories: Old Age Assistance, Old Age Security (receiving supplementary assistance), Disabled Persons Allowance, Blind Persons Allowance and Child Welfare Wards.

The Department of National Health and Welfare through its Medical Services Directorate, provides dental services to Indians and Eskimos under definite terms and conditions.

In some provinces, such as Quebec for instance, static dental clinics have been inaugurated in almost all of the health units and provide dental care to indigent children. In others, such as in Prince Edward Island, the Director of Dental Services provides his own services in orphanages and in clinics held in the two main urban cities. Large cities such as Montreal, Toronto, Vancouver, Winnipeg and some of a lesser population such as Quebec and Ottawa have municipal dental clinics where free or almost free dental services are provided to welfare cases for the relief of pain and infection, to some extent preventive dental care is also supplied in many of these clinics.

WELFARE RESEARCH PROJECTS

supported under the National Welfare Grants Program
1962/63 - 1969/70

Project Title	Organization	Status
Project on Utilization of Personnel (564-20-1)	Canadian Welfare Council Commission on Education and Personnel	Completed
Purpose: To study how needed and welfare manpower resources (professional and non-professional) can be more effectively classified, developed and deployed to provide needed social services within existing and future organizational patterns of welfare services.

Auxiliary Homes Project (553-20-1)	New Brunswick Department of Youth and Welfare	Completed
Purpose: An assessment and evaluation of the existing organization, staffing and standards of welfare services with regard to nursing homes and homes for the aged in New Brunswick and the development of comprehensive plans for the organization of such services, according to acceptable standards, both to meet existing requirements and those that develop over the next two decades.

Assessment and Rehabilitation Project for Older Recipients of General Welfare Assistance (555-20-2)	Ontario Department of Public Welfare	Transferred to Canada Assis- tance Plan
Purpose: To learn more of the characteristics of men aged 50 to 65 years in receipt of General Welfare Assistance, the types of problems these men encounter when seeking employment and the best methods of helping them to surmount such problems.

Family Demonstration Project (555-20-1)	Ontario Department of Public Welfare	Completed
Purpose: To identify social, economic, and health characteristics of long-term recipients of General Welfare Assistance in the City of Toronto; to measure the effectiveness of assigning small caseloads to welfare workers presently employed in Ontario welfare departments who have no training in welfare; and to identify areas in which, and the reasons why, the intensive and concentrated service was not effective.

WELFARE RESEARCH PROJECTS

supported under the
National Welfare Grants Program

Project Title	Organization	Status
Analysis of First Year Field Instruction Components and Methodology (555-21-3)	University of Toronto School of Social Work	Deferred

Purpose: To analyze the content of field instruction in order to examine and analyze the component elements in the field instruction method now being used in schools of social work. It is believed that a careful analysis of this process will lead to a better understanding of the pedagogical methods and a more economical and more effective use of the time and staff involved.

Historical and Classified Survey of Research at the School of Social Work (Research Compendium) (555-21-4)	University of Toronto School of Social Work	Completed
------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------	------------------------------------------------	-----------

Purpose: To analyze and classify the research work carried out by graduate M.S.W. and Ph.D. students under faculty direction at the School of Social Work during the years 1946 through 1963, and to make the resulting report available through publication. Included in the published report will be an examination of the main trends in the researches analyzed in the document and a study of the place and function of research as part of the education of professional social workers.

Project on Social Adjustment, Personality and Behaviour in Ontario Training Schools (555-21-2)	University of Toronto School of Social Work	Completed
------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------	------------------------------------------------	-----------

Purpose: To develop a methodology that would allow precise quantitative evaluation of correctional services; to apply the new method and ancillary techniques to specific problems met by Ontario Training Schools in their task of treatment and rehabilitation; to involve in the research process graduate students proceeding to M.S.W. degree as well as staff of OTS and thus contribute to the education of welfare personnel, both professional and non-professional.

Area Development Project (559-21-1)	Community Chest and Councils of the Greater Vancouver Area	In progress
-------------------------------------	------------------------------------------------------------	-------------

Purpose: To evaluate the effect of the treatment program on the families served, using a control group design and a five year follow-up study; to evaluate the processes of integrating a wide variety of services under one administration and the resultant effect on agencies, and to study in depth the genetic, biological, psychiatric, psychological and social factors associated with multi-problem families.

The project proposes to do this by establishing an area social service centre, to provide integrated social casework, social group work and public health services to a group of multi-problem families, to mobilize a wide variety of resources in the rehabilitation of these families and to engage in community development in the area in which these families live.

WELFARE RESEARCH PROJECTS

Project Title	Organization	Status
Project on Community Planning and Provision of Direct Service for Troubled Young Women (564-21-1)	Young Women's Christian Association of Canada	Completed
Purpose: To establish a research design for a project that will attempt to discover the extent and nature of welfare needs presented to local YWCA by troubled young women with a view to gaining insight into the most effective way of helping them, and to ascertain the extent to which welfare needs of women are met by existing child and family health and welfare services.

Project to Measure the Appropriateness and Effectiveness of Social Welfare Program in the Local Community (559-20-1)	British Columbia Department of Social Welfare	Completed
Purpose: To establish a research design for a project to determine the community's awareness and use of social welfare services provided by the Department and related government departments and an evaluation of the effectiveness of these services.

Prince Albert Social Aid Study (557-20-1)	Saskatchewan Department of Social Welfare and Rehabilitation	Completed
Purpose: To study in depth the social aid caseload in a small city which has had the highest incidence of economic dependency in the province for a number of years. The plan of study includes a general survey of all active cases within fairly set parameters, the classification and detailed study of the select group and finally the formulation of rehabilitation plans for individual cases in the select group.

The Voluntary Agency and Government: A Study of Public-Private Relationships in English-speaking Canada (555-21-6)	University of Toronto School of Social Work	In Progress
Purpose: To explore the patterns of relationships between public and voluntary welfare organizations in English-speaking Canada, with a view to defining the continuing function of the volunteer and the voluntary agency in relationship to government, in the context of increasing public responsibility in the welfare field.

Winnipeg Multi-Service Project: An Evaluation (556-20-2)	Manitoba Department of Welfare	In Progress
Purpose: a) To evaluate the effects of an integrated multi-service program with a family-centred approach, by measuring the movement made by multi-problem families in specific areas of functioning. The study population is made up of treatment families plus a control group of matched multi-problem non-project families receiving community welfare services. All families live in the Salter-Jarvis area of Winnipeg.
b) To develop valid and reliable instruments for the identification of types of families to be arranged in a typology which can be related to the treatment and movement of families.

WELFARE RESEARCH PROJECTS

Project Title	Organization	Status
Evaluation of Rehabilitation Procedures (557-20-3)	Saskatchewan Department of Social Welfare and Rehabilitation	Completed
Purpose: To evaluate the extensive use of rehabilitation procedures with respect to social aid cases in two specific welfare regions; ultimately to determine what rehabilitation services can be provided effectively through a municipal welfare dept.

Youths Committed to Correctional Institutions (557-20-4)	Saskatchewan Department of Social Welfare and Rehabilitation	Deferred
Purpose: To establish the proportion of inmates in provincial correctional institutions who have had previous contact with departmental services; and to determine the nature and appropriateness of this previous contact.

School Performance in Public Assistance Families (564-20-2)	Canadian Welfare Council Public Welfare Division	Completed (Design Phase)
Purpose: To explore the relationship between factors associated with the receipt of public assistance and the school performance of the children of public assistance families and to determine if there are relationships between any aspects of these two variables which could be stated as causal hypotheses.

Socio-Cultural Factors Affecting the Welfare of Children (564-22-1)	Canadian Conference on Children	Completed
Purpose: As part of a larger study, to make an inventory of child welfare services, with special reference to the province of Quebec. (Published under the title of Child Welfare Services: Winding Paths to Maturity as a background study for the Canadian Conference on Children, 1965).

Single Unemployed Men in Hamilton (555-21-8)	University of Toronto School of Social Work	Completed
Purpose: To examine the characteristics of a group of single unemployed men in Hamilton so as to enable comparisons with previous studies on the homeless transient and the chronic petty offender and to extend knowledge of possible value to social and law enforcement agencies dealing with this group.

The Effect of Cultural Difference on the Provision and Outcome of Social Work Services (555-25-1)	University of Ottawa School of Social Welfare	Completed
Purpose: To examine the possible effects on the provision of individual social work services arising from differences in cultural identity between the client and the social worker. Specifically a period of social work intervention will be examined in cases involving French-Canadian and Anglo-Saxon Catholic clients and social workers where a problem of family relationship exists.

A Community Study of Indians, Metis and Whites in Regina (557-21-1)	Regina Welfare Council	Completed
Purpose: To identify problems of social and economic adjustment arising out of the relocation of Indians and Metis from reservations and/or rural communities to Regina and to indicate approaches which may mitigate such problems.

Evaluation of Service to Social Allowance Recipients by the Neiramo District Office (559-20-2)	British Columbia Department of Welfare	Completed
Purpose: To obtain some indication of the effectiveness, from the point of view of client and non-client, of the financial and counselling services given by the British Columbia Department of Social Welfare under the provincial Social Assistance Act.

Study in Depth of Characteristics of Multi-Problem Families (Area Development) (559-21-2)	Community Chest and Councils of the Greater Vancouver Area	In progress
Purpose: To study the relationship of individual and family characteristics to chronic dependency, with an emphasis on isolating those factors that can be identified at an early point in the family life cycle, where preventive intervention might be possible.

School Performance of Children of Public Assistance Families (564-20-5)	Canadian Welfare Council	Completed
Purpose: To procure data on the characteristics of public assistance recipients and on the school performance of their children, to ascertain whether there are factors in the characteristics of the recipients which are associated with abnormal school performance.

Cape Breton County Welfare Services Study (552-20-2)	Nova Scotia Department of Welfare	Completed
Purpose: To determine, through a survey of social welfare and related agencies, the need for a county social planning council as a means of strengthening and co-ordinating the work of such agencies.

Lake Road Project (552-20-3)	Nova Scotia Department of Welfare	Completed
Purpose: A study of an impoverished community located on the outskirts of an urban area. Data are to be gathered on family structure, social disorganization, self-perspectives of community members, and their utilization of government and private help and welfare services. The findings are expected to contribute to strategies for more effective provision of welfare services for such communities.

Development of Hypothesis on Similarities and Differences in Methods (555-25-2)	University of Ottawa School of Social Work	In progress
Purpose: To develop a hypothesis around the fundamental similarities and/or differences in method-procedures-process for social work practice with individuals, groups and communities. Up to now preparation for social work practice within the welfare service has been largely based on separate preparation according to the "casework method", the "groupwork method", and/or "community organization method". Experiments with the one "social work method" preparation do not seem to have been related to any clear identification of what is method as distinct from process and procedures, which should first be subject to research investigation. This project is an attempt to set up a hypothesis for such research investigation.

The Relation Between Parental Discipline and Physical Cruelty in Young Males (555-29-1)	Carleton University	Completed
Purpose: This study is part of an ongoing psychological research project directed toward the study of attributes associated with acts of cruelty by teenage boys. The first part of this project is designed to secure a sample of non-delinquent boys for purposes of comparison with the findings of a group of delinquent boys in previous experiments. The second part deals with the study of the relationship between parental forms of discipline and the degree of cruelty exhibited by the boys involved in the experiment. The possible implications of the findings of such a study for agencies concerned with the protection of children and the prevention and treatment of juvenile delinquency are obvious.

Social Service Audit of Metropolitan Winnipeg (556-20-3)	Department of Social Welfare Manitoba	Completed
Purpose: A comprehensive inventory of voluntary and public social welfare services in Metropolitan Winnipeg, and a survey of the socio-economic characteristics and social welfare needs of the population. Information will be obtained on a time sample basis and the social and demographic characteristics of all persons served by the time sample will be cast against a wide range of community characteristics data. Research findings will be vected to technical committees related to various areas of service which will develop reports recommending action.

Study of the Possibilities for Co-ordinated Use of Resource Agencies in an Urban Redevelopment Area (564-27-2)	Centre for Community Studies University Campus, Saskatoon	Completed
Purpose: To initiate a program of collaborative studies designed to facilitate more adequate rehabilitation services for disadvantaged families residing in or migrant into an urban redevelopment area. These studies will seek to determine what problems of human adjustment tend to be associated with the downtown area of urban redevelopment and how services can best be related to the rehabilitation needs of rural migrants seeking employment in an expanding labour market.

An Evaluation of Radio as a Medium for Family Life Education and Crisis Intervention (558-23-1)	Family Service Association of Edmonton	Completed (Design Phase)
Purpose: To develop a research design in order to test the following hypotheses:
a) that a "call-in" radio program represents an effective medium for family life education on a mass audience basis
b) that the medium provides this service to people who would not otherwise seek out such service
c) that this medium brings the agency's counselling facilities closer to the people allowing them to use help on a voluntary basis where they would not otherwise have sought help, and
d) that those using the counselling facilities via the program are effectively helped.

A Critical Analysis of an Urban Community Development Project in Greater Vancouver (559-27-2)	Department of Political Science, Sociology and Anthropology, Simon Fraser University	In progress

Employability and Public Welfare - An Assessment (564-20-6)	The Canadian Welfare Council	In progress
Purpose: To study groups of "employable" unemployed receiving public assistance in three Canadian Cities to determine why they are unable to work and the effects on them of receipt of assistance, especially on their attitude to work. This study is being undertaken in co-operation with the municipal welfare departments of Ottawa, Winnipeg and Edmonton.

Study of Day Care of Children (564-20-7)	The Canadian Welfare Council	In progress
Purpose: To begin a survey of day care services in Canada to determine: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> what services are now being provided; how these services are being used; the extent to which they are meeting demand; standards and working conditions for personnel employed in such services; and income and selected social characteristics of families using these services.

Low Income Budgets and Consumer Behaviour (564-20-8)	The Canadian Welfare Council	Completed (Design Phase)
Purpose: To develop a research design in order to examine income and expenditures pattern and factors that limit or govern expenditures of individuals and families with low incomes, the choices open to them as consumers and the rationale of such choices. It is hoped that this study will produce objective data pertinent to the development of public social security policy.

Study of Visiting Homemaker Services (564-20-10)	The Canadian Welfare Council	In progress

Factors which Contribute to the Social and Economic Independence of People Over 60 (557-25-1)	Saskatoon Welfare Council and Saskatoon Senior Citizens Service Association	In progress
-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------	-----------------------------------------------------------------------------	-------------

Purpose: This project is to determine factors enabling older citizens to maintain social and economic independence in their community. The sample is drawn from the total population over 60 in Saskatoon. Direct interviews will obtain information for linking variables to establish patterns of needs and consumption of services according to a number of criteria such as income, mobility, social and family relations, education, occupation and work history.

Evaluation of New Techniques of Treatment of Young Children and Women Offenders (555-21-9)	School of Social Work University of Toronto	Completed
--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------	---------------------------------------------	-----------

Purpose: The purpose of the project is to extend and re-test previous project (555-21-2, or Social Adjustment, Personality and Behaviour in Training Schools) to young children requiring residential treatment in a training school, and to women offenders, especially those of the younger age group, who have been sentenced to a reformatory. The aim of the present project is to analyze the social processes involved and to provide an estimate to which the purposes of the new training school for young boys, and the reorganization of the Toronto reformatory for Women are being fulfilled.

Evaluation of Detached Worker Programme for Delinquent Boys (555-30-2)	Department of Reform Institutions, Ontario	Deierred
------------------------------------------------------------------------	--------------------------------------------	----------

Purpose: Since 1961 the Ottawa Youth Service Bureau (later referred to as Y.S.B.) has been operating its detached worker programme which aims at changing the behaviour and attitudes of Ottawa's hard-core delinquent boys and girls in the age group of 10 to 15, inclusive. This programme, which makes use of a reaching-out approach, appears to be highly successful and costs less than any institutional programme. But, as with most welfare programmes, this one needs careful evaluation of its effectiveness. Increased knowledge in this field should offer guidance to Juvenile Court policy and contribute to the organization of social services for delinquent youth, possibly on a national basis.

Study of Parents Seeking Divorce in Middlesex County (555-36-1)	Children's Aid Society of London, Ontario	Completed
-----------------------------------------------------------------	-------------------------------------------	-----------

Purpose: The project will provide statistics on parents seeking divorce: Age at marriage, and divorce, employment history, education, health, church involvement, plans for care and education of children, functioning of children (school, recreation, relation with other parent), professional help sought and received by the family.

WELFARE RESEARCH PROJECTS

Project Title:	Organization	Status
Implications of the Opportunities for Youth Project (558-24-1)	Department of Sociology University of Alberta	Completed
Purpose: 1. The larger goal of this study would be to provide guidelines for the launching and evaluation of delinquency prevention programs. Through the analysis of data gathered as part of the Opportunities for Youth Project in Seattle in 1965 (Reported in the Journal of Research in Crime and Delinquency, July 1966), light may be shed on several crucial questions. 2. Small surveys will probably be made to supplement the data already gathered, expand on the findings emerging from these analysis, and check the applicability of these ideas for the Canadian scene.

Use of Welfare Aides in the Children's Aid Society of Vancouver (559-24-1)	Children's Aid Society of Vancouver	In progress
Purpose: 1. To develop a detailed analysis of the functions of the agency caseworker to whom a generalized caseload is assigned, and the ranking of the tasks of such as case-worker according to the degree of professional judgment and autonomy required in the performance of the tasks. 2. To use the set of rankings to define two or more levels of responsibility which may be assumed by welfare aides. 3. To assess the influence of the age of the welfare aide to different levels of responsibility on the quality and quantity of agency service to individual cases, and the influence of the age of the welfare aide on her performance of a variety of tasks.

Factors in Social Work Competencies (559-26-1)	School of Social Welfare University of British Columbia	In progress
Purpose: 1. To develop reliable and valid measures of field work and classroom performance in graduate education in social work. 2. To establish, through factor analysis, the number of independent components in student performance in social work education at the end of both the first and second year of the educational program. 3. To identify student characteristics, discernible at the time of admission. 4. Compare findings of the study with the findings of studies undertaken in other Schools of Social Work.

Social Policy Implications of the Unmarried Parent (564-20-11)	Canadian Welfare Council	Deferred
Purpose: Examine the results when unmarried mothers who have received agency service decide not to relinquish their children for adoption. CASE STUDY: THE RELATION OF SOCIAL SCIENCES TO
THE DEVELOPMENT OF SOCIAL POLICY AS ILLUSTRATED
BY THE APPLICATION OF SOCIAL SCIENCES IN THE DE-SIGN OF THE GUARANTEED INCOME SUPPLEMENT PROGRAM*

The Guaranteed Income Supplement program is an income maintenance scheme which provides a supplementary cash benefit to Old Age Security pensioners in Canada who qualify for this payment on the basis of an income test. The program is the ultimate instrument developed to give effect to the social policy that additional income assistance should be given to aged persons who would benefit little or not at all from the provisions of the Canada Pension Plan. This proposal was first made by the Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons, and again by the Senate Committee on Aging who in February 1966 recommended a guaranteed annual income for all Canadians aged 65 years and over.

The Department of National Health and Welfare had, since mid-1965, been examining ways and means of implementing this particular social policy. A number of proposals were made, but the most important were the following:

- (i) a flat rate increase to all old age security pensioners;
- (ii) the extension of the Canada Assistance Plan to provide additional income support to this group;
- (iii) the provision of the additional income to elderly persons by means of an income maintenance scheme which would use an income test to determine eligibility and the amount of the benefit payment.

Six vital problems of concern to the government in the design and implementation of a feasible program to implement this policy were:

- (i) the cost of the additional income support,
- (ii) the method of financing,
- (iii) the impact of additional expenditures on other government programs,
- (iv) the impact of features of the new program on other social security programs,
- (v) the ensuring that payments were adequate and were directed to those who required the additional income support,
- (vi) the design of a program which would not be too complex for the public to understand nor too difficult to administer.

Many persons from many disciplines contributed to the design of the Guaranteed Income Supplement program. The substantive role in this process was, however, exercised by social scientists who provided the necessary background information on which decisions could be made. The principal social science applied in this particular case was Economics emphasizing the areas of social security, public finance, income distribution and national income theory. Techniques used in the studies conducted were cost benefit analysis, cost forecasting, use of economic and demographic models, use of DBS income surveys and Taxation income data, use of statistics and mathematics, development of concepts and principles, research and enquiry, comparative analysis, as well as the application of the scientific method in the solution of specific problems relating to the design of this program. Sociology played a subsidiary role in this process being concerned chiefly with questions of social adequacy of benefits and horizontal and vertical equity to the covered population of alternate design features of the proposed program.

* Prepared by J.I. Clark, Research and Statistics Directorate.

The functions of the social scientist in applying social sciences to the solution of social and economic problems can be illustrated with respect to the role played in this respect in the development of the Guaranteed Income Supplement. This is discussed with reference to the following:

- (i) Cost estimates and cost forecasting.
 - (ii) Research investigation into concepts and principles.
 - (iii) Development of new concepts and principles.
 - (iv) Analysis of features of the new program in relation to other government programs.
 - (v) Analysis of similar programs in other countries.
 - (vi) Research into administration and methods.
- (i) Cost estimates and cost forecasting

The principal technique used for this particular function was cost benefit analysis. Cost estimates both present and future were calculated for each of the approaches suggested, and these costs were then compared with the benefits to be derived under each approach.

Cost estimates were developed using either simple demographic models or more complex income-demographic models.

The simple demographic models were age distributions of the aged population as well as projections of these population distributions.

The more complex income-demographic models were those available from data collected by DBS income surveys or from income data provided by Taxation Statistics.

Population projections were not developed; rather the population projections developed in the Actuarial Report of the Canada Pension Plan were used when required.

In determining costs of the flat-rate increase for all old age security pensioners, a simple demographic model was used. Forecasts of these costs were based on assumptions as to increases in the OAS population due to the lowering of the eligible pensionable age, and the possible effect of changes in the level of consumer prices over the forecast period. The present and forecast cost estimates of the flat-rate increase proposal demonstrated that present and future costs were clearly beyond the existing and future financial capability of the federal government unless taxes were increased substantially or substantial reductions were made to other areas of government spending or both. An analysis of the impact of the benefit payments on the covered population indicated that benefits would go to all OAS pensioners whether needy or not, and would not improve the relative financial position of the Old Age Security pensioners in the lower income ranges. In fact a flat rate increase would leave everyone in relatively the same position and would not correct the income situation, but rather it would sow the seeds for future flat rate increases to the Old Age Security pension.

Estimates of the costs using the Canada Assistance Plan approach were made using simple demographic models but these cost estimates were limited because: the Canada Assistance Plan was not implemented at that time, the Canada Assistance Plan used a new approach for the provision of social assistance, there was a lack of adequate data on income for the aged population, it was not known how the supplement would be tested and no information was available on how willingly the aged population would apply if the supplement was considered to be a public assistance payment.

Because of the number of indefinite variables affecting cost estimates using the Canada Assistance Plan approach, these estimates were not too reliable.

A more complex income-demographic model was used to make cost estimates for the income-tested approach (this incidentally emerged as the approach used for the Guaranteed Income Supplement program). Preliminary investigations were carried out to ascertain the feasibility of using income and population data available under the Income Tax Statistics. These did not prove to be too reliable because they did not cover non-taxpayers who did not file tax returns - the very group most likely to require the Supplement. The omission of this group meant that any assumptions as to income and social characteristics of this group would be highly speculative and largely unsubstantiated.

Accordingly, data on incomes were requested from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics.

The income data used were obtained from the 1961 Census of Canada, and were collected from a 20 per cent sample of private non-farm households.

At our request, DBS adjusted these data by a computer program for those age 68 and over:

- (i) by adding $900 to the annual incomes of those in the 68 and 69 age groups, and
- (ii) by adding $240 to the annual incomes of those in the 70 plus age group i.e. ($900 minus $660 the difference between the OAS payable in 1967 and in 1961).

No other adjustments were made to these data.

A series of income frequency distributions were prepared showing frequencies by $100 classes for single persons up to $2,000; and by $100 classes in the lower ranges and $500 classes in the upper ranges for male and female family heads up to $5,000. Income frequency distributions were set up for the following:

- (i) Male Heads 68-69; 70 and over, and 68 and over.
- (ii) Female Heads 68-69; 70 and over, and 68 and over.
- (iii) Total Heads 68-69; 70 and over, and 68 and over.
- (iv) Male Singles 68-69; 70 and over, and 68 and over.
- (v) Female Singles 68-69; 70 and over, and 68 and over.

The income distributions for male family heads and for total family heads show for each class of income, these heads distributed by those who have:

- (i) no wife
- (ii) wife under 65
- (iii) wife 65-67
- (iv) wife 68-69
- (v) wife 70 and over.

Assumptions were made as to the change in income from 1961 to 1967, the population was adjusted to the projected population forecast for 1967 in the Actuarial Report of the Canada Pension Plan, and cost estimates were made based on different minimum and maximum income limits and using different rates of offset against income.

Forecast of future costs required assumptions as to population changes, price effects, wage effects, impact of the Canada and Quebec Pension Plans and other related factors.

The estimate of the cost of GIS for 1967 as well as the forecasts of costs for 5 to 10 year periods, when compared to similar costs and forecast costs of a flat-rate increase of the OAS pension, were important in deciding on the form of the program to be used. The much lower costs of the GIS approach, together with the selective features of the GIS program which, through the income test, directed payments to Old Age Security pensioners in the lower income brackets in such a way that the supplement was reduced directly in proportion to the amount of a beneficiary's income, demonstrated the superiority of this approach.

(ii) Research in concepts and principles

Prior to the decision to use the income test approach (or negative income tax approach) for the supplement, a number of investigations had to be carried out in the literature into concepts, principles and problems involved in using a negative income tax approach. The investigations were related to:

- (a) the nature of guaranteed income and negative income tax,
- (b) the techniques suggested for the use of such an approach (in effect since most of the literature dealt with theoretical considerations and were not concerned too much with practical application, a gap in knowledge existed),
- (c) the concept of income,
- (d) the form of the beneficiary unit,
- (e) problems of the income standard to be used for the income test i.e. whether the standard should be current or the prior year's income,
- (f) problems of person's retiring from employment with sudden and sharp declines in income,
- (g) problems related to marital status and changes in marital status,
- (h) questions relating to the payment of the supplement to persons in government institutions,
- (i) questions relating to the payment of the supplement to beneficiaries outside Canada for short periods of time and for longer periods of time,
- (j) problems related to overpayments whether fraudulent or not,
- (k) comparison of means, needs and income tests,
- (l) problems encountered in other countries using similar approaches for income support.

These studies involved research and enquiry into the concepts and principles as explained in the available literature, and the subsequent reporting of findings in respect of these matters. The studies described concepts and principles and then related them to the actual situation of the problem as encountered in the design and development of the GIS program.

(iii) Development of concepts and principles

The negative income tax approach was the subject of theoretical discussion in the research literature but with few exceptions no programs had been developed and put into force. It was necessary then to develop concepts and formulate principles which could be used for purposes of such a program. Several illustrations below indicate the scope of the research into the underlying problems and give an indication of the development of concepts and principles as related to the GIS program.

(a) The concept of income

There was very little information available on the concept of income which should be used for an income-tested social security benefit. Certain principles were stressed such as the use of family income, and the need for the concept to be as comprehensive as possible in the interest of equity to the potential beneficiaries. The Guaranteed Income Supplement program, however, had features and aspects which did not correspond to any of the theoretical or practical models of guaranteed annual income. Consequently, a concept of income appropriate to the Guaranteed Income Supplement program had to be developed and research economists of the Department played an important role in examining concepts of income and in developing the concept ultimately used for the GIS program.

It was recognized that, to preserve equity, the definition should be as comprehensive as possible, but the requirement for a comprehensive definition clashed with the administrative need to keep administrative actions to a minimum, which would be possible if an established and developed concept of income were used. Such a concept was available under the Income Tax Act, but it had several limitations in that it was individual and excluded certain sources of income such as unemployment insurance, workmen's compensation, war veterans pensions and allowances and so on. The decision was made to use the income tax concept of income for the GIS program but certain modifications were made to this concept, namely:

- (i) Income was considered to be income as declared for income tax and not taxable income (i.e. taxable income is declared income minus any permitted exemptions or deductions). If taxable income were used many more persons would qualify.
- (ii) The concept was modified so that individual income was used for pensioners considered to have single status, and family income for persons with married status.
- (iii) OAS pensions and the GIS supplement were excluded from income because otherwise receipts of retro-active payments of OAS in any year and the actual receipt of the GIS payment would disqualify a person from the benefit in the year following such receipts.

(b) The income limits

The Senate Committee on Aging had proposed a guaranteed annual income of $1260 subject to the development of a socially acceptable minimum budget for single persons and couples.

The Guaranteed Income Supplement used this amount as the minimum so that a pensioner with no other income would receive this amount. The GIS program, however, provided a tapering off feature under which the maximum amount of the monthly supplement would be reduced, for any individual recipient, by half his average monthly income from sources other than his OAS pension or GIS benefit, expressed in even dollars. Accordingly, the minimum and maximum limits for an individual pensioner in 1967 were set at $1260 and $1620.

A further adjustment was provided for under the program in that these limits would be escalated each time the basic OAS pension was increased by the Pension Index. This was done by making the supplement a fixed percentage (i.e. 40 per cent) of the amount of the old age security pension.

In this particular aspect of the GIS program, the function of the social scientist was to point out the future impact on private savings and private retirement arrangements if the program had used a lower upper limit (than $1620) and a much higher offset (than 50%) with respect to income other than the OAS pension.

While the selection of the minimum guarantee level was made on the basis of expediency, a modification was instituted for the GIS program to permit partial benefits to be paid up to a higher limit than the minimum. The adequacy of the benefit arrangements remains to be tested when the Minimum Standard of Satisfactory Living announced by the Prime Minister September 16, 1968 has been developed. Social scientists will play a vital role in the development of such a standard. In fact, this Department has already conducted several studies into this particular aspect.

(c) The income standard

To determine eligibility for an income-tested benefit a measure of income in a given period was required. If past year's income is used, some persons may not qualify who need it because of reduced income in the following year, while others who do qualify and experience a change in income in the following year find that the benefit is either too high or too low for their needs. The use of a current income measure means that benefits will be made in accordance with estimates of current income needs, but depending on the manner of payment and recovery it could involve overpayments with a consequent social and economic hardship to many low-income persons.

An hypothesis was made that the income situation for most of the OAS population was sufficiently stable so that a measure of income based on a given year would be reasonably representative of income in the year following. While there was no income data available to test this hypothesis, it was one of the factors taken into account in establishing past year's income as the standard for determining eligibility and the amount of the benefit.

(d) Pensioners retiring from employment

Many pensioners retiring from employment experience a sudden reduction in income sufficiently large to permit them to qualify if this anticipated reduction in employment earnings could be taken into account. Since GIS used a measure of income based on past year's income, this meant that an OAS pensioner retiring from employment might have to wait for a period up to two years unless the measure of income could be modified to take his reduced retirement earnings into account. Options were developed by research economists which used a measure of past and current income so that, by exercising these options, an OAS pensioner retiring from employment and experiencing a sharp reduction in retirement earnings could qualify for a GIS benefit in the year he retires and in the year following. This option principle was developed specifically for the GIS program and is a unique feature of the program.

(iv) Analysis of the impact of the new program on existing social security programs

The impacts of the GIS program as an income maintenance measure on other social security programs were analyzed.

The institution of the GIS program had certain impacts on War Veteran's Allowances, and these effects had to be examined and reported on so that some measure of co-ordination could be effected between these two programs.

Increased income support under the GIS program meant that provincial welfare authorities might be able to reduce income support to the needy aged and thereby use the savings effected for other provincial government programs. To the extent that welfare costs were shareable by the federal government, certain savings could be effected by the federal government. These aspects and implications were the subject of special studies.

(v) Analysis of similar programs in other countries

(a) The implementation of the GIS program involved a problem of whether the Department of National Health and Welfare would be mainly involved while the Department of National Revenue would play a subsidiary role or vice versa. The actual design of the program was a determining factor of the administrative role. Payments of a flat-rate increase to all pensioners (excepting those who elected to opt-out of the program) recovered through the tax system would have heavily involved DNR but posed social and economic problems in recovering overpayments. On the other hand, the prior application and assessment of benefits adopted under GIS involved DNH&W and only marginally involved DNR in checking a random sample of returns.

(b) The problem of administering a program which used a new concept of income instead of a developed and well-defined concept of income such as that employed under the Income Tax Act has been examined above.

(c) The question of future assessment of the effectiveness of the program was examined and arrangements were made to collect annual samples of approved applications in order to make these assessments for future guidance of policy makers. There were many questions and areas of uncertainty in the development stages of GIS for which no adequate data existed. The statistical program was designed in such a way as to provide answers to these areas of uncertainty as well as to provide additional statistical data for the analysis of the effectiveness of the program and to provide the basis of decision-making in the event that it would be necessary to change the GIS program.

Data limitations and implications for the future

One of the most pressing limitations in the studies carried out for the GIS program was the lack of current income data in sufficient detail to estimate costs of this program. DBS conducts a biennial income survey every two years, but the sample size is small, and it is not always possible to generate the data required for detailed cost estimates. The 1961 survey was a 20 per cent sample of non-farm individuals and families conducted during the Census and was very good for our purposes. However, it did not cover the farm population and the time period between 1961 and 1967 was sufficiently long to limit the applicability of some of the assumptions made.

Very little was known about the behaviour patterns of the aged population - i.e. whether they would understand the program which was more complex than the OAS pension program, whether they would respond and apply for the benefits, and whether they would apply for a benefit if it was very small. Experience has shown that they understood the program and responded well, but statistical data on payments under the GIS program show a skewness towards the higher monthly benefits and not an even distribution throughout including the lower benefit amounts. This is an area which requires further study to ascertain whether or not there is a reluctance to apply when the benefit payment is small.

The studies and conceptual development conducted during the GIS program has strengthened solidarity of the research team in the Research Directorate, and will pay considerable benefits in studies on more comprehensive forms of guaranteed income.

Provinces for which projects have been submitted but not yet approved: Prince Edward Island.

Projects Approved

Province of Quebec

"Bûcheron" projects in Montmagny, L'Islet; Region des Cantons de l'Est; Beauce; Amos and Mont Laurier:

This involves a total of seven "bûcheron" or lumberjack projects. Two projects each were submitted and approved for Montmagny and for the Eastern Townships. The first set of these has been completed.

The overall aim of these projects is to enable recipients of public assistance to become productive citizens. The projects attempt to motivate individuals to look after their own needs, develop habits which will enable them to fit into the everyday working world and prove to themselves that they are able to provide for their needs and those of their dependents.

Participants perform the following forestry jobs: setting up seed stands; clearing paths; reforestation; pruning and gathering of cones.

Participants are provided with any social welfare services necessary for their rehabilitation.

These projects range from six to twenty-two weeks in duration and from 125 to 150 persons participate in each project.

Les Ateliers R-10 Inc., Quebec City:

This project is aimed at the global social rehabilitation of the worker-trainees and their vocational readjustment either through a vocational training course or regular employment. Trainees include persons who are chronically unemployed, in receipt of assistance and fit to work.

Participants are engaged in the assembly of floor and dish mops and in woodwork and carpentry projects. It is hoped to extend the type of work available.

Trainees are provided with complementary recreational and cultural activities. They also receive services necessary for social and work rehabilitation including vocational counselling, case and group work and medical and psychological services, if necessary.

Some 20 worker-trainees participate in a four month training period. About 60 persons can be trained in one year.

Les Établissements du Gentilhomme Inc., Quebec City

This project is designed primarily to prepare ex-convicts for participation in the labour market by providing them with work adjustment in a workshop setting.

Participants are engaged in upholstery, and the manufacture of rubber mats. Other activities planned include building and ground maintenance. There are also conferences, lectures and animation meetings for trainees. Welfare services are provided by La Société de Réadaptation Sociale. This society will work in close collaboration with the workshop.

The project is designed to last for twelve months. Twenty persons can be trained at any one time with training periods ranging from six to twelve months.

Province of Saskatchewan

Prince Albert and Keewatin Centre Work Training Programs:

The purpose of these projects is to eliminate or reduce problems of participants which interfere with their securing or holding employment.

The projects are designed to develop social skills essential for adequate functioning in employment and in the community, academic skills to the point where participants may take advantage of regular pre-employment courses offered by Manpower and by the provincial Department of Education, and acceptable work habits. There is an attempt to identify occupational interests and aptitudes and to identify and resolve family problems which may affect occupational activity.

Trainees divide their time between work activities and classroom instruction. Work activity includes maintenance of the buildings housing the projects, demolition of buildings, repair of furniture and other personal property of trainees, repair of homes and construction of small items such as garbage can stands.

The projects can accommodate twelve to fifteen persons and training periods may range in length from four months to a year. The projects are designed for a period of three years.

Projects Submitted for Approval

Prince Edward Island

Prince Edward Island Work Training Program:

The goal of this project is the preparation of participants for competitive employment or further training through normal resources by the development of social skills essential for functioning in employment and in the community, basic academic skills, and acceptable work habits. It will be attempted also to identify occupational interests and aptitudes and to identify and resolve family problems which might affect employment.

Academic training will take about ten percent of overall course time. Work activity planned includes repair and maintenance of public buildings, demolition, repair of furniture, basic fundamentals of carpentry, painting and silviculture, and the care and use of power and hand tools.

The project is initially planned for ten persons but is designed to accommodate up to sixty. The duration of training will be from three to six month, depending on the individual. The project is expected to last one year.

Relationship with the Department of Manpower and Immigration

1. Representatives of Manpower are included in the Interdepartmental Committee on Work Activity which reviews and assesses projects submitted for approval.

2. Persons participating in work activity projects are persons who are unable to take advantage of either training or work placement services available from Manpower.

3. Local Manpower officials are involved to ensure that plans are developed to enable participants to move on to either training, rehabilitation or placement.

ORDERS OF REFERENCE

Extract from the Minutes of Proceedings of the Senate of Tuesday, October 28, 1969:

"The Honourable Senator Croll moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Roebuck:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to investigate and report upon all aspects of poverty in Canada, whether urban, rural regional or otherwise, to define and elucidate the problem of poverty in Canada, and to recommend appropriate action to ensure the establishment of a more effective structure of remedial measures;

That the Committee have power to engage the services of such counsel, staff and technical advisors as may be necessary for the purpose of the inquiry;

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, and to report from time to time;

That the Committee be authorized to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee, to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate, and to adjourn from place to place;

That the evidence taken on the subject during the preceding session be referred to the Committee; and

That the Committee be composed of the Honourable Senators Bélisle, Carter, Cook, Croll, Eudes, Everett, Fergusson, Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche), Hastings, Inman, Lefrançois, McGrand, Pearson, Quart, Roebuck and Sparrow.

After debate,

In amendment, the Honourable Senator McDonald moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Burchill, that the motion be not now adopted, but that it be amended by striking out paragraph 4 thereof and substituting therefor the following:—

"That the Committee be authorized to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee, to adjourn from place to place, and notwithstanding Rule 76 (4), to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate."

After debate, and—

The question being put on the motion in amendment, it was—

Clerk of the Senate.

MINUTES OF PROCEEDINGS

TUESDAY, March 3, 1970.

Pursuant to adjournment and notice the Special Senate Committee on Poverty met this day at 9.00 a.m.

Present: The Honourable Senators: Croll, (Chairman); Carter, Eudes, Fergusson, Fournier, Inman, MacDonald (Queens), McGrand, Pearson and Quart. (10)

In attendance: Mr. Frederick J. Joyce, Director.

The following witnesses were heard:

CANADIAN ASSOCIATION FOR ADULT EDUCATION: Mr. Gower Markle, Chairman, Committee on Adult Basic Education and Poverty; Dr. Alan M. Thomas, Executive Director; Mr. Donald R. MacNeill, Secretary.

THE CATHOLIC WOMEN'S LEAGUE OF CANADA: Mrs. Valentine Fabris, National President; The Most Rev. J. P. Mahoney, D.D., National Director; Mrs. James J. Matthews, National Convener, Social Action, Chairman of the Brief Committee; Miss Veronica Fagan, M.S.W., Member of Brief Committee; Mrs. Ed. Gallagher, Member of Brief Committee.

(Biographical notes concerning these witnesses immediately follow these Minutes.)

In attendance: Miss Mary Dobell, National Convener, Public Relations; Miss Valerie J. Fall, Executive Secretary; Mrs. F. Gaffney, President, Ottawa Diocesan Council; Mrs. G. R. Roussy, Member.

The brief submitted by the Canadian Association for Adult Education and that submitted by The Catholic Women's League of Canada were ordered to be printed as appendices "A" and "B", respectively, to these Minutes.

At 12.30 p.m. the Committee adjourned until Thursday, March 5, 1970, at 9.00 a.m.

ATTEST:

Georges A. Coderre,
Clerk of the Committee.

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Tuesday, March 3, 1970

The Special Senate Committee on Poverty met this day at 9 a.m.

Senator David A. Croll (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, this morning we have with us the Canadian Association for Adult Education. On my immediate right is Mr. Gower Markle, Vice-President, and Director of Education and Welfare, United Steel Workers of America. Then there is Mr. Donald R. MacNeill, Managing Editor, Publications, Canadian Association for Adult Education. In the next seat is Dr. Alan M. Thomas, Executive Director, Canadian Association for Adult Education.

Mr. Markle will make a statement and perhaps his two colleagues will also join in before we get to the question period.

Mr. Gower Markle, Vice-President, Canadian Association for Adult Education: Mr. Chairman and honourable senators, you have already received copies of our brief. Therefore it is our intention to speak very briefly to it and then we will deal with your direct questions and comments about our presentation.

I should say in introduction that in preparing this statement we have tried to dwell on or emphasize those matters which we felt were particularly within our competence and frame of reference. We felt it appropriate to recognize those matters which we felt were a direct connection between education and this condition which we call poverty. We have tried to involve our associates across Canada in the preparation of this document and we have asked all our divisions across the country to comment on the question of poverty as it is understood in their own regions and provinces. We have tried to incorporate all the views we received in this statement; I would point out that there has not been total unanimity in this.

In making our presentation and in drafting our proposals, we have accepted two things; the first is the definition of poverty that the Economic Council of Canada has tabled. We feel that this is a reasonable starting point, but we have made it clear that poverty is much more than merely an economic situation. It involves the whole situation in which the individual or the family finds itself and therefore must be considered and dealt with in terms other than mere economic needs or an economic emphasis. We have also indicated that we accept the categories of poverty established here, the working poor, the disadvantaged and the welfare poor. We think that these are as reasonable as any other definitions one could come up with.

The concerns we have are dealt with in our summary of recommendations, and I would only briefly like to comment on some of these matters. This summary is to be found immediately after page 15 of our brief and is just a summary of the major points we have dealt with throughout the brief. We deal first of all with what we usually call the "work ethic" which is referred to on page 5. We have indicated that the whole system in a technological society is changing, that our concept of work is changing, that the relationship between what we traditionally define as work and leisure is changing—a dynamic relationship—and what it holds for the future we really do not know. But clearly the view that we have traditionally held that people had to work in order to be entitled to support or maintenance is no longer a valid position in total. We also talk about the problem of mature students because we find that we have an increasing number of mature students and the needs of society are requiring people to be students longer. We talk in terms of continuous learning and that there is no terminal point in learning. If people are going to devote so much of their time as students then clearly we feel we have a responsibility to enable them to live in this condition, work as students, and maintain themselves in a reasonable way. We have pointed out that in some countries this is done through salaries for students, direct grants to students, but the point is, we feel, that these students who are working to prepare themselves should not be in a situation of poverty while they are doing this.

We have talked about the problem of communications, and we feel there are national institutions of communications that have an extremely significant and important responsibility to assist the people who are in the category that we designate as "poor," to enable them to understand, to find out, to learn, to continue to improve their understanding and their ability to cope with the facts and realities of life. We are concerned about some of the things happening to the C.B.C. and the National Film Board at present, and we are concerned that some of these changes may not enable them to remain as effective now as they have been in the past. Hopefully, they should improve. We are concerned about the role of these institutions.

With respect to manpower policies, on page 2 of the summary of recommendations, we are concerned with certain rigidities in manpower policies which seem, in our opinion, to discriminate against people who most need assistance from the Department of Manpower. The people who most need upgrading, the people who most need retraining, the people who most need literacy, learning to read and write and the ability to move into a technological society, are the people who, we feel by the rigidities in the manpower situation, are most discriminated against. We have supported the brief of Frontier College that has already been presented before you, and we feel it has emphasized some of these matters we are trying to deal with.

On consumer education, we point out that the complexity of the market place and the situation with which the consumer is faced again require a great deal of understanding, of learning, of competence to make choices, and we feel that the people we designate as the poor are often those who are least competent to make these choices and, therefore, need a special kind of assistance. Again, we point out that our national institutions, such as the mass media, should be focusing on enabling the poor people to make these kinds of choices. We think this applies to everybody, but particularly to the poor or disadvantaged.

The matter of housing has been dealt with over and over again before this committee, but we emphasize it and we feel that extra things have to be done to enable these people to have adequate housing. What is adequate housing in modern Canada? Certainly, that is a changing concept. We are not satisfied now with what we may have been satisfied with 50 years ago, nor should we be. As a society we have to find ways of enabling these people to move into adequate shelter. We point out that there is a close and reciprocal relationship between the kind of situation in which people live and their understanding and assessment of their own position and their own dignity. Whether poverty arises out of the situation, or whether they are in the situation because of their poverty, again is a circle. I do not think it really adds to anything to chase yourself around the circle. The fact is, people are in a certain situation and one of the positive, realistic and concrete things we can do is deal with the facts of their existence, of their living, of their shelter. Clearly, we feel this is something we can move into.

Ladies and gentlemen, I think that very quickly I have covered our major recommendations.

I would only point out that we have in our brief an Appendix B but we have no Appendix A. The reason is that in the original draft we had prepared, we intended to include statements from our Manitoba and Saskatchewan divisions relating to our major presentation, and these would have been Appendix A. However, our Manitoba and Saskatchewan divisions will be making their own presentation to you when you are travelling and, therefore, we have not included them because they wish to appear personally before you.

Mr. Chairman, perhaps my colleagues would care to add to what I have already said.

Mr. Donald R. MacNeill, Managing Editor, Publications, Canadian Association for Adult Education: Honourable senators, I think we have attempted to summarize the philosophy, I suppose, of our brief pretty much in the conclusion. It is based upon the educational premise that learning is a fundamental part of one's total make-up. The opportunities for learning, including basic education or literacy, as Mr. Markle has mentioned, must not be limited. We should never make learning a middle-class function; the learning opportunity should broaden out to everyone. This is summarized in our conclusion, and I think this is the thread that runs through the whole of the brief.

Dr. Alan M. Thomas, Executive Director, Canadian Association for Adult Education: I have one comment, Mr. Chairman. It is that perhaps it is useful to point out that a good deal of the automatic response of both Canadian society and American society has been to re-concentrate our educational resources on children and to assume that we may not be able to do anything for the parents but we may be able to prevent the children from following the cycle of poverty. In our opinion, this sacrifice of one generation to another requires some thinking about, but technically merely maximizing the present educational resources, concentrated, by and large, as they are, in children, does not in fact show much evidence of the power to break the poverty cycle. Although I grant you that the evidence is sparse, it is pretty clear that the situation in which we do seem to be able to make some dent on the breakout from the poverty cycle is when both children and parents are engaged in learning at the same time. If the parents are engaged in developing potential for themselves at the same time as their children are engaged in this kind of process, the likelihood of their moving as a family is much greater than the likelihood of moving the children by concentrating all the resources on them and not providing the same concentration for the parents. I think that is a useful matter to consider.

The Chairman: We will have an opportunity to enlarge on that later.

Senator Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I notice that Mr. Markle is the Director of Education and Welfare of the United Steel Workers and is also a member of the Canada Manpower and Immigration Council.

With your knowledge, Mr. Markle, I would like to put this question to you. It seems to me that basically there are two great divisions in our human relations in this country—and, indeed, in all countries. That is, you have the producer or the manufacturer and the man who is running all the different levels of business in the country. You have the management group, and then the very large union groups. The unions are able to look after their membership by sharing in management planning, and the two groups work together very nicely. This leaves another group that just cannot get in. They are out of luck. There is not enough room for them in the particular area. Unless another business goes into that community there is always going to be a group that is lost.

In western Canada at the present time we can see a crisis arising. The farmers are facing tremendous problems, and in the meantime the young people are being educated at high schools and universities, and there are small towns that the not going to be able to satisfy the basic needs of their children. It seems that there should be some organization there to help these people who belong to the third group, as I call it. Education alone is not going to save them. Many of them cannot go on to become Ph.D's. What is your comment on that?

Mr. Markle: I agree, sir, this is a very serious issue, and we in the labour movement—if I can put on my other hat—are concerned about it. We are concerned to have these people organized so that they can fit under the legislation of our country and the provinces.

By definition, a labour union first must "organize", and then it can "deal with". As you have indicated, there are clearly all sorts of people who are not caught in the net. They are outside the frame of reference. The fact that these people are excluded by definition at the moment is a legislative issue. We cannot come to grips with them.

In the United States, Canada, and Great Britain, approximately 30 per cent of the total work force is in labour unions, but in the Scandanavian countries, for instance, from 85 to 90 per cent of the total work force is in some sort of legitimate organization through which they have some representation, and through which they can achieve some power, and some control over their situation. In Canada 60 per cent are excluded.

The Chairman: No, it is not correct to say they are excluded. They have not joined, but they are not excluded.

Mr. Markle: They are not in it, and some of them are not in it because they have not been organized. However, there is a large number that do not come under the umbrella. So, we have a great deal to do.

The labour movement must do something towards trying to organize these people, but the present situation is such as to make it almost impossible to bring them under the umbrella. Clearly, these people need organizational and institutional assistance. They need an institution through which they can be represented.

Senator Pearson: This is what I was trying to get at.

Mr. Markle: As educationists and as trade unionists, we are very concerned about it, but we have not found a solution.

Senator Pearson: Yes, there is a group there which is not organized, and which has not a strong enough voice in the proposing of legislation.

Mr. Markle: Yes, this is correct. We have not found an answer to this. At one time we were trying to get the unemployed unionized, but this did not work effectively because these people did not want to stay within that category. As soon as they became employed they moved out of the organization.

Dr. Thomas: I just want to comment on the end of Senator Pearson's statement because I think he identified something of real importance, and perhaps this is only implicit in our brief. The kind of education we are supporting is a kind which does not necessarily lead to a Ph.D. We are talking about a non-hierarchical education system which lies in the support of other kinds of skills, abilities, and sensibilities than our exclusive education system supports at the moment.

Senator Pearson: Our education system emphasizes an academic education entirely.

Dr. Thomas: Yes.

Senator Pearson: It is not directed towards enabling a man to earn a living?

Mr. Markle: We emphasize a system that will enable people to get back into the mainstream.

Senator Carter: Mr. Markle, I see that you are also chairman of the C.A.A.E. committee on basic education and poverty. Would you tell us something about what your committee is doing, and what it has done?

Mr. Markle: Yes, sir. This committee has been active for at least five years, and this brief that you have before you is one of its outputs. To appear before you has been one of our concerns. We have conducted investigations and research and seminars upon such things as illiteracy and basic education, and we have been trying to find ways of moving what we call the illiterates or sub-literates into a situation where they are literate and can deal with information and media. We have tried to bring together organizations which have concerns similar to ours in order to have a focal point around which we can do some research and discuss some of these matters. These are the things we have been doing.

Senator Carter: Within the last couple of years officials and everybody else have become aware that even people who are in a poverty group have something to contribute towards the solution of their own problems, and that they should be consulted in the framing of laws. But, from the evidence that has been adduced before us, it appears that the great problem is lack of leadership. I would think that one of the objectives or main functions of your adult education program would be to develop leadership. Can you tell us what you are doing in that respect?

Mr. Markle: I agree, sir, and I think our major thesis is that we have to enable people to achieve the capacity to take charge of their own affairs. This is one of our major concerns. The question of whether leadership can be developed from outside, whether it is imposed from above, or whether it develops naturally from inside a group, is a good question. We think that leadership has all of these aptitudes and characteristics. We have been working with groups right across the country to give people who have an interest in the problem an opportunity to have a better understanding of what is involved, to discuss the concerns that we have, and to find out what they can do in specific terms to improve their situation. It is one thing to talk in vague generalities about the problem of the poor and why they are poor, and what can be done, but it is not enough. We have to start talking in terms of specifics, about the situation in which these people find themselves, and what, in specific terms, we can do to work with them and help them to improve their situation, and to cope better with the realities of a modern technological society.

Therefore, we have been talking in terms of literacy. We have been talking in terms of the realities of living in a technological society, and of the problems of the move from an agriculture and rural dominated economy, to a technology and urban dominated situation. These are the problems that people are facing, and the people who cannot move along with them are the people we are talking about.

Senator Carter: Do you have a rural program?

Mr. Markle: Well, historically we have been working very closely with the agricultural federations and with the farmers' organizations in connection with such things as the Farm Radio Forum and the Citizens' Forum.

Senator Carter: Years ago you had what I thought was a wonderful program called Town Hall.

Mr. Markle: It was Citizens' Forum.

Senator Carter: What has happened to that. It was the kind of program where you people met with those in small communities and discussed problems. In the course of this discussion leadership emerged, someone came to the fore.

Mr. Markle: Yes; we think this is one of the most significant developments that has taken place during our history. However, there have been some changes in the whole situation which have forced us to change the program.

Senator Carter: Can you tell us what happened to it?

Dr. Thomas: Even before the advent of television, participation in the program began to drop. In the late forties and early fifties the group declined in numbers and we did not have the financial resources to maintain field workers to assist neighbourhood and local groups.

Secondly, with the introduction of television there was a shift of audiences away from radio. The forum did not work as well on television as on radio. It would take too long to even speculate as to the reason.

Thirdly, the C.B.C. became interested in a quite different field of public affairs than we. This decline, which commenced in the 1960s, has continued. We have not had the resources to re-establish that network on some other basis than in affiliation with the C.B.C. Discussions are taking place with regard to possibilities of cable television which might enable us to re-introduce the program.

Senator Carter: That is the point I wish to develop. You make a recommendation about the CRTC. Can the program be resurrected in relation to the CRTC?

Mr. Markle: Certainly it can be resurrected. The point we are making is that the mass media, television and radio, should be available throughout the country for the purpose of the upgrading and continuous education we are proposing. These are the pipelines we feel will be going into every home in the country. One of these services should be available. We have the instrumentality for it and we want to make sure that the service is available when the public wishes to take part in it.

Dr. Thomas: The cable television as it is presently operating is a tax on the user. There is a large number of precisely the families we are discussing who simply cannot afford to pay that tax. In some respects this is the most efficient device for the kind of education we are discussing, which is with people in their own homes. Some of these are afraid to go to a public school for meetings, but the medium of television is precluded from them because of its cost. One of our arguments is that we must find a way to include the people who do not find it possible to pay $4, $5 or $6 per month, or establish a public utility to provide it.

Senator Carter: Your programs such as Citizens' Forum were not in the homes, but people came together in groups.

Mr. Markle: It was also in the homes in many cases.

Dr. Thomas: It was largely in the kitchens.

Senator Carter: It was a radio program that was discussed?

Mr. Markle: Yes, all those groups met at homes.

Senator McGrand: Does that include the Farm Forum?

Dr. Thomas: Exactly; they were separate groups, but they operated at about the same time.

Mr. Markle: Relatively few farmers are isolated now. It is much easier for people to meet and travel than it was previously. They move farther and into larger centres for this sort of program. That is why we had the difficulty with cable television referred to by Dr. Thomas. Many of the people about whom we are most concerned do not have the $5 a month for cable television. They are pinched as it is.

Secondly, the emphasis of educational television is on ultra-high frequency which, again, these people will not have the facility to receive.

Senator Fergusson: The people you are endeavouring to reach are the extremely poor, who do not even have ordinary television. How would you suggest the program should be brought to them? I know a great many people have television, but there are the very poor, living in remote places perhaps, and they do not have access to these programs.

Mr. Markle: The technique is to bring people together around a set. If you know people who do not have television, you find ways to provide the set as we do in the schools with children.

Senator Quart: When discussing these citizens' forums you relate them all the time to the C.B.C. What about the private stations? Many of them are happy to have programs, in the morning especially, without any charge on condition that the material is supplied to them.

Mr. MacNeill: Our B.C. division has been experimenting with this in the field of cable television but with a private company. They have developed a series of programs which are broadcast on gratis time as it were. There have been programs produced on such topics as taxation. They are endeavouring to produce a program such as we had in Citizens' Forum that will mean something to people, whether or not they be in the poor brackets of society.

In Nova Scotia one of our divisions has experimented with television sets and receivers in community centres in an effort to restore the whole sense of community life. This involves common discussion of programs and topics that are presented. These are examples of a number of experimental projects which exist and which we hope will have some impact.

Mr. Markle: Television may be beyond the reach of some, but radio is certainly available to almost everyone. We have seen what has happened in the newly developing countries arising out of our experience in Canada with programs such as Farm Forum. We have shared this. There are tremendous programs in India and parts of Africa using our technique. The people have small transistor radio receivers which can be punched out like biscuits nowadays very cheaply.

Senator Carter: Why can videotape not be used if cable television and television is so expensive? Group discussions could be developed by adult field workers.

What is needed is a community program so that people can get together and exchange ideas. This would be the basis of it. Showing these things in the home is all right, but unless people can get together and discuss matters as a group the kind of leadership that is needed will not be developed. People may be informed a little better, but the leadership will be lacking, I would think.

Mr. Markle: I entirely agree. This is certainly one of the things that will have to be done and extended.

Dr. Thomas: One of the problems is that there are not many institutions who will do that. In part what you are talking about is a kind of community development, or "animation sociale" in French-Canada, which is not quite the same thing but is roughly comparable. We need an agency which will sponsor that kind of community work and have the resources to develop videotaping, which is expensive in itself, and the opportunities for using it, which are few and far between.

One of the most exciting applications of this kind in recent years has been the "Challenge for Change" program of the National Film Board, and we are very much concerned that the program is apparently not getting the support, even within the Board, that it should have. The recent austerity that grips us all, including the National Film Board, is eating away at this program rather than at some of the things the Board is doing in which we are less interested. This is an example of the kind of thing you mentioned.

Senator Carter: What about extension work at universities? Surely they have field workers who could go out and initiate programs of this kind. There is a need for developing leadership; we think your educational experience and background should be in the forefront, and we should like to have any suggestions that can be made.

Mr. MacNeill: This is being done by Memorial University in Newfoundland, whose extension department takes the program "Challenge for Change" along the Labrador coast and to some of the outposts of Newfoundland. It is a very exciting but also very expensive proposition. Even now some of the people in the extension department are attempting to get further resources and finances in order to carry it on.

Senator Inman: The National Film Board used to supply films for schools, I understand.

Dr. Thomas: They are now charging for them, which again to a great extent eliminates them from use. The problems are very complicated. It is quite evident that the federal Government supports Canadian education, directly and indirectly, even though it is a provincial responsibility. The National Film Board and the C.B.C. are now engaged in discussing a proposal for the non-broadcast use of C.B.C. material across the country through a large, wealthy educational organization that can afford to pay for films and other kinds of material. Unfortunately, as soon as that sort of thing is done, if there is an educational agency that can afford to pay for the material, it becomes difficult for neighbourhood groups, people meeting in union halls and church basements to get access to the same material. Material which until now they have had free, and which we, as public policy, have wanted them to have free. In considering the availability of educational resources to enable people to help themselves, charging for films by the National Film Board and the proposal to charge commercially for C.B.C. material is something this committee ought to be seriously concerned with.

Mr. Markle: Let me give an example. In my capacity with a labour union I am concerned about making information available to working people across the country. I am continually sending out printed material and films on request. Because of increased postal charges and printing costs, and because we now have to pay additional charges for the sorts of films that formerly were easily accessible to us, we have had to cut back and do only half what we were doing before to help people who need access to this sort of material.

The Chairman: You must be careful with that argument. It cuts both ways.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): I had made a note about consumers' education, but I will leave that point for a while. I will also leave to somebody else the discussion of discrimination in Manpower use. I wish to talk about education, especially vocational education. Most of the briefs we have had seem to have put blame on poor education, lack of education, and so on. In the last ten years, in this country we have spent over $1 billion to build vocational schools in every province. Another $1 billion has been spent on academies. There is countrywide school transportation. Even from the most remote areas the school buses are filled with students going to school; you cannot tell the poor from the rich, they all dress the same way, all eat in the same cafeteria at dinner time and all have the same books. At vocational schools there is training available for all trades at all levels. What did we do wrong? What do we lack? I should like to hear the answers from somebody.

Mr. Markle: Well, how much time have we got? Certainly what has been done is very commendable, and long overdue. There has had to be this tremendous expenditure and emphasis on education because as a country we ignored it for the first 100 years of our history. Formerly it was cheaper for Canada to import brains, competence and talent from other countries rather than to develop our own native people. To that extent our own people were exploited. One has only to look at the people who were unemployed then to realize what was happening. The native Canadian was either unskilled or a professional man. No semi-skilled or skilled workers were native born Canadians; they were imported from Great Britain or the continent of Europe. All of a sudden it was found that our own people were changing, that they were being driven into the ranks of the unemployed. Clearly something had to be done.

Certainly more and more of our young people are availing themselves of educational programs. There are more young people in our educational institutions now than at any point in our history. Also, more adults, people beyond the school leaving age, are going back to educational institutions to upgrade themselves and take part in the educational life, both formally and informally. This is marvelous and this is what we have to do. It is not enough to have institutions and seats for people to sit at. The program must have some relevance to the problems the people face, the kinds of situations that will confront them when they leave the doors of the educational institution and go out into the world. Historically our secondary schools and university institutions have been almost entirely devoted to academic education. All of a sudden during the last 10 or 15 years we have seen the emphasis on technological vocation education. This, again, is focusing a large number of people to the demands of the society and the economy and in my opinion we have made progress.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): It is not that clear to me. I come from New Brunswick. We have a great number of schools, but our industries are limited. We train large numbers of electricians, pipe fitters, carpenters, et cetera, every year and they leave the schools, being certified in their trade and knowing it fairly well. They are not experts by any means, but they have had practical experience learning on the job. They later find out that they are unable to get jobs and must go to the United States. There are many jobs waiting for them in the New England states, Connecticut, New York and Massachusetts. Many of them move to Ontario or Quebec. The few who remain in New Brunswick apply for jobs at the local industries. The company says that they would like to have you, but cannot accept you because you do not belong to the union. The union boss will say that he cannot take you because there are already 25 men in the union. The union does not want him; the company wants him but cannot employ him because he doesn't belong to the union. He cannot belong to the union because there is a waiting list. What is he supposed to do?

Mr. Markle: I agree. I think this is deplorable and several wrongs do not make a right. We are stupid in several ways and compound our folly by being doubly stupid. People are being hurt by a situation because they build up walls to protect themselves, which from their point of view, is justifiable. Again, it is a response to a particular situation and does not remedy the overall situation.

You are speaking about the problems of New Brunswick. Clearly, there are all sorts of problems, as in many places across the country. The economic problem of opportunity and economic activity is not related to the educational system. That relates to the problems of people and what is happening there. If we can find ways to develop the economy of the area, then opportunities will increase. It is then our responsibility to assist the people in order to enable them to fill the needs of the job openings in the industry. The problem that you speak to specifically, about the difficulty of people with training—you said you are training electricians and skilled workers—is one, in which there aren't enough openings for them in the present economy and they have to go somewhere else. You are saying that even the ones who remain cannot get in because of union contracts and agreements that have been negotiated. You have to consider the problem of supply and demand. There are only so many places and if there are 1,000 electricians competing for 100 jobs what is going to happen? The price goes way down and the people who have the skill and training express the opinion that by co-operating and passing on the skill they are cutting their own throats. This has been the hard lesson that many trade unionists have had to face. If you do not protect yourself you are going to be taken advantage of. Unfortunately, we live in this kind of society.

Senator Pearson: In other words, there are too many people.

Mr. Markle: Too few people.

Dr. Thomas: I shall go back to your general comment. It is mystifying when you do hear the kind of arguments you are hearing in face of the unprecedented expenditure in Canada in the last decade. It seems that there are two ways in which societies respond to problems: one is do what they have always done, but harder. The other is to say that maybe there is another way to do it. I think the $2 billion Senator Fournier referred to, has been spent in doing what we always have done, but harder. We have reinforced the conventional educational system and built largely conventional institutions. We have spent enormous amounts of money on universities which still only take up a growing but tiny percentage of the population.

It seems that the single innovation and one which we are desperately fighting for in Canadian education, is the introduction of the College of Applied Arts and Technology in Ontario, the Collège d'Enseignement Général et Professionnel in Quebec and the community college in the west, in Manitoba, British Columbia and Alberta. These are the hopeful signs that we are going to break out of the past and hopefully are going to be able to put together two traditions in Canadian education which have been practically separate for constitutional reasons—traditions of a technical-vocational education and of a liberal education. In the colleges it seems to me that these two kinds of education are coming together and that we are beginning to develop a kind of education which is more relevant to contemporary Canada than what we have been doing up until now.

Another aspect is that it may be the high investment in education that will, in fact, prevent some of the present children—the people who have been children during the last 20 years—from encountering the same fate which befell some of their parents. There are distressing signs that we may still not be handling that, because the rate of unemployment amongst the young is very high.

One of the really difficult problems is that we have a much higher rate in the 18- to 15-year old bracket than we should have. Even though the rich and the poor eat in the same cafeterias, the fact is that the poor drop out much earlier than the rich do. They leave school and leave in the company of people who are also drop-outs. This is part of our proposal for doing something different, which is devoted to solving not just the problems of poverty but other problems in the system that is éducation permanente or continuing education which allows a person not to make a mistake once in his life and not be able to get back into the educational system. We are just beginning to develop a system in which you may leave when it seems sensible for you and re-enter without prejudice when it is logical and sensible. Such a system has to be developed on a very large scale, privately, because the whole industrial system of retraining, of management and development within the industry is considerably larger on a North American basis than all the education of all the children in a public educational system that awards the people who have already succeeded in the formal systems. It tends to be discriminative, which is perhaps a harsher word than I mean to use. It does tend to maximize the success of those who have already succeeded. It also tends to increase the failure of those who have already failed because they never get a chance to start again. The Manpower program is trying to let those who have failed, try again and for the level for which it is planned, it has succeeded very well. For the bottom group it does not succeed well at all because this hangs on other kinds of problems than those of the development.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): I do not disagree with you all the way.

Dr. Thomas: Which way, sir?

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): It is a point of argument. Supposing you are starting with a new generation, I think your philosophy is all right, but we have to live with a generation, a group of people, who have Grade 4, 5, 6. That is their level, and they are living with it. They are heads of families. They are the poor people.

Dr. Thomas: Agreed.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): In the case of the man with Grade 4 or Grade 5, there is no use in trying to get him to go to school to get a BA. Let us forget that. We have to find a job for him through some system, and we have to recognize him as he is, with his ability.

Dr. Thomas: Right.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): We have to take his possibility to earn his living, with his family. Supposing that man goes to school and wants to become a mason. There are lots of opportunities for bricklayers. We have not got any. We have no one who can make a chimney properly. We need these men. Yet when he goes to school, if he has not got Grade 12, he cannot take the course.

Dr. Thomas: Then we agree all the way, I agree entirely with that.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): He is given one year to get academic training, he goes in at Grade 5 and they try to bring him up to Grade 12 in twelve months. But he gets up in the middle of it and leaves and goes back to his previous occupation.

The Chairman: I am trying to follow both of you. Let me understand what the senator is getting at.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): I had not finished yet. I was getting there.

The Chairman: I would like to get it precisely. Instead of talking generalities, I would like you to use a rationale—you are an educationist—for the statement that a truck driver who has been driving for 15 years and is out of a job, and goes for retraining and finds he has not sufficient education, is refused training. Justify that. If this man has been brought up at that level, he has lived and has been working as a truck driver, it is suggested he should do better and he has not the formal education, he is below grade. Give me the rationale on that position, for a few minutes?

Dr. Thomas: Do I have to?

The Chairman: Well...

Dr. Thomas: I am sorry. I wanted to make sure you do not think I believe that.

Mr. MacNeill: Is it correct that he is refused training? I am not sure.

The Chairman: A dozen times one hears that. They are encouraged to take the opportunity and when they go they find they have not a sufficient level of education and will not be accepted. They have eased up a little on that, because this committee got after them some time ago.

Dr. Thomas: I think the only way of defending that statement is this. We say that the major opportunities for that truck driver lie within the Manpower program. That is, if the truck driver goes to some public school system—not all, but some—and if he could support himself and his family for the length of time it takes him to obtain a new and more complex skill, if he can pay for his family—which is not likely—then he should not be refused in some school system because there are resources there.

But I think what you are talking about is the specific piece of legislation, which is not educational legislation but employment legislation. Therefore, the basis on which that man is chosen or not chosen often has nothing to do with his particular state, it has to do with whether there is employment for the things he has to do. He has to do that within the limits of the legislation, and is allowed 12 months for basic education—with some extension, sometimes—before he can take vocational training. If they do not think that he can get to the point where he can take that vocational training, then the legislation makes them turn him away. I think the legislation is wrong.

But if in fact you are talking about a specific piece of legislation directed towards providing for the employment of the people, then they have to work within the legislative terms that they have. I happen to think that the Manpower program was an enormous step forward beyond the milk and water public assistance way we had previously. The notion that we would pay someone to stay at school was an enormous step forward for this society to make, because it was not a conceivable notion. But it is listened to now. It is a restrictive act.

The Chairman: You are an expert on the act. What is the justification for the condition that he must have been in the labour force for three years before he can be taken in for training?

Dr. Thomas: It is simply a federal-provincial quarrel. It is a matter of fact that the federal Government said this.

If the federal Government said they would pay within the limits for people within Grade 9 and Grade 10, then what is going to happen is that you get to the point where two-thirds of the kids who are in Grade 9 and Grade 10 are going to leave the public school system and go into the training program and be paid.

Mr. Markle: In Manitoba they were doing this, before they changed.

Dr. Thomas: There would be a wholesale shift of the later sections of the secondary schools into the federal program which pays these living allowances.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): I have one more question, and I want to take a little crack at the union before I finish. Under a different committee, we were in Montreal—I think you were there, Mr. Chairman—and I asked a question on education. A barber was representing the union in Montreal. I questioned the necessity of Grade 12 education in order to become a barber. The man said: "We do not ask for it, our unions have asked us to do that." Now, where do we draw the line?

Mr. Markle: As I said earlier, it is clear one is living in a competitive position. It is this kind of economic situation we live in. People have been forced to make all sorts of regulations, to protect their own interests, to protect themselves.

Therefore, in order to maintain the position and the security of the people who are in that particular trade or profession—lawyers do it, doctors do it, professional engineers do it—it is done not only by trade unions. If you want to examine some of the restrictive regulations as to who enters the profession or the operation, you could examine some of those.

We have learned the lesson extremely well from the people who taught it to us. In order to protect ourselves, in the kind of jungle we are living in, the trade unions are forced to negotiate this kind of provision. I am not saying it is the best position but I am saying that it is a fact of life. If one can work out something better, I am all for that.

The Chairman: It is the "Ph.D. of barberism."

Senator McGrand: You mention in your brief:

Rural and Urban Projects: From its inception the Association was aware of the need for rural education.

I do not know whether you are referring to those things we mentioned today, where you pressurize governments about different practices to produce a different type of education for rural people to lead them to urbanization. I would like you to comment on that. Did it live up to your expectations? Did education enable a person to make the most of his environment—not to change his environment, as much as to make the most of what he finds in his environment. Did this sort of thing develop good leadership in the community, that Senator Carter mentioned? I would like your comment on that?

Mr. Markle: Yes, sir, I would say that we have done all of these things. We have done the traditional things we indicated before. We have tried to work with local organizations to help them develop their own potential and their own people and, hopefully, their own leadership.

With respect to the problem of coming to grips with environment, clearly the history of humanity indicates that mankind has been unique in its skill to adapt the environment to itself. Therefore, there are two things we have to do: one is to live with our environment, learning to adapt to environmental changes, and the other is to use those changes to our own advantage. This is what we have tried to do in terms of the movement from rural to urban environment. The facts are on the table. Clearly it used to be 90 per cent rural and 10 per cent urban, but it is the other way round now, with 90 per cent urban and 10 per cent rural.

For youngsters growing up on the farm now, like it or not, the indication is that with respect to their future only a minority of them will stay on the farm. Therefore, youngsters going to school in rural areas must be prepared for the possibility and probability that they are going to live their adulthood and earn their living in an urban situation and in industry. Therefore, rural schools have this problem.

Senator McGrand: Yes, in certain places and in certain environments.

Just returning to the problem of drop-outs for a moment, obviously something has seriously gone wrong with this program. Perhaps it is too new a program. We live and learn by experiences, however, and perhaps you feel that this program will in the future be able to eliminate some of the inadequacies that it has at the present time. Do you feel that way about it?

Dr. Thomas: I am afraid I don't, senator. I am not sure that anything has gone wrong with the program except in respect of our expectation of what it would do. I have a feeling that we expected too much, because we did not read the act carefully. We expected it to do a lot of things it was never capable of doing in the first place. The program set out to solve a particular problem and it was not done badly in solving that problem, which was to take a whole group of marginal people who had lost the conventional skills and retrain them within a short period of time. It has done that with remarkable success.

It seems to me that perhaps the program, rather than being too new, is too old, owing to the rate of change we are undergoing at present, and that it is necessary to look at another piece of legislation to deal with the people who cannot be dealt with within 24 months or less. We need to deal with people so far down in terms literacy that they cannot possibly cope with even minor kinds of jobs in society. So we must determine whether such people will ever work again and we must find some way for them to live with dignity and humanity without a job or we must spend much more time and effort in training them than the present legislation allows for.

The Chairman: Which of those two courses do you think is better for the individual and for the country, generally? And which can we do better?

Dr. Thomas: My response to that, Mr. Chairman, has to be that when an individual learns something, the community benefits; and that is where I would put my weight. Perhaps I bring a particular ideology to this, because I believe that learning is a good thing and that when individuals develop themselves and achieve the kinds of release of potential and energy that learning allows them, it is good for society. And you can see this release of potential in any adult school where the students have really been reached. That release of personality, energy and commitment is almost unbelievable.

The Chairman: The committee shares that view, but I thought you were talking of people beyond learning. Perhaps I misunderstood you.

Dr. Thomas: I probably was not clear. I should have said that there was an alternative, which was to decide that there are certain people who are not going to learn very much in terms of occupational training, and for them we simply have to provide support so that they can live according to some reasonably dignified standard. Perhaps, federally, that is one of the things we have to do, assuming that they will still have access to provincially-supported educational systems so that they can learn the things they want to learn, which may not have any occupational basis. But I don't think there is anyone who cannot learn something of value to himself and the country. In saying that, I realize we live in an economy of scarcity and cannot simply provide resources for everything. Nevertheless, we can balance things better than we are doing now. We could provide access to learning so that some levels of the population could use at their own rate the facilities of learning which they don't have access to at the moment.

Mr. Markle: If I may add a word, this has a great deal to do with dignity, self-respect and the individual's concept of himself. Many of these people are locked into a situation in which they feel hopeless, with no place to go and no possibility of finding a place to go. They feel doomed. But once they get a vision that it is possible for them to achieve something and to remove themselves from this circle in which they have been trapped, then they can do so.

I am convinced that we must do anything we can to assist a person to become more capable of coping with the situation he finds himself in, to become more employable and to develop his talents. I support what Dr. Thomas has said right down the line.

Senator McGrand: You mentioned some time ago that 30 per cent of the people here were organized. In Scandinavia it is as high as 85 per cent. But that 85 per cent does not mean merely organized work between management and labour. It also involves the development of co-co-operatives. Is that right?

Mr. Markle: It means that in respect 85 per cent of the people in the work force, when they come under the world of work there is an organization that is established and accepted by the society, that has status and respect, and into which they automatically find their way and which then acts on their behalf, represents them, protects their interests and provides services for them.

Senator McGrand: It goes a little farther than that. In Scandinavia they have been able to train the person to live in his environment. One hundred years ago the Swedes were leaving their homeland by the thousands. One million of them landed out in the mid-west, mostly around Minnesota. They are not doing that today, however, because they have been able to adjust a person to his environment. And out of that has come the co-co-operative.

Mr. Markle: But they did not adjust people to learn to tolerate the economic environment of 100 years ago. They have based and developed their economy so that now there is progress and opportunity for people who stay in Scandinavia.

The Chairman: But what he is saying is that 88 per cent of the people of Scandinavia are organized and in labour unions and as such can protect themselves we in this country are only 30 per cent organized.

Mr. Markle: The major reason for the difference is that in the Scandinavian countries the people of the country established legislation and laid down the rules of the economic game. These rules gave status, respect and legitimacy to labour organizations and co-operatives so that these were acceptable and important institutions. In North America and in Great Britain, on the other hand, the whole trend of history has been in the opposite direction. There has been opposition to working class and working people's institutions, whether farmers co-operatives or unions, and every gain that the working people in this country have made, they have had to fight for all the way from the ground up. There has been no general consensus of acceptance.

Senator McGrand: Senator Fournier referred to vocational skills and the fact that New Brunswick turned out carpenters, electricians and plumbers but there are no jobs for them. Then they have to go elsewhere to seek employment. But we have not given much attention to training people in New Brunswick to make the most of their local environment. Yet we have the same potential down there as they have in Scandinavia. That is the point.

Mr. Markle: I agree the potential is there, but certainly as a nation we have not headed into the economic problem of how to develop the economy of that area to make it viable and so that people can afford to live there.

I would like to put forward another point; talking about the problems of training people in trades and skills and finding that there are no jobs for them, it is a fact of life that it takes 20 or 25 years for a human being to mature. In educational terms this means that you had to start ten years ago to prepare people for the labour market of today. One of the difficulties here is that our Manpower people are supposed to be giving the lead to educational institutions, telling them where the demand lies and how the economy is developing and where the opportunities are, but clearly Manpower does not have access to that information. This is a difficulty that arises because of the difference between federal and provincial jurisdictions and Manpower is largely ignored. Every province has developed and encouraged all kinds of private entrepreneurs who are in the market for the selling of jobs and employment, and the majority of people in industry, when they want certain kinds of people, ignore Manpower and go to these private employment offices.

The Chairman: Let us not get off on that tangent. What you are talking about now is managerial placement services.

Mr. Markle: If you look in the papers you will see the use being made of these services. Manpower does not have the information.

The Chairman: But we are not talking about the same thing. We are talking about specially skilled people who are available in certain locations.

Mr. Markle: We are talking about the opportunities available in the economy and what the trends are and the fact that the educational people need a ten-year lead into what is happening and what is developing in the economy. But this in turn is being largely defeated by the way we are handling the situation.

Senator Pearson: Are our educationists far enough ahead to be able to carry it through if the legislation were available?

Mr. Markle: They are operating in the dark.

Dr. Thomas: This information is hard to get. The federal Government is slowly developing skills in getting the information but it is not easy to get. It is one thing to look at the abstract figures of jobs available but another to deal with the training of a man over a period of time. Every country in the world has difficulty in bringing these two aspects together.

Reference has been made to Scandinavia, and I think it should be pointed out that all three Scandinavian countries have had the most elaborate adult education system. The Danish Folk High Schools which have been copied in Norway, Sweden and Northern Germany have been training people to adjust to the economic situations. This is something that cannot be done based on the education of children in schools. It cannot work because the country cannot wait for the child to grow up.

Senator Inman: On pages 3 and 4 of your brief you refer to "signs of greater flexibility in approaches toward learning". You also say "more educators must move out of their institutions and into home-centred learning situations" and so forth. Now my question is this:

how could it be successfully arranged for these organizations to be more flexible, or to be flexible enough to assist persons in learning the skills and trades necessary?

Mr. Markle: Well, as one example, I would mention that we in the labour unions are at all times concerned about working with adults and enabling them to function intelligently and responsibly in a democratic situation. Whether you are training somebody to be chairman of a labour union or chairman of a tenants' organization, the skill is still the same. We are co-operating with other institutions in doing this, and there is no reason why community colleges and other adult education institutions could not follow suit and do the same thing.

Senator Inman: You also mention the operating of a mobile classroom.

Mr. Markle: Yes, and one way is to take the program out to the people through our mobile resources. Another way it could certainly be done is by the use of radio and television.

Dr. Thomas: Senator, the real problem is that with one or two exceptions there are almost no agencies in this country, adult or otherwise, which take the education of adults as a primary responsibility.

Senator Inman: But is it a success when they do it? I am interested in this because they started something of this nature in my own province.

Dr. Thomas: Well, I suggest there is a good deal of evidence that adults can and do learn skills that are relevant to the pursuit of their own lives. One of the examples of success in this field is what happened in 1939 when a great number of people were taken and taught all kinds of skills for the purpose of pursuing a war, and these were skills they never expected to learn. They pursued the war successfully, depending upon your measurement. We also have evidence from southern and western Canada where we took people from countries whose systems of agriculture were totally irrelevant to the kind of agriculture they faced on the prairies. They farm it, so it is successful, and this country, more than most, is one of the examples of being successful, always outside the formal educational system, and with a few notable exceptions like the Banff School, St. Francis Xavier, the University of Alberta Extension Department which, in many respects, were pioneering.

Senator Inman: A number of groups have told the committee that implementation of a guaranteed annual income alone is not enough, that other support services are required in the social service field. What are the essential educational services which would be part of any reorganization of social services?

Mr. Markle: We have indicated that the problem of assisting people to move and helping them to develop themselves so they can function more acceptably and competently in the kind of world we have is partly an economic issue. We have to enable them to cope with economic realities in the world of today. In addition, these are all sorts of problems and issues relating to their understanding of themselves, their self respect, dignity, the feeling, "This is possible for me. I do not have to live and endure this for the rest of my life"; then their ability to cope in terms of health, in terms of access to general health and welfare services of the community.

Many people of the kind we are talking about are quite ignorant of what resources in the community are available to them, and once they find out what is available they do not know how to get it. So, clearly, an understanding of how to attain these things is part of the process we are talking about.

Senator Fergusson: As part of the education you are giving these people?

Mr. Markle: Yes.

Senator Fergusson: This is not formal education?

Mr. Markle: No, functional.

Dr. Thomas: There are two areas. It has taken 20 years to get the first educational television station. That station does nothing but provide educational material. That is too long. We have been technically able to do it for longer than 20 years, but we just have not done it. We need an institution of instruction which provides access for people at any time in their life to accomplish an educational task, and not always at public expense. There are many kinds of education that individuals can and will pay for if they can find where to obtain it, but they do not very often.

Secondly, we need a lot of material, "software," if you like, of continuing education available for use on television and radio and in various kinds of programs. We cited the example of Mrs. McDonald in Vancouver, and Mrs. McDonald is doing the counselling.

Senator Fergusson: Yes, we met her in Vancouver.

Dr. Thomas: You have met her, so you know what she is doing. That is a simple kind of educational resource which, by and large is not available to most people in society. That establishes a degree of self confidence to enable you to tackle many educational institutions which, for many people, look kind of frightening.

Senator Fergusson: I was tremendously impressed and I thought that if that could be extended all over Canada it would make a tremendous difference.

Senator Inman: On page 9 you speak of adult basic education, and I will not repeat the whole paragraph, but you do say:

Many of the sub-literates are to be found in rural, non-farm areas and include significant groups of Indian, Metis and Eskimo people, with problems peculiar to their respective ways of life.

I was wondering, would not the white people have better opportunities of education today than they did years ago? Children stay in school longer.

Dr. Thomas: Yes, they do; there is no question about it. However, we have not yet solved the problem of keeping a number of them at school long enough to enable them to make the jump into a successful occupational life. This goes back to Senator Fournier's question.

Senator Inman: I happened to read yesterday about a girl who applied for a job in a cafeteria where she would be handling sandwiches, and they asked her if she had a B.A.

Dr. Thomas: That is an interesting comment on the B.A.!

Senator Inman: She thought she should not need a B.A. to dispense sandwiches.

Mr. Markle: On the point of enabling our native population to move in and achieve for themselves whatever their own expectations are and to live as they would like to live, a few years ago I was in India and visited a place on the docks at Calcutta where the dockworkers were completely illiterate. Through their union they were being taught not only how to function as trade unionists and skills, but also literacy, to read and write. These were adults and they were using all sorts of techniques. They had maps on the wall and they cut pictures out of newspapers and somebody could talk about the picture and relate it back to what was said under the picture. One thing they pointed out is that in India, where many people are completely illiterate and have no competence at their present state of development but want to be competent to operate, this whole problem of the development of the individual to function in modern society is like considering the individual as a balloon and you have to inflate him in all directions equally. If you push him too far in one direction, out of proportion, he becomes incompetent and lopsided. It has to be steady growth in all directions, and if too much emphasis is placed on economics or the political situation or on literacy, then clearly you thrust him out of balance. This is one of the basic problems we have. We have to push at the same time with equal force in all directions to enable these people to grow at an equal rate.

Senator Pearson: Is this training in India on the job?

Mr. Markle: It takes place right on the docks, but the employer is not involved in it.

Senator Pearson: During the time they are employed?

Mr. Markle: No, after.

Senator Fergusson: Some of the questions I had in mind had been asked, so I have not too many left. I wonder if something might be told us about this study leave for workers dealt with in Appendix B. I would like to know how this works out economically. Is it an advantage to the employer, or does the employer subsidize this?

Mr. Markle: The employer certainly shares, but this is a matter of law. This is part of the cost of operation. In the first place, the employer provides an opportunity for the continuous learning or continuous development of his employees as part of the regular remuneration of the employees. This is part of the regular wage structure. Certainly the employer also benefits by the increased competence and understanding of his employees, and this is plowed back into the competence of the whole structure.

Senator Fergusson: I think it is an excellent idea, but before it is implemented you will find there is a great deal of opposition.

Mr. Markle: In Canada at the present time we have a modification of this working in some places where we have programs that are developed co-operatively between Manpower and the employer and, for example, the labour unions. If the program is going to take two hours a day you will find that the hour from 4 o'clock to 5 o'clock is subsidized by the employer's giving leave to the worker, and the hour from 5 o'clock to 6 o'clock is given by the worker who will stay on at his own expense.

The Chairman: Senator Fergusson, Appendix B is an old friend. These people are persistent, because this is what they presented to the Special Committee on Aging. We endorsed it, but we got results, and here they are again.

Dr. Thomas: I assure you, Mr. Chairman, that we cut a new stencil for it!

The Chairman: We believed in it then, I think we believe in it now.

Senator Fergusson: I know time is getting on, but I do have one other point. On page 10 you urge that there be a team approach to poverty problems, including attempts to assist adult as well as child learning. I agree with this, and I would like to know what proportion of the women take advantage of adult education. There is the old saying that when you educate a man you educate an individual, but when you educate a woman you educate a family. I wonder if it has ever occurred to you that by educating women you might accomplish more.

Mr. Markle: Indeed, we have, and this is done in many places. In Metropolitan Toronto, for example, for the New Canadian populations there, the education system, while taking care of the children in the school structure, is aiming its efforts by the use of radio at the women in the homes. There are also special occasions when the whole family attends the school. The whole idea is not to take the children too far ahead of their parents, because if you do you get into all sorts of difficulties. Therefore, the parents have to be brought along with the children.

Senator Fergusson: Earlier in your presentation some reference was made to the school leaving age. I think Dr. Thomas said it was not as important as it was thought to be.

Dr. Thomas: The reasons for it are different. In Toronto, for example, there is now considerable conflict over the enforcement of the school leaving age at 16 when it is apparent that there are kids who are simply not going to learn very much by being kept at school, and where they can be found jobs in which they can relate more satisfactorily to their families, the economy, and everything else. It just emphasizes the custodial function of the school, and not the educational function.

When the family allowance was extended our argument was that the money should have been given to the kids and not to the parents. It was the kids who were at school, and the parents could negotiate with the kids as to how much they would pay out of the baby bonus. It just added up to another way of inducing the 17 and 18 year olds to remain at school.

So, I would argue that mere tenure in a school system is not an educational solution. It is not at all. We must also look at the fact that children today are maturing earlier than they used to, and we must also look at the state of the economy, and how easy it will be for these children to get back into the system. It would be better if we could relax the custodial aspect of the school system today, and make it easy for these children to return to school when they see the need to do so.

Senator Quart: Dr. Thomas was the one who mentioned the fact that many applicants for employment prefer to go to private agencies rather than to Manpower.

Dr. Thomas: It was Mr. Markle who said that, but it is true.

Senator Quart: I thoroughly agree with it, and the reason for it may be that they are frustrated when they go to Manpower which seems to require that they be a Ph.D. in order to be a houseman, or something like that.

On page 10 you say that the working poor will be among the first and most hard-hit groups affected by the federal Government's present anti-inflationary policies.

Mr. Markle: I think this is very important, and the increase in unemployment is an example of what we are talking about. Nobody can speak in favour of inflation, but the point we are making is that the choice as between inflation and unemployment is not a realistic choice. Clearly, it does not solve the dilemma we are in. The people who are first affected are the people with the least skill, the people who are least needed in a particular enterprise, the people with the least education, and the people whom we group under the word "poor". They are the first to feel the weight of these policies. Look at what has happened to the unemployment rolls. We say that this is a further injustice.

In the kind of society in which we live we have affluence, and we have a great deal of wealth and many things to enjoy and share. We also have pain and difficulty, and adjustment and change always mean difficulty for somebody. What we are proposing is that there be ways devised for the more equitable sharing of the affluence or the benefits of our society so that there are not the pockets of poverty and misery that we have at present. We are also proposing that the pains of adjustment be shared a little more equitably throughout the whole system. As things are now certain sections of the community have more than their fair share of the affluence, and other sections have more than their fair share of poverty and difficulty of adjustment. Hopefully we can find a way of remedying this.

The Chairman: The answer to the question asked by Senator Quart is vital. This committee is concerned and dismayed about what has been happening recently, since we are charged with looking into the problems of the poor of this country. When we realize that the poor feel inflation first, it becomes an even greater responsibility for us to make sure that they receive special attention. The country owes them a special responsibility, which is part of our task and duty to see that it is brought very forcibly to the attention of the public. We have received a very good brief and had an excellent discussion, which has been useful. We have covered much territory. We expected a progressive, realistic brief from your organization because you are versed in and put so much emphasis on education. We in the committee feel very keenly that that is one of the ways out of the poverty house. We shall, of course, examine the brief very carefully and make recommendations within its scope, keeping in mind what you have said this morning. On behalf of the committee I thank you.

Mr. Markle: Thank you, sir; it has been most gratifying. We are very pleased to have had this opportunity to appear before the committee.

The Chairman: You mean you are not so skeptical as others.

Mr. Markle: Maybe a little more so, sir.

The Chairman: We have a brief from The Catholic Women's League of Canada. On my right is Mrs. Valentine Fabris, the National President, from Winnipeg, Manitoba. Mrs. Fabris will introduce her colleagues.

Mrs. Valentine Fabris (National President, the Catholic Women's League of Canada): Mr. Chairman and honourable senators: it is my privilege as national president of the Catholic Women's League of Canada to open the presentation of our submission to the Special Senate Committee on Poverty. However, before I do so I will introduce to you the members of our delegation. To my immediate right is Mrs. James M. Matthews, of Toronto, who is our National Convener of Social Action and was responsible for the preparation of our submission. Next to Mrs. Matthews is our National Director, Bishop James P. Mahoney, the Bishop of Saskatoon. Next is Miss Veronica Fagan, Master of Social Work, Toronto, who is a member of our Brief Committee. Next to Miss Fagan is Mrs. Ed Gallagher, of Douglas, Ontario, who is Past President of our Pembroke Diocesan Council and a Member of our Brief Committee.

Our organization was incorporated by federal charter on December 12, 1923, and consists of approximately 135,000 members across the country.

Among its objects, the League seeks to promote true ideals of Christian womanhood in home and family life, and recognizes the human dignity of all people everywhere.

The intention of the National Executive to submit this brief was well publicized to the entire membership, who were requested to let those responsible for the preparation of the brief have the benefit of their thinking, and this submission is representative of their collective opinion.

At the outset we set forth the definition of poverty upon which the brief is based.

In the encyclical Pacem in Terris of His Holiness Pope John XXIII, we read:

We see that every man has the right to life, to bodily integrity and to the means which are necessary and suitable for the proper development of life. These are primarily food, clothing, shelter, rest, medical care and finally the necessary social services. Therefore a human being also has the right to security in cases of sickness, inability to work, widowhood, old age, unemployment or in any other case in which he is deprived of the means of assistance through no fault of his own

It is our submission that when these rights are withheld poverty exists.

Information has been received from our members across the Dominion pointing out the regional differences and variations in poverty, referring to the lack of industrial development in the Maritimes, the glut of wheat in the Prairies, abandoned farms with dilapidated empty houses throughout many parts of rural Canada, and the poverty generated in the slum ghettos of large cities, which is often inherited by one generation from another. We submit that provision of more economic assistance is not the solution to these conditions, but rather that intensive study of the underlying causes should be undertaken.

Numerous were the comments of our members concerning the conditions under which Indians and Eskimos live. Of interest is the fact that these comments came often from those living far removed from centres of high indigenous population.

As Mrs. Matthews was responsible for the preparation of this brief, I shall now ask her to summarize our submissions and recommendations. In closing my remarks may I take this opportunity to express to the committee the appreciation of my organization for the opportunity of presenting the views of our members on the problems of poverty as we see them.

Thank you very much.

Mrs. James J. Matthews, National Convener, Social Action, the Catholic Women's League of Canada: Mr. Chairman, honourable senators, the scope of our brief: since the topic of poverty is of such broad scope, it is our intention to limit our presentation to measures to assist women who are heads of families, whether deserted, divorced, separated, widowed, or unmarried mothers, living in Canada under conditions which fall within the outlined definitions of poverty. We submit that frequently some aspect of poverty is the root cause of the original family breakdown.

In attempting to research this particular subject, it was found that material available was fragmented and only in publications dealing generally with the single parent family. It would appear that a fuller knowledge and understanding of the problems facing women as heads of families is needed, and concrete steps taken to solve them. This cannot be provided within the ability of an organization of volunteers such as ours, nor within the scope of this brief.

At the outset we therefore recommend that a Government-sponsored in-depth study be undertaken on "Problems of Women Heads of Families" to discover the underlying causes of family breakdowns and means of providing assistance to the mothers of such families.

Effects on Children

It is our submission that the family, defined as "a stable union of man and woman together with their child or children" is the basic unit of Canadian society, and when this stability is threatened, its effects can be disastrous to this and future generations.

The fact that the family is the most common economic unit in our society is often forgotten, and the importance to society of the family's economic viability is frequently not fully realized. . If the potential abilities of members of the family remain undeveloped and unused, the family members may not only become virtual nonparticipants in the nation's social and economic life, but also a continuing burden on the society.

In our submission we quoted at length the personal story of a mother on welfare, and while we recognize that the details vary from province to province, it was felt that this experience demonstrated the fundamental effects on the children and the risk of perpetuating the welfare cycle. We submit that continuation of poverty in a country as wealthy as Canada, with its long-term effects, is expensive in the long view, and Canadians have a moral obligation to future generations.

While recognizing that provision of welfare does not solve the problem, we nevertheless recommend that benefit coverage should be extended in all provinces to include items essential to an adequate standard of living, related to the cost of living in the province.

Young people from poverty-welfare environment often suffer emotional distresses and as much as $35.00-$41.00 per day is being paid in some provinces to institutions for the care of emotionally disturbed youngsters, often from welfare families. We therefore recommend a greater development and collaboration of community services involving public welfare departments, schools, hospitals and the Canadian Mental Health Association in the promotion of an increasing number of group therapy facilities to establish a total health service.

A weekly outing, with a man or senior student who would act as a substitute father is vital to the child whose male image is negative. We therefore recommend that whatever assistance is necessary be given to organizations such as the Big Brother Movement to provide this very essential service.

Indians and Eskimos

We submit that basically the poverty that affects the Indian and Eskimo woman is no different from that which affects women of other ethnic groups in Canada. It is inherent in our position that all people have the same basic needs. We understand that the loneliness, depression and despair that so often are the companions of women who are suffering from unfulfilled needs—material, spiritual or emotional—are the same for Indian, Eskimo or white.

However, because at least 81 per cent of the indigenous population share the stresses of poverty, the problem is compounded in that it is very difficult for a native woman to see a way out of her position, or even to find another native individual living in the depressed area who has accomplished some improvement in her standard of living and sets an example by showing what can be done. Added to the basic problems of poverty are the grave injustices which have been and are still being done to all native people by the systematic undermining and belittling of their cultural history, their customs and languages.

The following are some specific recommendations for changing the situation in which the indigenous woman in Canada finds herself today. It must be emphasized that all of these recommendations are considered urgent and should be carried out without imposing the standards of the white man and in consultation with the people involved—both the native woman and the institutions.

(1) While material help is necessary and important, it is submitted that more emphasis is needed in individual counselling of women heads of families and their children, and that this personal service should be the main part of the program;

(2) More possibilities for education and job training for women heads of families while receiving assistance with fees and living costs, and the establishment of convenient day care and/or homemaking services;

(3) Motivation provided by the Indian Affairs Branch towards the involvement in various community activities to encourage contact with other people, such as workshops providing self-help for women in caretaker systems.

The members of our committee charged with obtaining information on poverty among the indigenous families headed by a woman alone have compiled many examples which illustrate not only this situation but also the difficulties of the native poor generally, and in some instances the plight of poverty-stricken families whether Indian, Eskimo or white. We felt that these cases might be of interest to your committee and included them as an addendum to the Brief itself.

Unmarried Mothers

There is a need for growing reality of specific vulnerable groups as poverty-risks. There is some evidence that more unmarried mothers are retaining their children. While this acknowledgment of her responsibility may be a desirable trend, it does require corresponding acceptance by the community of the necessity to meet the special needs of these one-parent families.

We recommend that maternity benefits, including hospital care, be provided under the Medicare Plan in those provinces where these benefits are not now covered.

Desertion and Maintenance of Families

One topic which was suggested frequently by our members for inclusion in this brief was that of the deserting father. Another was the difficulty of enforcing judgments when the deserting father moves from one province to another.

It is submitted that the federal Government authorities should investigate more closely the problem, where the man leaves his family and creates a financial burden for his wife and/or the community. Consideration should be given to laws on a federal basis which would allow these fathers to be traced either through their income tax returns or through their Social Security numbers.

It is recommended that within the Department of Justice a branch be established to which any court in the land which orders support for a mother and family, whether through separation, divorce or desertion, would submit the name and Social Security number of the father, along with the amount of monthly payments and the location of the family concerned. This would allow the deserting father to be traced and appropriate collection proceedings taken.

It is further recommended that the law be amended to make it mandatory that irresponsible fathers who desert their families be forced to contribute to the support of this family until all children are of age to support themselves, and, as a deterrent to establishing a second family, legally or illegally, the first family should supersede any other families.

Court enforcement procedures employed as a qualification for welfare places the onus of proving need on the mother, already physically and emotionally burdened. It is submitted that this requirement should be relaxed.

It is also submitted that some consideration be given to families who are attempting to become established financially after difficult years, and it is therefore recommended that a study be made of the possibility of income taxes being pro-rated over a five to ten year period. While this has a general application, it would be of particular benefit to the deserted woman struggling to raise her family.

Day Care Centres

The need for day care service by mothers who must work and those who require retraining prior to work is so obvious that it will probably be included in every brief presented to this committee. The demand for the service is so consistent that provision of an extensive day care centre service is considered to be one of the most urgent requests of our organization.

With the aid now being offered by the Canada Assistance Act, it is recommended that municipalities be encouraged to set up day care centres, and those which already have them be encouraged to increase the number. Industries might provide nursery accommodation for small children whose mothers work in their factories, and indeed it is possible that many of the mothers concerned could be given training and find employment in the care of these children, whether in home or in established centres.

General Welfare Assistance

Untrained women heads of families are every day finding it more and more difficult to cope with the high cost of living especially if they are solely subsidized by the government. To remedy some of the multi-problems confronting women heads of families, it is imperative that existing government benefits be updated to meet present day needs.

We submit that the recipient of such benefits should be given every incentive to work and not be penalized if she seeks employment to supplement her allowance. This could be the means by which she could retain her dignity, allowing her to purchase much needed household equipment or repairs to her home.

It is therefore recommended that current government programs and policies should be improved to cope more effectively with the problems of women heads of families living in poverty in Canada by

(a) more re-training and rehabilitation programs for untrained welfare mothers, and

(b) provision of supplementary income or greater tax exemption for baby-sitting costs, thus providing more motivation to self-support for working mothers with inadequate incomes.

Such programs would eventually benefit all Canadians since the number of welfare recipients would be decreased by a sizeable number.

Greater emphasis placed on the importance of family life through pre-marriage courses would be an asset in prevention of future broken homes because adolescents would be better prepared for marriage. Many young people today have not learned home management, how to handle family finances, basic child care, etc, with the result that they have difficulty maintaining a good family relationship after marriage, and for a substantial number of young people these difficulties become serious to the point of requiring appearance in court. We therefore re-affirm a resolution passed at our 1969 National convention recommending to the departments of education of the provinces of Canada a serious study of the possibility of implementing such a course of study in the two grades prior to the legal age for leaving school.

It is further submitted that projects and programs be undertaken at the local government level to assist sole support mothers through assistance to them as consumers of goods rather than of services. This group falls within the definition of poverty in that over 70% and often as high as 100% of income is spent on subsistence items of food, shelter and clothing. Instruction in purchasing techniques, budgeting and nutrition, as well as homemaking skills, is often required.

Since the cost of living has constantly increased in the last 18 years and personal exemptions for income tax purposes do not adhere to this factor, we again urgently recommend to the federal Government the consideration of an increase in the basic exemption under the Federal Income Tax Act from the present $1,000 to $2,000, thereby giving assistance to those Canadians in the low income bracket. This provision would be of particular assistance to the woman head of a family on a minimal income.

Housing

Adequate low cost housing was consistently requested, often demanded, by our members who submitted opinions for our brief. Indeed inadequate housing has been given as the reason in some instances for the breakdown of the family structure.

The Catholic Women's League of Canada has repeatedly pointed out the right of all Canadians to the fundamental essentials of food, clothing and shelter through resolutions to the federal Government and now reaffirms these recommendations in its brief as follows;

(1) We recommend that legislation be enacted immediately to permit home owners to deduct mortgage interest payments from their income for the compilation of income tax; and

(2) We further recommend that the National Housing Act be extended to allow for a program of rental supplements to families living in rented accommodation other than public housing.

Steps should be taken to streamline the procedure for providing adequate reasonably priced homes for more Canadians in the shortest period of time. This could be facilitated by amending antiquated municipal building by-laws to permit new and cheaper methods of construction, using modern and more economic materials.

In our brief we have resisted the temptation to present an emotional appeal on behalf of the poor. However, their anguish is emotional and with the consent of the honourable senators I would like to read into the records a letter received last week from one of our members. It came, written on a page and a half of lined foolscap...I will read it just as it is written...

Poverty to me is when a family has to eat macaroni and cheese 3 times a day whether or not they want to, and make sure there is some left for the next morning.

When the 7 children they have have to go to bed at night with their day clothes on because if she bought them pajamas there would be no money for the mother's medication.

Poverty is when the husband cannot afford a help in the house when the wife is bedridden, and there is one child home and the others are in school. Neighbours too far away. The father has to just hope she will be all right.

Poverty is when the father is unable to work full time but can't afford the operation because then the rent might not get paid. And where would they get another shack liveable. The one they were living in had no bathroom or outside facilities. They used pails upstairs and down and paid $100 a month and no cupboards. He was making approximately $300 per month—7 kids and the wife with cancer. The welfare knew about this family for five years and kept them in one shack after the other but never once offered to subsidize them. The wife is now dead as of December 24, 1969. The welfare then put them in a beautiful old home including lined drapes, bathroom—the works. This house was waiting for them. The wife new nothing of them.

My conclusion in a case such as this, the welfare should have moved them in that house before she died. That is when they really need the help. This I know is true—because she was my sister.

In conclusion, may we say sincerely:

God intended the earth and all that it contains for the use of every human being and people...the right to have a share of earthly goods sufficient for oneself and one's family belongs to everyone.

Senator Pearson: We enjoyed reading that brief, although it makes sad reading. It is very well presented in setting out some of the problems which face families throughout Canada today.

There is one problem which is not touched on at all, the problem of drug addiction. It is a problem with the young people today, with the mother, and especially with mothers who are abandoned, having no husband. In most cases the youngsters who are taking these drugs are doing so in order to live up with the gang. They reject the mother. When the mother tries to approach them, she cannot get near them. I would like to ask why your people are not doing anything about this problem at all—or are you doing something?

Mrs. Matthews: Do you mean, why this is not in the brief?

Senator Pearson: It is not included in the brief at all.

Mrs. Matthews: We did not include it in the brief at all. Actually, I feel that the whole area of the drug problem should have a brief in itself. This is a problem which we have gone into in the area of the Indians and the Eskimos. It should really be a brief in itself.

I could not agree more heartily with the comments you have made, but I do feel that this is an area which should be dealt with separately. It is certainly a difficult problem.

Senator Pearson: It should be dealt with in our committee, because it is a problem with those youngsters who now are leaving school. Unknown to their mothers they leave school. She is under the impression that they have left for school and because of differences between the principal and the teacher, she does not know what the situation is. She does not know, for example, that they have not gone to school but that they have just gone with the gang. In addition there is a tremendous amount of petty thievery going on to supply the cash they need.

The Most Rev. J. P. Mahoney, D.D., National Director, Bishop of Saskatoon: Do you think that the comment on the Big Brother movement has any significance, senator? Do you think that this drug problem is caused to some extent because they are not relating to an adult with understanding? Perhaps if the Big Brother movement were encouraged along these lines, some of these younger people could find a suitable adult to relate to, somebody who could give them good advice.

Senator Pearson: This could be developed.

Mrs. Matthews: One of the comments made in the brief is that frequently the child has a negative image of his father and so the big man in his life is the criminal. That is why the recommendation is made that support should be given to the Big Brotherhood movement.

Senator Pearson: I think too that where the father deserts the family, he should still be made to support them.

Senator Quart: Mr. Chairman, I agree entirely with Senator Pearson's comment regarding drug addiction. I feel this is such a worthwhile study that it should be included and I am sure it will be included in whatever recommendations we may make. It does present a very real problem.

Before asking my question, and I have many of them, I want to congratulate the president and the national executive for delegating Mrs. Matthew to put together this brief, and I particularly appreciate the way they have given credit to the members from the various provinces who in turn have gone on the knowledge and experience of the membership. I like the way they have given them credit by name.

Now, to come to my questions—it has come to my knowledge within the last week—and this paragraph in your brief struck me very forcibly because of this case which I have in mind, and the letter you read really touched our hearts. I refer to page 13 of your brief, paragraph 49 where you say:

It is submitted that the federal Government authorities should investigate more closely the problem of the man who leaves his family thereby creating a financial burden for his wife and for the community.

That, of course, is your recommendation.

Mrs. Matthews: We heard many, many stories about this kind of thing and the situation that arises where a father leaves his family. In some cases the mother can provide, but in others she cannot. Many of them involve hardship, particularly where the mother is not able to provide and has to go on welfare. Then there were other cases where the father would come home and beat up the family, both physically and emotionally. A great deal of this kind of thing came to our knowledge and it was on this knowledge that these recommendations were based.

Miss Veronica Fagan, Member of Brief Committee, the Catholic Women's League of Canada: In the terms of the recommendation, we suggested that the federal Government authority should investigate this. The Vanier Institute of the Family at the moment is supporting the study by the Ontario Law Reform Commission directed to these problems and the enforcing of agreements. But this is a slow process with many facets, and I understand that the research is slow because it is only a project undertaken at the request of the Council of Juvenile and Family Court Judges of Canada. I think it is an admirable study to which much more attention should be given. At the moment this study is being carried out, I shall not use the words "casually" but the project in Ontario is being carried on by students in summer with limited budgets. I would think that this is one resource that is available and should be pursued.

The problem of the deserted mother is tremendous because the onus of following up is often hers—the giving of the address of the husband and trying to locate him. At the same time she has the day-to-day problems of keeping the children together and looking after them with very limited financial resources. I know that our Courts permit the woman to assign monies to the welfare departments so that they can have regular payments if they choose to go on welfare, but there are some women who depend entirely on support from the husband and if he suffers a reverse in health or in employment, this in turn reflects upon the family. I am not sure that I completely agree with the committee on the methods whereby he could be traced and found.

If I may quote the statistics for the Province of Ontario for 1966, the latest figures available, something like 4,000 cases were presented to the Juvenile and Family Courts to seek assistance for deserted women. Of that number, 1,700 only were pursued as cases in which the husband could be located and in which agreements were made possible. Of that, another large number, and I do not know the exact number, would be unrecoverable. And so the payments to the deserted wife and family were very limited. Consequently the mother is constantly in a state of insecurity. This is a very large problem and the solution is not easy. I think there should be a central point for information and statistics on this located in our Family Courts.

The Chairman: If you do not agree with the solutions, what do you suggest? I am keeping in mind now that the act presently on the statute books was drafted by myself as chairman, Mr. Markle who was here sitting beside me this morning, and Mr. Cragg who administers the Canadian Assistance Act—we were the three people involved in drafting the act. It did not work very well, but we did the best we could. How would you improve it?

Miss Fagan: The point is I feel that families and children must be protected by legislation. As in all legislation, the implementation is the difficult part and this is the field of the family courts. This means that the family court officials, along with the mothers, are responsible for tracing the men. I feel that while it is necessary to protect them it may be useless. I know this argument is made frequently: is it worth incarcerating the father?

The Chairman: Let us forget the father for a moment and say we do not locate him, or if we do he is in trouble. We have a mother with children; what do you suggest we do for her? She cannot trace the husband and the authorities have several other jobs to do. What do we do for her at that moment in time?

Miss Fagan: I think she would be eligible for family benefits in those conditions under the general welfare assistance. However, in order to become eligible she must prove this need, which means going to court, laying charges and providing information. It is within the powers of regional welfare administrators to dispense with some of the needs of the unmarried mother and the deserted wife, such as a declaration of paternity for an unmarried mother. This is rarely done and the complicated political machinery must go forward. I think it could be simplified if an affidavit of facts could be presented, rather than bearing the stigma of a court appearance. In this regard I must say that the workers on the project realize that most people feel that if they are heard they are well heard and given sympathetic attention. I am suggesting that this may be unnecessary. For example, a representative of the welfare department could take an affidavit and present the women's case to the court.

The Chairman: The suggestion that we had to deal with, as I recall it, was that after the order of the court was made it was then its responsibility to make the collections, and she would be paid automatically. She would not have to chase after the husband. The children would not chase the father. Is that the sort of procedure you are thinking about, or are you going even further?

Miss Fagan: That is one of the improvements which would be helpful, and this is done in some cases, but not in all. The legislation may be there, but the problem is putting it into practice.

Mrs. Matthews: In point of fact I think the onus is on the mother to appear in court, no matter what she has already gone through in the last 24 or 48 hours and may go through during the next 24 hours as a result of appearing in court. This is what we say in paragraph 52.

The Chairman: It is so hard to avoid that; it is not easy for the mother or the authorities, but how can you improve it?

Mrs. Matthews: This is the kind of procedure that we are recommending, the possibility of a representative of the welfare office, perhaps a social worker who may be involved with the family in other connections, perhaps a lawyer, appearing on her behalf rather than the woman herself, who is already overburdened having to appear.

Senator Quart: You mention at the end of this paragraph tracing a man through income tax returns.

Mrs. Matthews: Yes, this is if he has an income. This is one of the suggestions, the social security number or income tax return. In some cases the men, of course, are working and paying income tax. There is a social security number and various other methods which we have suggested.

Mr. Chairman, may I make a comment in passing reference to the very kind remarks Senator Quart made at the beginning. This brief is very much the work of a committee and, as Miss Fagan pointed out, we did not even agree always. Some of the points made in it are the thinking, opinion and feeling of women who are living in these conditions. This particular part is a very personal situation. It is a woman who is actually living in these conditions and these were her feelings. When the brief was being prepared, of the 15 people who are members of the brief committee, about six or seven each prepared a section, which we then attempted to research in our own volunteer fashion. It is, however, very much a brief of feeling and opinion.

Senator Carter: Did you check with any legal authorities to see if your suggestions for tracing were practical?

Mrs. Matthews: Do you mean the suggestion of the woman appearing in court?

Senator Carter: No, the suggestion of tracing through the social security number?

Mrs. Matthews: We did not check it in complete and utter detail, because as an organization of volunteers we do not feel competent to do this. However, we did check the fact that there is a social security number and that people could be traced through it. If your question is did we research it all the way back, we did not.

Senator Carter: On that same point you make a statement which perhaps I am not interpreting correctly. In paragraph 51 you say:

It is further recommended that the law be amended to make it mandatory that irresponsible fathers who desert their families be forced to contribute to the support of this family until all children are of age to support themselves,...

That is all right, but now you come down to where I am somewhat puzzled. You go on to say:

and, as a deterrent to establishing a second family, legally or illegally, the first family should supersede any other families.

If the father establishes a second family and has children, they are also human. How do you draw the distinction between the responsibility for one child born in one family and another child born in a different family? How can you say that these are two separate human beings and that one should supersede the other?

Mrs. Matthews: First of all, we did not say that he did not have a responsibility to his second family.

Senator Carter: You are asking us to pass a law making it mandatory—you want something which would say that the first family would supersede the other families?

Mrs. Matthews: Yes, because we feel the first family is his primary responsibility. We are not saying that he is not responsible for the second family.

Senator Carter: Just how do you separate the two responsibilities? You say primary and secondary. Does he pay more to the first family than he would to the second?

Rev. Dr. Mahoney: Actually, I think we are trying to scare them off, senator. We want him to think about that good and early. You have raised a good question; there is no doubt about that. Actually, we are not suggesting this on the basis of the children so much as on the basis of the man stopping to think of what is going to happen to him if he takes on more responsibilities.

Senator Carter: I know what you are driving at, but we are talking about a law. The law is not to protect the father, but the children. It is the responsibility of the father to the children which is embodied in the law; it is not to frighten the father away or keep him from straying from the narrow path. That is the point about which I am puzzled.

Mrs. Matthews: I think our basic point is the primary responsibility to his children. We did not say that he had no responsibility to the others nor did we try to say that he must give "X" dollars to this one or that one.

Senator Carter: That is what I want you to define, what "primary" responsibility means as opposed to "secondary."

Mrs. Matthews: His primary responsibility is to his first family.

Senator Carter: What does that mean?

Mrs. Matthews: I do not quite understand your question.

Rev. Dr. Mahoney: I think it means that the top of his pay cheque goes to the first family.

Senator Carter: And is that is the end of it?

Rev. Dr. Mahoney: How irresponsible are we going to allow this man to be under the law? If we do not have any law he can establish families all over the place, as some men do, and not support any of them. He cannot support them all. The Government is going to have to step in and support his families wherever they are, and I am sure they will. Where does his money go? Let his money go to the first family, which is the first obligation he took on. This is cruel, but he does not have enough money, only a lot of vigour. His problem is that he cannot keep his income up to his responsibilities. We are simply saying that his first obligation is to his original wife and family whom he undertook to raise. Beyond that he is going to have to get help anyhow because there is not enough money to go around. I think that is when the welfare comes in. He may simply say, "I have established three families and I will decide to give my money to this family or to that one." I do not think a law that allows a man to do that is fair.

Senator Carter: Do you mean to say that if the court can only get, say, $100 a month out of this father and that is only enough to support his first family, the second family should be supported by the state? Is that what you are saying?

Mrs. Matthews: This is literally what would happen anyway.

Senator Pearson: He left his first family and it is approximately five, six or seven years before you find him. What are you going to do with him? He has established his second family by then. He does not establish another family all within one year.

Mrs. Matthews: As a matter of fact, when this recommendation was brought in it was even suggested that the second wife should help support the first family, which carried it pretty far.

Senator Carter: We have spent enough time on that one. There is one other point, Mr. Chairman. This confirms what we have been told by other witnesses about the humiliation of poor children in schools. You make a point here that children on welfare must sign forms in triplicate to receive text books in some schools. It is even announced over the P.A. system in the school, which makes these children different from the others. Is that very prevalent? Are you talking about one school or one area?

Mrs. Matthews: We are talking about one area and we have this documented, but as we pointed out these things vary from province to province. I am from Toronto. I know that it does not happen there, but it does in some places and we do not feel that it is right. We have this documented and it is happening. This material would have come in to me about the end of 1969, three or four months ago.

Senator Carter: Does this happen in more than one province?

Mrs. Matthews: I just have it documented from one province.

Senator Carter: I think we should get documentation on it.

The Chairman: That is the next question which I was going to ask. This is, after all, a very powerful organization. I have known them for years and years, and I should have thought that the bishop would have written that board of education a letter that would have sizzled them a bit and that would have been the end of it.

Mrs. Matthews: I think steps are being taken to correct the situation, because these things are really careless and thoughtless. We use this as an example of the kind of things which are happening to children.

Senator Inman: Could we ask which province that is?

The Chairman: I do not want to ask it, but you may. Ask them privately.

Mrs. Matthews: Can I tell the senator privately?

The Chairman: Yes, you can tell her later.

Senator Carter: I have one last question. Mr. Chairman, you laid stress on day care centres and we have had several other bodies expressing the same thing. You confirm what they have said, but I would like to get your opinion on these day care centres and the type you have in mind. Some people have recommended a central place where you bring in a lot of children for expert care. Others have recommended that it would be better for the poor people to have smaller centres, sort of a corner drug store or nursery variety, with probably some of the poor people themselves trained to look after them. What is your reaction to that?

Mrs. Matthews: We have said this about the people themselves looking after them. My opinion would be that the day care centres must be in an area where a mother can place her children in them conveniently. They should be more in the neighbourhood of the corner drug store. This would be the most satisfactory way of having the day care centres run. These mothers cannot take their children to the other end of town, partly because of the cost of transportation. Even the cost of transportation would be too much, apart from the time or anything else. Miss Fagan may have some comments on the day care centre.

Miss Fagan: In reference to the question about some of the poor families, I know that in Toronto in some of the housing developments they have started day care centres whereby women alternate daily in the care of children, in groups. The City of Metropolitan Toronto sponsors 16 day care centres accommodating something like 590 children. They also pay some of the private day nurseries. Briefly, what is required here would be an extension of these facilities, which is a great cost to the taxpayer. There would have to be some consensus that this is a good type of supplement to the family needing child care and seeing the context, particularly for women who are the sole support and who require good day care, not just running around to various women in the neighbourhood who many or may not give a great deal of consistent help but which would be more as baby sitting and which is not always perfect.

I speak of institutionalized day care, in which there would be expert management, which could be supplemented again by what you are suggesting, volunteer help.

Senator Fergusson: In these small day care places where different women give their time, are these women trained or do they just set up a place where they look after the child?

Miss Fagan: No, they are not trained.

The Chairman: Some of them may be.

Miss Fagan: I would say that in most of the housing developments they are mothers.

Senator Fergusson: They take the children.

Miss Fagan: There is an experiment in the City of Toronto at the moment, sponsored by the Department of Public Welfare and one of the community colleges. There is a mobile van located in one of the centres in one section of the city and they are trying to teach certain women the aspects of child care. This is a community college responsibility, so that the woman may go out to work. They are working on this project, to equip those women, who are just mothers, with some more scientific basis of child management, giving them ideas as to teaching skills, how to manage children in groups, and so on. This is an experiment which started in the last six months and I think more projects of this kind should be encouraged.

Mrs. Matthews: This provides a lot of different services. In addition to training mothers, it provides day care service for the children involved, so it is doing a two-fold job.

Senator Inman: I saw an article in a paper with regard to nurseries for working mothers. This was the case of a little firm. I was wondering if it could be extended to larger firms.

In this case, the work of the firm was in manufacturing furniture. The owner provided a little nursery where the mothers could bring their children and leave them. The mothers then could see them at the noon hour. I thought that was a wonderful idea and wonder if it could be promoted among firms big enough to do this.

One of the questions I was interested in was in regard to family allowances to unwed mothers. For several years I was chairman of a mothers' allowance committee in Prince Edward Island. We could not pay to unwed mothers. I thought that was a bad principle, and many children suffered because of this. How many provinces do that?

Mrs. Matthews: I am not too sure of the question. Do you mean, how many provinces do not pay?

Senator Inman: How many provinces do pay?

Mrs. Matthews: Do pay family allowances to unwed mothers?

Miss Fagan: I understood this was universal.

The Chairman: It is federal. It is not a provincial matter. You may have been thinking, senator, of mothers' allowances, which is now incorporated into the Canada Assistance Act. The old family allowances plan is no longer there.

Miss Fagan: Excuse me. Was the senator's question answered satisfactorily? I was referring to family allowances, such as the baby bonus. That is universal. It is paid to married mothers as well as to unmarried mothers. However, in the case of the unmarried mother, she is not eligible for that until three months after the birth of the child. Prior to that she must go on social welfare assistance, which is a general thing. She has to prove that she is going to maintain and keep the child and requires long term assistance in managing the child.

Senator Inman: On page 16, in paragraph you say:

We submit that the recipient of such benefits should be given every incentive to work and not be penalized if she seeks employment to supplement her allowance. This could be the means by which she could retain her dignity, allowing her to purchase much needed household equipment or repairs to her home.

How far would you consider one should go on this.

Mrs. Matthews: In paragraph 60 it is suggested that if the woman works and is able to make a few dollars over and above her welfare allowance, this should not be deducted from her welfare. Is the question, how far do we want to go with that?

Senator Inman: Yes.

Mrs. Matthews: I have not figures here, but if she is earning a great amount of money, she will not be on welfare, to start off.

Miss Fagan: At the moment in Ontario she may earn up to $36 a month. After that it would be reduced.

The Chairman: After that it is a total deduction. In most other provinces it is allowed that if she earns $5 she gets $2.50. That is the general practice across the country, with the exception of Ontario, where deduction is dollar for dollar after $25 to $30 of earning.

Mrs. E. Gallagher (Member of Brief Committee, The Catholic Women's League of Canada): In the case of rural poverty, I think of a particular case where the husband died suddenly and left the wife and seven children. I am not sure of the amount of the allowance she gets. I am wondering if something could be done in certain cases. Sometimes they live 14 or 15 miles from a shopping centre and she has no opportunity to get meat for the whole week. She has not enough refrigeration for that amount of meat. Now, I wonder if we could not help in cases like that by purchasing a freezer which would help to solve a great many of her problems. Then perhaps she could buy up enough meat when there were better buys in the stores and have a quantity of it in her freezer so that she would not be obliged to make this trip to the shopping centre fifteen miles away, using gas or lugging her purchases on a bus. Here we would be helping somebody with a real problem. I am sure there are many cases similar to the one I have referred to.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Mr. Chairman, I was hoping to be the devil's agent this morning and try to start an argument. So far I have been unsuccessful. We have received something in the order of fifty briefs on poverty in this committee. Everybody is telling us what to do and how to do it. In fact everybody is telling us the same thing. These briefs are largely repetitious, but let me make it clear that I am not criticizing them. We are always talking about poverty, but what is the cause of poverty? What is the real cause of it? There was a letter read here this morning which was a very pitiful letter and a very sad one. We heard all about the woman in it, but what about the man? Is he alive? Where is the man in that picture?

Mrs. Matthews: In the letter which I read, reference was made to the fact that the man was making $300 a month and paying $100 a month in rent. He was alive and he had 7 children and his wife died of cancer on December 24.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): It seems to me that there are many, many poor families in Canada and if you get down to the basic reason, you find that the man is responsible and he is the one we should go after. In many cases he is an outlaw and he is lazy and does not want to work. When you put these factors together you have the cause of it all. I think we have to be a little more severe in these cases and use the whip sometimes. It may do some good and maybe it is the only language they will understand. Can I start an argument on that?

Rev. Dr. Mahoney: I will agree with that, senator, depending upon the kind of whip you like to use.

Mrs. Gallagher: I think we would all like to use it sometimes.

Rev. Dr. Mahoney: I think the ladies have rather focused the situation on women in their brief, but it would be interesting to have the men come up with an analysis of their own situation. Obviously nothing has been said about the husband who has been driven out of the home by the wife. We have to admit that such cases do exist. Conditions are such that the man eventually walks out the door and with perfectly good reason. But nothing has been said in his defence.

The Chairman: No hearsay evidence here.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): In the first brief we heard this morning there was a point which was very interesting to me. In the tremendous training programs now existing right across Canada, it may well be that the standard of education required is too high for a certain group of people. You don't need grade 12 to be a barber or a ladies' hairdresser. You may need it if you want to reach a certain higher level. The situation can exist where a man has five or six in family and he has a job but he goes out to look for a better job and they say "you cannot have it because you do not have grade 12." Then he goes back to where he was before, still being poor and his children remain poor. So perhaps we have to start with the newborn generation. But I think we may at times be asking too much of the people living today. And then because they do not come up to the standard, we send them back to the shack and they live there and remain poor for the rest of their lives.

Rev. Dr. Mahoney: I could not agree more, senator. Of course you only need grade 10 to become a barber, but why grade 10? Why make too great a demand on them to fill a job for which they have every ability on earth? I do not write the laws and I certainly object to some of them.

Mrs. Matthews: A very good point was made by one of the senators that when you educate a man, you educate an individual, but when you educate a mother, you educate a family. We have concerned ourselves with the mother who was left with the children and while I agree with the points that are being made, we could have written five or six more briefs instead of just one on these different aspects.

The Chairman: I think you made a very important point in this brief, I will come to it in a few minutes.

Senator McGrand: Senator Pearson brought up the question of drugs. Have you any information on the prevalence of the use of drugs or drug addiction among children of the poor? Is there any difference in the evidence of its use in the families of deserted mothers as compared with others? Is there any difference between its use or between its occurrence in the families of the poor and the families of the affluent? Have you any ideas on that?

Mrs. Matthews: Well, we didn't undertake research in that area, but perhaps Miss Fagan may be able to speak about that.

Miss Fagan: Well, I have a kind of an impression, if you would accept that. In the agency with which I am connected in my work, the Children's Aid Society, there are some children who come to us, not as drug users in the sense of using amphetamines and LSD, but children who experiment with glue sniffing—airplane glue—and this kind of stuff that is easily obtainable at the corner store. So far as my experience is concerned, they have not been concerned with the heavy drugs at all, and it is my impression that here the question of money is involved and you are more likely to find the use of drugs among children in somewhat higher economic brackets. Of course, I am not excluding the families of the poor in this.

Senator McGrand: On page 6 you mention that the children from the fatherless welfare family face a 90 per cent higher chance of becoming delinquent than children who grow up in either middle-class or two-parent families. Then you give your reference for that. I would like to know if in your opinion the delinquency is more prevalent in deserted families than in two-parent families?

Miss Fagan: When we use the word "delinquency" here we must remember that it has many facets including stealing, breaking and entering and that kind of thing and this is what I was referring to rather than drug-taking. Delinquency encompasses all these things including playing truant from school and not just the use of drugs.

Senator McGrand: It seems to me that most of these runaway husbands who desert their families are in the low income bracket; is that right? You do not find many $10,000 or $12,000 a year husbands running away, do you?

The Chairman: At $12,000 you abandon the family; at lower incomes you desert them. That is the only difference.

Senator McGrand: I have listened to this time and time again, how these men should be chased and made to pay with a priority, whether it is the first or second family, but as a rule these are low income men in the first place. What success have the authorities had in tracing these and making them fulfil their responsibility to their families? If it has not been successful in the past, how successful can it be in the future?

Mrs. Matthews: I do not know that any concerted attempt has been made in the past to follow it up. In point of numbers it would be fair to say that there are more in the low income bracket, because there are more people in that bracket.

Senator McGrand: But speaking proportionately?

Mrs. Matthews: I do not think that there has been a concerted effort made to follow this up. Certainly this is the feeling the members of our organization who submitted these opinions, that not enough effort was made to trace the fathers.

The Chairman: You are aware that there are approximately 300,000 women in the classification of single heads of families, with about 500,000 or 600,000 children of various ages. This has been a problem of the highest priority and the deepest concern to us. We are full of it and know something of it. As I read your brief I feel that what you are saying is that we must give the women a chance to lead as normal a life as we possibly can. I am sure I speak for the remainder of the committee when I say we thought their highest priority was income. The second priority was their ability to earn a living if they wished to and could. For this they need the day nurseries and day care centres.

Here I become the devil's advocate and the Bishop will forgive me. Since 1966 the federal Government has made it possible under the Canada Assistance Plan to establish day nurseries in every part of Canada and contributes 50% of cost without limitation. You are fully organized and a very respected competent and able group. I notice Newfoundland was left out, but perhaps you have not been established there. That does not make any difference, they will come in. You appear before this committee, comprised of citizens from all parts of Canada. We are no different than you, but just happen to be here because we took a different direction and orientation than some others. You ask us to do certain things. Why have you people in the last two years not raised hell at the local level, with the aldermen and the provinces? Why have you not told them we have got to have these day care centres for these women in order to give them a chance? They are not as expensive as all that, especially in the medium sized cities. Bigger cities are hard to get at, out in the medium cities of 50,000 or 70,000, where you know the aldermen personally, why have you people not done that so that you did not have to come to us with so vital a problem? I do not hold you responsible for income; that is our job, not yours, but this is the kind of work you should be doing all the time. You are two years behind. Why?

Mrs. Matthews: As you said you were going to be the devil's advocate, I do not know that I can tell you why. I can say though that most of the work we have done as a volunteer organization has been in such areas as assisting with day care centres. I agree with you that we should probably do more and I would like his excellency to make reference to something that is happening in his own city in connection with day care centres. I also relate this to a project undertaken by our organization two years ago in Ontario, where classes in English were set up for immigrant women by the Department of Provincial Secretary and Citizenship of the Provincial Government. We provided everything else, in many cases the teachers, the day care centres or babysitting service. This is the role that we feel we can still fill, but I agree with you that probably we should be doing more on the political level.

The Chairman: Your strength lies in the fact that you are not local, but accepted across this country. You are everywhere and we expect more from you

Mrs. Matthews: Senator Croll, can we take this back to our members with the idea that Senator Croll has said that the members of the Catholic Women's League should be acting more politically in this particular area?

The Chairman: Oh, yes, in a loud voice. We have our problems. I can tell you that the members of this committee are dedicated. We go to the departments and ask them why they have not done this or that. They appear before us with a nice brief, very well thought out by, for instance, the Department of National Health and Welfare. On page 7 of their brief they state:

Many problems remain also in the provision of social welfare services designed to prevent future poverty, alleviate existing situations, and foster the rehabilitation of the poor. Comprehensive counselling services, foster home care, institutional care, day care for children and adults, meal services, homemaker services,...

They say here is the law, we can do all these things. We are paying the money but somebody is not doing it. It is very difficult. It is all very well for us to repeat it but it is an entirely different thing for you people across the country to say and repeat it wherever you are represented.

Rev. Dr. Mahoney: The problem with an organization like the C.W.L. is that we exist everywhere, with many different local problems, so it is up to the local group to do something as they see the problem. Over the years the ladies have not been inactive, but they have done little if anything about day care centres. This brief is going to you people and afterwards to our membership, and they are going to ask this question. I am sure we will tell them what you told us. The whole point of this kind of encounter is that we will see day care centres coming as a result of a great deal of leg work. We did not think much about them until things were being put together and we started asking ourselves what are the problems. We are now beginning to focus our ladies' minds on this idea—is there a problem regarding day care centres, and how many counsellors have thought about it and challenged their local community?

One of the results of meeting with you and having the devil or his advocate speak to us so firmly is to focus once more on how important it is to do something about it and not just talk. I am sure we appreciate that.

Mrs. Fabris: The bishop just stole my thunder. He expressed it better than I can. I did want to say that we are already making plans, now that the brief has been presented. I know that it is going back to our people right across Canada. We are going to work on this brief, and I will be very happy to convey your remarks. The problem has been that so many of our active members are women who are not in this position of poverty, and therefore they have to be told about these things happening. I know, in speaking to my own group, that when I told them about our brief they said that they did not know about these things and that we should get busy. We are starting on it next Monday morning.

As a result of our hearings, I feel that you will find our women, as they have done in the past, taking up the challenge. We discussed this last night. The role of the volunteer is in this type of thing.

In our recommendation we asked that the municipalities set them up. We feel that these day care centres should be more than a baby sitting centre. If there was some orderly plan by which these places could be set up and certain things done with them, I think we would all follow suit. We would have no difficulty in recruiting ladies to take the necessary training. There has to be a lead and there must be a planned one. This is what we ask the municipalities to do. Our problem is, as you said, to stir up the municipalities.

The Chairman: We can do the best we can as a committee, but what we are trying to do is to recruit you people who come before us, as well as the educational people who were here this morning and two other groups who plan to be here Thursday.

We had a witness from the Department of Labour at an earlier hearing, and Senator Fergusson asked, "Why is a man permitted to deduct an allowance for a housekeeper, whereas a woman in a similar position is not permitted to do so?" There was no answer to that. We immediately made it our business to ask the Income Tax Department about this, and they assured the committee that they stopped making a distinction about a month ago. They said that both are entitled to the deduction. We also got in touch with the Minister of Labour, and the Minister of Finance, and we find that the White Paper on Taxation makes some provision for women's allowance. These are not world shattering things, but they do count. These things build up from time to time and they make a difference effect.

We have to ask you people to give us much more help than you have been able to give to date because poverty is deeply embedded. It is a serious problem and it is not going to be solved overnight. You have got to carry your share of the burden. I know you will.

Senator Quart: I am always interested in this question. You recommend that a single woman who is the head of a family and is on welfare should not be penalized if she obtains employment to supplement her income, that at the present time she has to declare it and if she earns a certain amount over and above what she is receiving on welfare she is cut off. Is that the meaning?

Mrs. Matthews: Yes, deductible.

Senator Quart: You agree that she should be allowed to keep that?

Mrs. Matthews: Yes. This is the point we made before, that she should be allowed to keep it for repairs to her home or a variety of things which are needed and which she cannot cover with the welfare allowance.

Senator Quart: Have you had anyone complain as to how long it takes to get back on welfare after they have been taken off, because they declared a certain amount of earnings?

Miss Fagan: I could not answer that question. I know that if you are on general short-term welfare assistance you are not supposed to work. However, individual workers tell me that they close their eyes to this. But the policy is that you do not work and you have no other source of income. It is a rigid kind of definition. It will be said, from office to office that it is known one can't exist on what she receives and needs something else. Therefore, they close their eyes if it amounts to just a few dollars here and there. Under the provincial Mother's Allowance, a woman may earn up to $36 a month. I feel that this limit could be extended. There could be a more individualized kind of approach. If the woman has a skill she should be permitted to work at least part-time and have her income supplemented through the welfare assistance program.

The Chairman: Miss Fagan, I do not think that was the question. Senator Quart is concerned about people on welfare earning a few dollars and then having to go off welfare because of it. Should it be necessary for them to come back onto welfare again, how long would it take? Would the administrator work?

Senator Quart: Some people have claimed that it takes two or three months.

Miss Fagan: I know that if were to ask the local welfare official in Toronto he would reply that it can be done immediately as of today. What happens is that the provisions vary and you do have local administrators who handle their policies very rigidly. There is no individualization. It should be more individualized so that a person would not be penalized because he has the capacity to work and wishes to do so.

Senator Fergusson: I am being a devil's advocate, because I do believe that people on welfare should be permitted to earn more money and keep it. I am thinking of the woman who is working hard on a full-time basis and not getting welfare at all. Let us assume one is just as clever as the other. The one who works full time may actually earn less than the recipient of welfare who supplements her welfare payments by part-time work. Isn't this a decision?

Mrs. Matthews: This kind of problem should be dealt with on an individual basis, as Miss Fagan said. This would be the answer to the query. This kind of thing also depends a lot on how many children there are in the family and their ages.

Senator Fergusson: You would have to give a great deal of discretion to the administrator, much more than you do now.

Senator Pearson: It should be more humane, as well as individual.

Senator Fergusson: I certain compliment Miss Fabris and her group. It is a wonderful presentation and I found it extremely interesting. It has been very well prepared. It has given us a lot of information. We may have had some of it here and there but it was not all together. There is also the fact that you quoted your own members from all over Canada, which was a very good idea. Quite often it is just the executive of a group which makes up the presentation, but you are giving the feelings and thoughts of your women in all parts of Canada and this was an extremely good thing to do.

I was glad that you specially stressed the situation of the woman who is head of a family. You say there are 283,000 single heads of families in Canada. That is a tremendous problem. We do know, from what we have been hearing from witnesses about these women and children, that they are faced with a very hard situation. They are despairing and they need help.

I am glad you stressed this, even if you left out some of the other things. You could not possibly cover the whole field. To me, this is one of the most important areas.

At the beginning, you said you recommended an intensified study. It may be that this point has been dealt with by someone else—about regional differences and variations in poverty. People have asked why we are making more studies and have said that there has been enough study. Some people in some places wanted us to come back to Ottawa the next morning and pass legislation. I gather this is not your idea of the right approach?

Mrs. Matthews: In the area in which we felt more study was needed was in that of the woman head of a family. Before the committee was started, it was first mentioned to me and I started to look for material. It struck me that there was very little available about the woman head of family. There is a lot of material on the single parent of a family, and you have to dig through it to find the woman head.

In the Economic Council of Canada reports, the fifth and sixth annual reports which we have quoted there is only about two-thirds of a page in the whole book dealing with woman head of family.

The more we went into it, the more we realized, as the committee was formed that there was practically no material on this aspect, that of the woman head of family, so we made this recommendation that a study be given to this aspect of living conditions.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): How big is your membership across Canada?

The Chairman: It is 150,000.

Mrs. Matthews: We give it as 135,000 to 150,000. We have not our figures for this year yet.

The Chairman: Do not forget that that is paid up membership.

Mrs. Matthews: Our membership is very very low. People in the poverty situation cannot afford to pay.

The Chairman: Are there any other questions? Is there anything anyone on the delegation would like to say?

Mrs. Matthews: I suppose we could spend all day on it, but we know that your time is limited. We are grateful for having had this opportunity to explain how we arrive at this conclusion and how we went about it.

Senator Fergusson: I would like to say that not long ago I saw an article in the Globe and Mail and from the headlines I thought it intimated that experts should not be getting into these things. It may be that I misunderstood the article.

Mrs. Matthews: The article in the Globe and Mail referred to the section in the brief which deals with the effect on children. It was a personal opinion. A woman was saying that if the husband was providing for the wife and family, they should not be watched by the social welfare workers. She had a feeling they should be left alone and she suggested that those families were just as sensitive as any other families.

Senator Fergusson: Yes.

Mrs. Matthews: That was a reference and this was a minor piece which was taken out of one part of the submission.

Senator Pearson: There is one system in Regina, where a woman who was qualified, who came from another country started out on a day care centre. It started all right but it dropped down and people lost interest. Mothers found they had too much effort to get the children there and leave them there and then pick them up when they had finished the job. It gradually faded out. Do you find a problem like that?

Mrs. Matthews: Another senator made reference to the location of the day care centres. Should it be a big one in a central place or should it be at the corner, locally?

Senator Pearson: It should be more locally.

Mrs. Matthews: I do not know the Regina situation. It would be necessary to go into the particular situation. It would seem to me that the actual physical spot should be in an area where the mother would find it convenient to leave the children and get them home in the evening.

Rev. Dr. Mahoney: It is a kind of phenomenon in the city of Saskatoon that I do not have one day care centre, although there are 150,000. There is a federal grant for a day care centre and that is working extremely well. The federal Government covers the cost of the place and four workers. They also have a group of volunteers and this makes up 25. They take only 15 at a time. Sometimes a day is staggered, coming and going. It works extremely well. This is the kind of activity we have in mind, where we might be able to provide places. We could help in this respect in the local parishes, because we have parish halls, many which are not used during the day. However, we would need two things, someone to pay an administrator who would take charge and be there all the time. We can find volunteers but you need someone full-time. The second need is for training of people to work in them. I can see the great pressure of our people, on pastors and people, to provide the area and to provide volunteers. We would like to be able to train volunteers and would like some help in the administration. One would need a properly trained worker there every day, and then there would be volunteers to help.

The Chairman: If there are no more questions, on behalf of the committee I would like to express our thanks. I do not know whether many committee members noticed one paragraph which rather pleased me, on the front page. It referred to those who helped in preparing the brief and mentioned that one was a mother of 7 children, and it said this:

...mother of 7 children, 5 to 22 years old, one of whom, a Grade XI student, was co-ordinating chairman of the committee which prepared a class brief on poverty for this Senate committee. As a result of her own efforts to research parts of the submission, her C.W.L. parish council donated $100 to provide a happy Christmas for 2 families she had interviewed.

One of the really pleasant and proud things to happen to us was the group of children who came before us in Halifax and presented an excellent brief. This is one of your girls. You see, you have cast your bread upon the waters. The results are coming back already through one of your own junior members. We have been rather forward in our questioning of you here today. We do not normally do that, particularly when we have charming women before us. Even though the bishop was here, we did not think you needed his protection. The reason we did this was that we think you have the ability to do things. Yours is an old organization with young ideas which has revived itself from time to time and is formidable across the country. Whether you are volunteers or not does not really matter and does not make the slightest difference particularly where this problem is concerned. This is a problem which has been largely ignored and now gravely needs attention. You have ideas and that is the purpose of our discussion here today. You have presented an excellent brief covering many points that will be of value to us. Of course many others have also presented points which other people are looking into, but one very important one which you have mentioned is that of day-care centres. They have been mentioned to us previously, but never dealt with in this particular emphatic manner.

You have made a very valuable contribution. On behalf of the committee, I thank you all very profusely.

The committee adjourned.

PREFACE

It is intended that this brief should present the view of the CAAE's national Board of poverty in Canada and assay the necessity of assisting the poor to help themselves. The first section relates some of the historic concerns of the CAAE and its attempt to establish practical means of expressing them. The second section emphasizes some of the present-day philosophical assumptions and approaches of adult educators towards the poor. The third section will briefly review salient studies, chiefly Canadian, which help de-mythologize the relationship between education and poverty. The last section will emphasize four areas vital to the educational growth of the poor - adult basic education, man-power policies, consumer education and housing policies.

The Saskatchewan Division of CAAE hopes to present a brief regarding aspects of Indian, Métis, and Eskimo Education when the Senate Committee visits that province.

For purposes of this Brief, we accept the definition of poverty used by the Economic Council of Canada, that is, "an insufficient access to certain goods, services, and conditions of life which are available to everyone else and have come to be accepted as basic to a decent, minimum standard of living." We recognize the economic nature of such a definition and therefore stress that its interpretation must be in the broadest possible socio-cultural terms.

We will also accept as general but useful categories of poverty, those outlined by Senator Croll, namely the working poor, who constitute approximately one half of the poor, the disadvantaged (physically, mentally, etc.) who may compose about one quarter of the poor, and the welfare poor who may constitute about one quarter of the poor.

This brief will include some specific recommendations. We would remind the reader that these recommendations flow from a philosophy which firstly views the poverty culture as part of the total society and, secondly, sees the need for an educational-learning component in almost every governmental, associational or self-help project among the poor. We therefore hope that this brief will be seen as an attempt to make positive and specific recommendations in an area in which factors cannot be neatly isolated or dealt with. We reject, on the basis of theory and experience, any further attempts at piece-meal solutions.

A Brief Presented to the Special Senate Committee on Poverty by the Canadian Association for Adult Education.

1. Traditional Concerns of the CAAE

A Concern for Canada

Since its founding conference in 1935, the Canadian Association for Adult Education has mirrored many of the concerns of those who hope to build a more just and humane society within an independent Canada. The CAAE has traditionally attempted to serve the cause of national unity by helping to build practical programs of rural adult education, urban citizenship training, and a nation-wide network of communication between voluntary organizations, educators, and government agencies.

Rural and Urban Projects

From its inception the Association was aware of the need for rural education. By the year 1940, it had joined with the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and the C.B.C. to sponsor and promote the National Farm Radio Forum, and later, with the National Film Board, to encourage rural film circuits. By 1943, the CAAE was co-sponsoring the C.B.C.-produced "Citizens' Forum" series, Canada's premier urban citizenship training scheme. Both of these radio series were integrated with material written at a level understood by the thousands of laymen participating in their associated listening groups.

Communications Network

The CAAE played an active role in the Canadian Council of Education for Citizenship during the Second World War, and later was instrumental in developing the national co-ordinating agency of voluntary associations known as the Joint Planning Commission. Through both of these bodies, national and provincial associations and government agencies attempted to co-operate in order to tackle problems of common concern.

Community Development Projects

The Association not only worked in large-scale projects of national importance, but also experimented in forms of community development. For several years prior to World War II it gave limited financial and technical assistance to the community development work of Rev. and Mrs. Harry Avison in The Pas, Manitoba, and to the Community Life Training Institute under Mr. David Smith.

Previous Public Policy in Briefs

The CAAE has presented its views to the two most thorough investigations of national life conducted in Canada. Its brief to the Rowell-Sirois Commission stressed the urgent need both for rural educational programs and on-going federal assistance in the field of adult education. The Massey Commission brief sought the continued co-operation with not only the C.B.C., but also a strengthened National Film service.

11. Philosophical Perspectives

The Continuing Education Concept

Today, the concept of continuing education is gaining wider acceptance. It is based on several insights. One is the knowledge of modern psychology that learning is a life-long process. Another is an experience-based view of man which emphasizes the informal, as well as the formal, means by which he learns and which acknowledges as valid the widest possible range of experiences and disciplines in man's quest for knowledge.

A society based on principles of continuing education would be that in which individuals of all classes could return from their occupations to formal or informal learning situations with relative ease. Indeed, such freedom and opportunity exist for some in Canada today. Increasing numbers in middle and upper class occupations and professions are actively encouraged to increase their learning. However, such opportunity is unevenly distributed in our society, and too often those who need such choices and chances don't have them. Thus, the gap between the deprived and the affluent is even further widened.

The continuing education concept views the present attempts of the poor to organize into voluntary associations of tenants, etc., as legitimate learning situations which we most heartily endorse and would encourage. Indeed, such associations are the attempts of the dispossessed to assume the role of functioning members of society.

The striving for a membership role in society is an integral part of the continuing education concept. No longer are people satisfied with passive, receptive roles. (23) The poor are unlikely potential participants in formal student learning situations. They have, however, shown some interest and ability in participating in relevant local projects involving their own community. In the Lawrence Heights project, North York, for example, the local inhabitants of this low income area organized and now run a day-care centre, a hot lunch program, a grocery co-operative, a newspaper, a clothing store, an information centre, adult study groups, and mental health services. (19) A major breakthrough in reaching the people of Lawrence Heights occurred when it was found that parents, rather than professionals, were the most effective group leaders and resource persons. (19) Certainly there is reason to believe that the traditional advisory board concept, characterized by centralized, technical functions, will not serve the needs of the poor. (4)

The participation and involvement of the membership role may be the leaven which will change the old, authoritarian approach to education into dynamic concern for learning. In the future we may well see the narrowing of the role distance between the teacher and the student as the two functions give way to the common role of member and learner.

There are already some signs of greater flexibility in approaches toward learning. For example, Mrs. Betsy McDonald of Vancouver has successfully assisted a group of women to prepare themselves for re-training or employment. She has shown that by support and encouragement on the personal or small group level, some individuals may learn new roles and expectations. George Brown College of Toronto has been operating a mobile classroom, offering counselling services, information and short-course facilities. By this means persons unwilling or unable to go to traditional institutions may be reached. Of course, many more ways of reaching and assisting people are yet to be explored. For example, more educators must move out of their institutions and into home-centred learning situations where the poor would feel more at ease. Educational organizations and teachers' colleges must learn to be flexible enough to assist so-called unqualified persons in learning skills necessary to become presidents of the local tenants' associations or co-ops.

This is not to view these examples as cure-alls. Far from it, for unless poverty is tackled at all fronts, economic, social and political, the effects of such minor innovations will be minimal in terms of the total picture.

There is, however, a role for people including educators at the local level to act as facilitators and animators. They surely will be amongst the chief "learners" as they, along with those mutually concerned such as social workers and doctors, learn to work at the community level in an interdisciplinary, team approach. (19). For instance, if the CAAE is to assist the poor in helping themselves, it also must be willing to change. Such programs as the provision of leadership training for members of tenant associations or the establishment of a national clearing house for poverty group communication may well be the way.

The Role of Voluntary Associations

The role of voluntary associations in the developing technological society is unclear. Some trends appear to be forming, however. The most important may be the response of increasing numbers of people in many fields, who insist that those who are being affected by the decisions of institutions shall have an effective role in the decision-making. In sum: the old managerial prerogatives must give way to greater industrial democracy; the government agency must develop means of receiving and reacting to feedback from its clientele. In such a society the CAAE and other educational associations must develop close working relationships with governments and the citizenry which will allow for maximum possible participation and freedom. Freedom implies real choice, and those bodies who hope to serve the interests of the poor, as well as the poor themselves, must have a basic guaranteed financial base. The social groups this Committee is studying are those who too often have the least real choice - the poor. In one sense the task of all Canadians is to implement a new social order in which all groups have a real choice and a chance.

The Work Ethic

The work ethic which has provided much of the rationale for the present stage of Canada's economic development is deeply-rooted in this society's mythology. The belief that "hard work" leads to "success" or that "success" is a result of "hard work" is cherished by many, especially in the middle and upper classes. Stories of exceptional individual climbs to wealth and power still abound. There is, however, mounting evidence that many factors other than "hard work" may make possible what social mobility does exist and, indeed, that in some circumstances, especially in lower-class, less mobile occupations, "hard work" may even be dysfunctional.

Work is defined by some in such absurdly narrow terms that a student studying forty or fifty hours a week is not "working". Thus, rather than earning whatever he receives, the student is considered to be a recipient of an award, or other charitable donation, for which he should remain eternally thankful, if not docile. Surely the demeaning character of this system is clear. Equally clear is that in the developing technological society the "work ethic" will become even more inapplicable. In this transition stage we suggest that the Committee accept the broadest possible definition of the term "work" and its related ethic so that they might conceive of new means of encouraging continuous learning. Some first steps have been made in other countries, such as Sweden, to work towards the extension of learning opportunities as a social right. We urge this Committee to recommend an investigation of the study assistance system for elementary and secondary students, and the study funds system for higher and adult education as practised in Sweden (22), and the possible extension of such a system into a student salary system for all adult participants in accredited institutions of continuous learning in Canada.

111. Sociological Context of Education

A review of several of the insights of educational sociology may assist this Committee in gaining a realistic perspective of the relationship of education to the poor. Before launching into a discussion of several important areas of study, the following description of the poverty sub-culture from the most recent survey of research into adult education and poverty conducted at a Canadian university may prove useful.

"The differences between the disadvantaged and other members of society are such as to suggest that a distinctive sub-culture of poverty has developed within the dominant culture. The crucial factors conducive to the development of a disadvantaged sub-culture lie in the nature and structure of the economic system through which the resources of society are used and distributed. Thus, sub-standard housing, inadequate public services, limited employment opportunities, and low incomes contribute to the formation of a poverty group. At the same time, certain social characteristics of those in the poverty group influence their perception of and response to such economic factors. In urban slums, for example, the hard core poor have developed their own self-contained social system in which they exhibit a fluent use of a particular language style that provides both an identity to members and protection for the group, and this hard core group differs from other urban slum residents with respect to the perception of time, self in social space, and the classification of schemes and causality. Furthermore, such a sub-culture appears to be self-perpetuating as it socializes its younger members to its own ranks.

"The continued existence of a poverty sub-culture in the midst of an affluent society stems from the interaction of the disadvantaged with the dominant society. It is this society which tolerates the environmental conditions conducive to the creation of disadvantaged status, while simultaneously rejecting those individuals who have fallen victim to such formative conditions. Those victims, in turn, learn to accommodate themselves to a disadvantaged status and in doing so, reject the values of the society which is responsible for their plight. This interaction is self-perpetuating and the conditions which produce it must be modified on a massive scale if the problem of poverty is to be resolved."...(2)

This view is substantiated by a study conducted by the Canadian sociologist, W.E. Mann, who after analyzing the social system of a lower ward Toronto slum, concluded:

"The lower Ward then is, especially for its old Canadian group, another society, separated physically and culturally from those 'up there'. It develops and passes on its own codes and values and its ways of handling the bureaucratic occupying force concerned about law and order and middle class goals and standards. Apparently powerless to revolt, hemmed in ecologically and economically by the larger society, it yet maintains a partial independence and defiance of the more powerful. In effect, it is a colony in sullen inner revolt, more governed by apathy and resentment than by any self-conscious sense of rebellion or desire for great change." (9)

However, despite our awareness of the problem, little research has been done on the many aspects of the poverty culture and what little has been conducted can be characterized as sporadic and uncoordinated, and too often ignored.

Social Mobility

Canadian studies indicate that there may be far less social mobility in Canada than is generally believed. (7, 13) Further, it appears that our present systems of financial aid, including scholarships and grant schemes, tend to perpetuate an essentially elitist system with "only the brightest, highly motivated lower-class student" being the recipient from his class to benefit. (5)

It is becoming clear that elementary, secondary, and post-secondary educational systems are inter-related levels which serve, among other functions, those of sorting and screening future workers for the industrial system. If one wished to change the present educational-industrial relationship, one might well face the serious task of changing many of the basic structures and values of the existing socio-economic system.

Drop-Out Studies

Studies of student drop-outs indicate that it is not just economic situations in some homes which may result in dropping-out, but a value clash between the lower class home and the middle-class school, manifested by such factors as lack of parental encouragement and apathy of the student. That the unemployment rate of school drop-outs, from 14 to 19 years old, is twice the overall Canadian average is but one tragic human consequence of this phenomenon. (15)

Communications and the Poor

Research into communication processes indicates that different sub-cultures have their own verbal and non-verbal modes of communication. Canadian poverty cultures, with their varying regional, ethnic and linguistic characteristics, require special means of communication if messages are to be meaningfully transmitted to them. The use of appropriate media, word levels, terminology and sponsors of information are important if communications are to be accepted. Once again, little coherent research in the field is available.

We therefore wish to emphasize the following recommendations:

- 1) that this Committee investigate and recommend the means by which communications research could be established to conduct a wide program of research on the problem of communication to and among the poor.
- 2) that the C.B.C. develop means, in conjunction with the poor and interested associations, of broadcasting radio and television programs relevant to the poor and their problems.
- 3) that the National Film Board "Challenge for Change" program be greatly expanded and that further schemes be developed, in conjunction with the poor and with interested associations, relevant to the poor and their problems.

The present decision that most of the proposed educational television will be aimed not only almost solely at the formal classroom learning situation, but also via expensive cablevision networks, is a serious setback to those who wish to see informal learning opportunities financially within the reach of the lowest economic groups. Indeed, only those who need ETV least can now afford it. To ensure the widest possible cablevision coverage as a public service:

- 1) we urge this Committee to recommend to the CRTC that a public agency Cable Canada, be developed as a means of extending cablevision on a public utility basis.

- 2) further, we urge that the CRTC rule that a reasonable proportion of time be allotted to informal education, including current events programs, consumer education and news of local community activity among the poor.
- 3) we hope that this Senate Committee will set an example for subsequent public bodies by disseminating reports intelligible to the poor and that
 - (a) a first draft of any relevant written material might be circulated among the poor for comment and revision and that
 - (b) a variety of media; film, radio, tape and television be used to report to the constituency involved - the poor themselves.

1V. Recent Concerns

Adult educators have become particularly aware of four content areas related to poverty--adult basic education, manpower policies, consumer education, and housing policies.

Adult Basic Education

There has been a long-standing need for adult basic education in Canada. The 1961 Census revealed that 1,024,785 persons fifteen years of age or older had either no schooling or less than four years of school. Since the Census little corrective action has been taken, and it is likely that the proportion of sub-literates remains about the same today as in 1961. Many of the sub-literates are to be found in rural, non-farm areas and include significant groups of Indian, Metis and Eskimo people, with problems peculiar to their respective ways of life. Special consideration should be given to the problems of black people, particularly in the Halifax areas.

The social consequences of this problem are widespread and disastrous. A 1960 Canadian survey found that about half of the unemployed had not finished primary school and over 90 percent had not completed high school. Among workers who had not completed primary school, the unemployment rate was six times greater than among high school graduates. (14) The average income of a family head reporting either no schooling or one to four years of schooling completed was $3,318 a year, compared with an average of $4,985 for all family heads. (1) With a rapidly developing technological society, sub-literate persons will be, relatively, even further disadvantaged unless concerted action is spearheaded by the federal government.

We would emphasize three aspects of adult basic education for your consideration. First, it appears that education of either the parent or child alone is often fruitless. In order that some reinforcement of learning is possible both must be encompassed in any strategy for change. Second, adult basic education must have a functional approach -- learning related to daily concerns of the poor is that which is not only immediately useful, but also retained. Third, there is a glaring lack of even the most fundamental educational material, especially for some cultural minorities.

We recommend that this Committee

- 1) urge the responsible government departments, including Manpower, Consumer and Corporate affairs, and Regional and Economic Development to be cognizant of the need for a broadly based approach to adult retraining, consumer education and community development, thereby using
- (a) a team approach to poverty problems, including attempts to assist adult as well as child learning
- (b) their research facilities to develop reading materials, pilot projects etc. for those initially disadvantaged, such as the Indian, Metis, Eskimo and identifiable urban groups.

Manpower Policies

The working poor will be among the first and most hard-hit groups affected by the Federal Government's present anti-inflationary policies. We agree with the Brief of the Department of Manpower and Immigration which stressed "the importance of an adequate level of aggregate labour demand to any anti-poverty strategy." (17) If the working poor are used in the battle against inflation they are taught more eloquently than any educational program the value placed upon their worth as individuals.

Since 1961, over a billion dollars have been spent on new vocational training facilities: yet there has been a drop-out rate of 50% or higher, particularly among unemployed workers. (2) A study conducted in 1965 revealed that only one unemployed worker in fifty was enrolled in a training course. (12) A federal study reported that only 3.5 percent of the unemployed were attending training courses at the time of the investigation. (14)

Our chief complaints arise from the limited and sporadic nature of the present policies. First, they tend to favour those persons who offer the best potential for employment to the detriment of the riskier subliterate individual. The Report of the Association of Applied Arts and Technology of Ontario refers to this phenomena in terms of the middle class work ethic, when it states:

"Surely the middle class ethic is at work in the insistence of the Adult Occupational Training Act and regulations that every effort be made to find the client a job -- (however menial or however unsuited he may be for it) -- before he can be admitted to retraining. Surely this ethic is manifested in the Act's further requirement that a young man or woman must spend at least three years on the labour market following his initial childhood and adolescent educational experience before being considered for retraining on allowances. Surely the ethic is further evidenced in the requirement that no subsidized period of academic upgrading may extend beyond 52 weeks.

(This latter point has the especially pernicious affect of unfairly prejudicing the position of the most grossly disadvantaged. In 52 weeks, a client with Grade Four can be brought to the Grade Seven level; while the client who starts with Grade Eight at time of entry can be brought to a level approximating a high school graduation. The 52-week period of retraining is an arbitrary limitation, imposed by the operative legislation, without regard for the educational status of the client. Obviously, the client whose allotted year brings him to the Grade Eight level is little better off in terms of employability than when he started while the person who starts his retraining year with Grade Eight has a whole new edge on life when he leaves with the equivalent of a high school Grade 12 certificate). (3)

In this respect the Ontario Report concludes that "the local Canada Manpower Centre sees itself primarily as a job placement agency. All other functions, including the educational function, are of secondary importance." (3)

Second, while the Manpower Retraining program has attempted to train the adult for useful employment and occupation, the adult student in some areas too often is treated in a narrow bureaucratic way. The Report of the Association of Colleges of Applied Arts and Technology of Ontario states with reference to its experience:

"The initial decision to send any client for retraining is a unilateral one, taken at the Canada Manpower Centre. And once on course, the subsidized student is subject to assessment at the end of each authorized training block by the CMC counsellor who again is empowered to take the unilateral decision whether or not the student will continue. The function of the teacher and counsellor at the OMRP facility is to provide periodic statements of the student's progress in terms of grades achieved. A student's progress is not something that can be adequately determined always on the basis of percentage alone, but the teacher and counsellor at the educational facility have no formal opportunity to bring their professional opinions to bear upon the CMC counsellors decision.

"Occasionally, the CMC's reluctance to consult with the educational facility results in students not having sufficient advance notice of their status in the immediate future. For reasons better known to the local Canada Manpower Centres themselves, their propensity for delay to the last possible moment in advising both the student and the educational facility as to a client's suitability for retraining, or the decision regarding his continuing in a given course, is almost universal. Not infrequently, therefore, students find themselves in a state of limbo." (3)

The Report also notes that:

"Not all clients are free to choose between programs, nor is everyone offered the same range of alternatives. Any system which denies an individual the right of appeal, denies a basic democratic right. Therefore, when an individual is denied entry to a program, he should be extended the opportunity to appeal to an impartial review board".

Third, the lack of both program continuity and a basic security for the teaching staff has resulted in a growing scepticism about the purposes and planning of policies.

We recommend:

- 1) that manpower policies become more flexible, and more broadly defined so as to include persons of lower age, grade, and literacy levels.
- 2) the greater use of day release, and worker study leave (see Appendix B)
- 3) the establishment of eligibility and admission review boards composed of local citizens, including the poor.
- 4) a more coherent policy of teacher employment, coupled with continuous in-service training, be used to raise the morale and effectiveness of manpower educators.
- 5) continuous research, evaluation and experimentation be conducted in concert with other agencies so as to ensure that the most educationally effective program possible is developed.

Finally, we support the Brief of Frontier College to this Committee, in its attempt to broaden the terms and applicability of the manpower schemes.

Consumer Education

The soaring cost of living has also made educators even more aware of the need for consumer education. The phrase, "The poor pay more", is sadly true, as factors such as their lack of market knowledge, lack of transportation, and need for credit result in more inefficient and costlier buying patterns than those of the better educated. The difficulty of keeping the poor informed about market conditions is only part of the problem. Perhaps more important are the means by which the poor will learn to help themselves.

We urge that

- 1) the Committee recommend to the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs that the Consumer Information Section of the Consumer Services and Information Branch co-operate with the poor in developing means of educating, publicizing, and policing consumer markets used by the poor.

We further recommend that

- 2) federal government technical and financial assistance in the development of consumer co-operatives and credit unions be greatly increased so that the poor might learn to share in the development and decision-making of their own financial institutions.

Housing Policies

A subject of increasing concern is that of housing. Adult educators are aware that important factors in the life of the poor man are found in his immediate physical environment. Educators who claim that they are interested only in the "education" of the poor are not only irresponsible but also ill-informed, for the environment from which an adult student comes and to which he returns daily has certain complex effects on his behaviour. Apparently, among the most important factors, is that of the quality of the accommodation he and his family share.

Today, with restricted urban renewal, an inadequate public housing program and an inflated private sector, the state of Canadian housing is reaching critical proportions. A 1968 study of housing conditions and life style of upper-lower and lower-middle class residents in Scarborough, Ontario, indicated substantial bedroom crowding of children, and an apparent relationship between educational and associational activity of parents and the closeness of community facilities. (8,10) A study in Baltimore found that housing quality affected school performance in that there was an apparent relationship between both the improved health and grade promotion rate of children who had moved from sub-standard to new accommodation. (24)

For many Indian people the housing situation is past crisis. A survey in 1962 revealed that 60% of the Indian families live in houses of three rooms or less compared to a national average of 11%. Further, only 44% of the Indian homes were provided with electricity, 13% with running water, and only 9% were serviced with sewers or septic tanks and 7% equipped with indoor baths. (16)

A Halifax study of 134 black families revealed that slightly more than half lived in overcrowded dwellings which were in need of major repair. Only 1/7 of the families had private toilet facilities while more than half of the families had neither private nor shared bathroom facilities. (20)

The housing crisis of which the middle class is just now aware has been with the poor always. We urge speedy and imaginative action. Attractive and functional housing for those on low income is available in countries such as Sweden. It is possible to have it here also.

We recommend that

- 1) the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation studies include more variables related to the educational needs of its clientele and specifically that it
- (a) develop pilot projects which conceive of public housing needs, with integrated facilities for day nurseries, continuing education and recreation
- (b) investigate further the effects of the macro-and micro-environment of housing upon learning behavior

- 2) the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and the CMHC extend substantial financial and technical assistance to housing co-operatives.

V. Conclusion

The poverty sub-culture is a dynamic social system, not a static one. When we learn of apathy, indifference, and a sense of futility among the poor we do not always consider the powerful social forces which work to perpetuate poverty nor the mental conflict of the individual who is overwhelmed by his situation. Poverty must be fought on many fronts, simultaneously. We believe that measures aimed solely at ameliorating economic hardships without concomitant social-cultural intervention in the poverty cycle are doomed to failure. For instance, the implementation of a Guaranteed Annual Income, without the necessary auxiliary programs of a social, economic and educational nature, would merely create the illusion of change while the basic societal system and its poverty sub-system would undergo little, if any, fundamental change.

Further, if the poor are granted only token representation on any proposed agencies, and little or no real power, we urge that this be openly acknowledged and the reasons publicly stated. The poor have stated their skepticism and concern about the role of this Committee. Few, if any, of the membership of the CAAE are poor. However, we want this Committee to know that it can count on the support of the CAAE in recommending those fundamental and courageous changes necessary if this nation is to respond to the needs of the poor. The poor of Canada must have a choice and a chance.

VI. Summary of RecommendationsThe York Ethic, P. 5

We urge this Committee to recommend an investigation of the study assistance system for elementary and secondary students, and the study funds system for higher and adult education as practised in Sweden (19), and the possible extension of such a system into a student salary system for all adult participants in accredited institutions of continuous learning in Canada.

Communications and the Poor, P. 8

We therefore wish to emphasize the following recommendations:

- 1) that this Committee investigate and recommend the means by which communications research could be established to conduct a wide program of research on the problem of communication to and among the poor.
- 2) that the CBC develop means, in conjunction with the poor and interested associations, of broadcasting radio and television programs relevant to the poor and their problems.
- 3) that the National Film Board "Challenge for Change" program be greatly expanded and that further schemes be developed, in conjunction with the poor and the interested associations, relevant to the poor and their problems.

Adult Basic Education, P. 9

- 1) we urge this Committee to recommend to the CRTC that a public agency, Cable Canada, be developed as a means of extending cablevision on a public utility basis.
- 2) further, we urge that the CRTC rule that a reasonable proportion of time be allotted to informal education, including current events programs, consumer education and news of local community activity among the poor.

- 5) continuous research, evaluation and experimentation be conducted in concert with other agencies so as to ensure that the most educationally effective program possible is developed.

Finally, we support the Brief of Frontier College to this Committee, in its attempt to broaden the terms and applicability of the manpower schemes.

Consumer Education, P. 13

We urge that

- 1) the Committee recommends to the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs that the Consumer Information Section of the Consumer Services and Information Branch co-operate with the poor in developing means of educating, publicizing and policing consumer markets used by the poor.

Summary of Recommendations

We further recommend that

- 2) federal government technical and financial assistance in the development of consumer co-operatives and credit unions be greatly increased so that the poor might learn to share in the development and decision making of their own financial institutions.

Housing Policies, P. 13

We recommend that

- 1) the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation studies include more variables related to the educational needs of its clientele and specifically that it
 - a) develop pilot projects which conceive of public housing needs, with integrated facilities for day nurseries, continuing education and recreation
 - b) investigate further the effects of the macro- and micro-environment of housing upon learning behaviour
- 2) the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and the CMHC extend substantial financial and technical assistance to housing co-operatives

APPENDIX BStudy Leave for Workers

1. Each employee has a right to study leave. "Employee" includes manual, factory, office, and clerical workers.
2. Study leave is the release of employees to enable them to take part in liberal and political studies and in vocational training, with full pay. Annual leave should not be affected.
3. Study leave is to be granted for (a) courses in political studies which encourage responsible social action; (b) vocational education; (c) training for tutors in adult education.
4. Courses should be conducted by recognized agencies for youth and adult education, for example, regional bodies of churches, employers' and employees' organizations, and agencies recognized by government departments.
5. Study leave should cover ten working days a year, after a post has been held for at least six months. Each course for which leave is granted must last at least five days.
6. To enable participation in longer courses, period of study leave may be transferred to a following year.
7. Applications for study leave can be refused for the period requested only if unusual demands of the firm or leave requirements of other employees must be taken into consideration.
8. If an employee falls ill during study leave, the necessary absence on medical authority will not be deducted from his authorized leave.
9. The wages payable during the study leave will be the average of the preceding thirteen weeks, and will be paid before departure for the course. If a wage increase takes place during the period of study leave it will be paid from the general date of the increase. If a wage reduction takes place the wage payable during the period of study leave shall remain unaffected.
10. Gainful employment must not be undertaken during a period of study leave.

THE CATHOLIC WOMEN'S LEAGUE OF CANADA
SUBMISSION TO
THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

PREFACE:

1. The Catholic Women's League of Canada, incorporated by Federal Charter on December 12, 1923, consists of approximately 135,000 members across Canada.
2. Among its objects, the League seeks to promote true ideals of Christian womanhood in home and family life, recognizes the human dignity of all people everywhere, and endeavours to form enlightened public opinion. Politically, The Catholic Women's League of Canada is non-partisan.
3. The intention of the National Executive to submit this brief has been well publicized to the entire membership, who were requested to let those responsible for the preparation of the brief have the benefit of their thinking, and this submission is representative of their collective opinion.
4. As will be noted on the inside front pages, the committee formed to prepare this brief was selected from all areas of Canada, and includes among its members several women heads of single parent families.

DEFINITION OF POVERTY

5. We would like at the outset to set forth the definition of poverty upon which this brief will be based.
6. Funk and Wagnall's dictionary (1963) defines poverty as "denoting a condition below that of easy comfortable living" or "the condition that relates to the absence or scarcity of requisite substance or elements". Under the same word poverty, we find synonyms such as beggary, destitution, distress, indigence, mendicancy, need, pauperism, penury, privation, want.

7. Poverty is a fact that is universal in its physical, spiritual and intellectual effect on human beings. It can be broken down into two aspects: material and psychological. It should be understood that these are not two separate entities, but integral parts of a whole. Thus, involved in the material aspect of poverty, is the lack of the basic necessities of life: food, shelter, clothing, medical and educational facilities. The psychological aspect of poverty refers to the pervasive negative attitude towards life and the possibilities it holds for the future of the individual, and the lack of means and incentive to combat this attitude.

8. "God intended the earth and all that it contains for the use of every human being and people the right to have a share of earthly goods sufficient for oneself and one's family belongs to everyone".¹

9. In the encyclical "Pacem in Terris" of His Holiness Pope John XXIII, we read, "We see that every man has the right to life, to bodily integrity and to the means which are necessary and suitable for the proper development of life. These are primarily food, clothing, shelter, rest, medical care and finally the necessary social services. Therefore a human being also has the right to security in cases of sickness, inability to work, widowhood, old age, unemployment or in any other case in which he is deprived of the means of assistance through no fault of his own".²

It is our submission that when these rights are withheld, poverty exists.

GENERAL REMARKS

10. "To feel poverty is, among other things, to feel oneself an unwilling outsider - a virtual non-participant in the society in which one lives. The problem of poverty in developed industrial societies is increasingly viewed not as a sheer lack of essentials to sustain life, but as an insufficient access to certain goods, services, conditions of life which are available to everyone else and have come to be accepted as basic to a decent, minimum standard of living".³

11. Information has been received from our members across the Dominion pointing out the regional differences and variations in poverty, referring to the lack of industrial development in the Maritimes, the glut of wheat in the Prairies, abandoned farms with dilapidated empty houses throughout many parts of rural Canada, and the poverty generated in the slum ghettos of large cities, which is often inherited by one generation from another. We submit that provision of more economic assistance is not the solution to these conditions, but rather that intensive study of the underlying causes should be undertaken.

12. Concern has been expressed for (a) the migration of rural people to urban areas; (b) the migration of families from small communities to the larger urban centres; (c) difficulties of those farmers who attempt to remain on the land working harder and longer with decreasing return for their efforts, but facing escalating costs of education, machinery, interest on bank loans, etc., often resulting in the refusal of boys to remain on the land; (d) the low average salaries in the Maritimes where the over-all cost of living is just as high as in other provinces, resulting in a denial of even minimal levels of health services, housing, nutritious food and education and the feeling that their poor do not have an equal opportunity to succeed; (e) areas where fishing and lumbering provide only seasonal employment; (f) lack of adequate low cost housing in both smaller areas and large urban centres; and (g) the fact that 31,000 children in inadequate housing in one large urban area alone ⁴ is breeding the possibility of thousands of delinquents in the future.

13. Numerous were the comments of members from many communities on the conditions under which Indians and Eskimos are presently living. Of interest is the fact that these comments came often from those living far removed from centres of high indigenous population as well as the specific provinces where Indians and Eskimos live in larger numbers.

SCOPE OF THE BRIEF

14. Since the topic of poverty is of such broad scope, it is our intention to limit our presentation to "measures to assist women who are heads of families" whether deserted, divorced, separated, widowed, or unmarried mothers, living in Canada under conditions which fall within the above definitions of poverty, and we submit that frequently some aspect of poverty is the root cause of family breakdown.

15. A woman without a husband, the lone head of a household, suffers poverty in many more ways than lacking money for everyday living expenses. She suffers from the weight of responsibility on her shoulders; from loneliness; sometimes from guilt; from being "different" in a world geared to the family unit - a husband, wife and children; from being taken advantage of in many ways, knowing it and not being able to do anything about it; from being emotionally and physically exhausted.

16. It is estimated that there are 283,000 single female-head families in Canada at present.⁵

17. The Canadian Welfare Council's Social Policies for Canada state the position clearly: "The substantial number of one-parent families with female heads raises serious questions of economic and social disparity.This type of family is not a numerical oddity, and requires careful attention in Canadian social policies and objectives."⁶

18. In attempting to research this particular subject, it was found that material available was fragmented and only in publications dealing generally with the single-parent family. It would appear that a fuller knowledge and understanding of the problems facing women as heads of families is needed, and concrete steps taken to solve them. This cannot be provided within the ability of an organization of volunteers such as ours, nor within the scope of this brief.

19. The problems of the single parent, particularly those living in large urban areas, are not fully known. The Welfare rolls and Social Agencies have some statistics and can give data on women served. As the group of "hidden-poor" exists, there is also the group of "hidden-single-parent" which constitutes part of the total group referred to as the "independent poor".

20. Organizations which have recently emerged speak for those articulate enough and sufficiently motivated to search out or found groups which can express their difficulties and find solutions. Such groups as the various Single-Parent Associations serve this function. No registry exists and many parents would resist being counted. The very pressure of being an "adequate parent", fulfilling the traditional role of the two-parent model - breadwinner and nurturer - prevents this.

21. The more concerned and conscientious may join groups; the hidden element struggle alone, with energies used in earning a living and child rearing and with no spokesman.

22. The categories of poverty for the general population encompass the single parent. The following statement from the Social Policies for Canada pinpoints their distinction: "A person is poverty-stricken when he is full of a deep sense of inequality and feels chronic exclusion and alienation from the wider society in which he lives".⁷

23. The single parent may fall, as well, into categories of crisis poverty due to temporary setbacks such as illness (their own or their children's) or inner-city poverty, since they would fall into the category of 50% of families headed by women who belong to the low-income class.⁸

24. The recent re-discovery and recognition of poverty or groups of poverty-risks indicates a concern for these families, and suggests that the services provided are inadequate for the needs. General public awareness of this is increasing. Bibliographies and books, conference themes and learned papers have emerged recently on the topic. On December 18, 1969, the Toronto Telegram headline "One-Parent Home Problem Grows" publicized the problem.

25. At the outset we therefore RECOMMEND that a Government-sponsored in-depth study be undertaken on 'Problems of Women Heads of Families', to discover the underlying causes of family breakdowns and means of providing assistance to the mothers of such families.

EFFECTS ON CHILDREN

26. It is our submission that the family, defined as "a stable union of man and woman together with their child or children" is the basic unit of Canadian society, and when this stability is threatened, its effects can be disastrous to this and future generations.

27. "The fact that the family is the most common economic unit in our society is often forgotten, and the importance to society of the family's economic viability is frequently not fully realized. If the potential abilities of members of the family remain undeveloped and unused, the family members may not only become virtual nonparticipants in the nation's social and economic life, but also a continuing burden on the society".⁹

28. The biblical proverb "The rich man's wealth is his stronghold, poverty is the poor man's undoing"¹⁰ is probably the clearest reason why children from the fatherless welfare family face a 90% higher chance of becoming delinquent than children who grow up in either middle class or two-parent families.¹¹ Only one out of eight "poor" children completes high school, or less; yet if they were to become university graduates, only 1% would ever require rehabilitation or preventative welfare of any kind.¹²

29. The following is quoted verbatim from the submission of a mother in receipt of welfare and raising her family without assistance from her husband:

30. "The children whose father has deserted them and will not pay for their support are mainly the ones I can speak for, having lived in these conditions, and have lived among these children.Before the father left,they have.....been subjected in most cases to mental, verbal, emotional, and possibly physical abuse for a varying amount of time.They are therefore left with a negative father image, and a poor image of men in general. The contact is mainly with the mother until about the age of six, when they enter school and are taught by women teachers throughout elementary school. Every child should have some idea of what a decent man is like, to pattern their own lives after, or else they are in a quandary about what the roles of a man are. Often as many welfare children are forced through economic repression to live in slums and ghettoes, the "big man" is the successful criminal and the man to fear and hate is the policeman and the social worker.

31. "The majority of teachers seem to either consciously or unconsciously assume that children from broken welfare homes will be problematic, and tend to treat these children differently....Then usually at a later date, hostility and rebellion against the teacher results.

"Welfare children, never having had the opportunity of material or cultural enrichment find it extremely difficult to relate to a curriculum geared always toward the white collar, happy, well-balanced ideal family unit depicted in almost all primary school work. Things, taken completely for granted in an affluent society - car rides, vacations, picnics, zoos, nice fathers, new clothes, new Christmas toys, are completely foreign to children who have never had these advantages. By way of T.V., the news media, and other children they see how some people live, and, as they see these normal things always kept just beyond their grasp, they become frustrated and hostile.

Often they feel, and quite rightly so, that society does not want to accept them. They will fight back.....not by getting a good education unfortunately, but by stealing or becoming a delinquent in their search for attention, thereby jeopardizing their entire lives. The schools I have seen in slum areas are almost unanimously old and run down, lacking good libraries and recreational facilities.....although it is only common sense that the poorest children are in need of the most enrichment.

32. "In my province, the welfare department does not adequately feed or clothe our children. There is nothing provided for recreational expenses, books, Christmas presents, fees or equipment for.....sports or scouts, etc. If the child were to be abandoned by his mother, and made a ward of the court, up to $85.00 per month would be paid for a foster home by the welfare department. According to the scale, a nine year old boy is allotted $21.40 for food per month, $9.30 for clothing, and $6.00 family allowance. The total is $36.70. From a monetary point of view, it is clear that the mother who would abandon her children, would benefit the child. It is not unusual for the parent to do this - not from malice nor lack of parental concern or love, but from the grim statistics that their children will have the opportunity of not only having two foster parents, but more than double his food and clothing allowance. This seems incredible.

33. "Young people from grade seven up must use large (about 10" x 14") triplicate forms to purchase their books and other needed supplies for school. It is not uncommon for their social status to be clearly announced over the P.A. system. 'All welfare students are reminded to come to the office for their vouchers at 3:30'. The average young student will not get up and be humiliated in front of his friends and teachers, but if he does he is not yet finished. He must have this large voucher filled and signed by the teacher or principal, then go to the department stores to have the order filled and signed by the department manager. This creates extra paper work and time, and often the harried teachers and clerks take out their anger by insulting the young student. This is another incredible and expensive lack of concern, as the youngster, rather than face humiliation, ostracization, and/or verbal abuse by his teacher and peer group, will often drop out of school. It follows of course that he is now a high school drop-out, unskilled in any trade and therefore with no future in the labour market. With time on their hands, few friends, a poor home environment and no money or job, these kids often get into trouble. He is then, of course, back to where he started, on some type of welfare. (Note: The facts set out in this paragraph are not isolated examples. See Economic Council 6th Annual Review, p.118)

34. "It is at about this time the welfare department will step in to "rehabilitate" the young teenager.....Retraining courses, hairdressing, barbering, etc. are given, some counselling, proper clothing, and spending money is allotted.The young person by this time is usually too bitter...confused and disillusioned to cooperate or benefit from any program. This isa waste of the tax dollar, when a few years earlier the same tax dollar could have kept the young poor out of trouble. From past experience, welfare departments must have known that they should have started remedial aid to help the entire family at an earlier date, before the psychological damage was almost irreparable.

"Possibly the most important recommendation I could make would be to suggest to let the child become involved in his own fate. Far too often, "experts" try to guide, police and watch the welfare child's family. As a welfare mother of seven children I know that people on welfare are just as intelligent, just as sensitive, just as "human" as anyone else.If we were receiving our support cheques directly from our husbands, society would not feel that we needed to be watched, and this causes a lot of misunderstanding and resentments within the family."

35. While the foregoing is quoted from a personal experience and details vary from province to province, it nonetheless demonstrates the fundamental effects on children who are often shunned by a thoughtless society and who therefore risk becoming the welfare generation of tomorrow. We submit that continuation of poverty in a country as wealthy as Canada, with its long-term effects, is expensive in the long view, and Canadians have a moral obligation to future generations.

36. While recognizing that provision of welfare does not solve the problem, we nevertheless RECOMMEND that benefit coverage should be extended in all provinces to include items essential to an adequate standard of living, related to the cost of living in the province.

37. Young people from poverty-welfare environment often suffer emotional distresses, which, if treated, could hopefully be overcome, allowing the youth to become a happy well-adjusted citizen. The amount varies from province to province, but as much as $35.00 per day is being paid to institutions for the care of emotionally disturbed youngsters, often from welfare families. We therefore RECOMMEND a greater development and collaboration of community services involving public welfare departments, schools, hospitals, and the Canadian Mental Health Association in the promotion of an increasing number of group therapy facilities to establish a total health service.

38. A weekly outing, with a man or senior student who would act as a substitute father, is vital to the child on welfare whose male image is negative. We therefore RECOMMEND that whatever assistance is necessary be given to organizations such as the Big Brother Movement to provide this very essential service.

INDIANS AND ESKIMOS

39. We submit that basically the poverty that affects the Indian and Eskimo woman is no different from that which affects women of other ethnic groups in Canada. It is inherent in our position that all people have the same basic needs. We understand that the loneliness, depression, and despair that so often are the companions of women who are suffering from unfulfilled needs - material, spiritual or emotional - are the same for Indian, Eskimo, Negro or White.

40. However, because at least 81% of the indigenous population share the stresses of poverty, the problem is compounded in that it is very difficult for a native woman to see a way out of her position, or even to find another native individual living in the depressed area who has accomplished some improvement in her standard of living and sets an example by showing what can be done. Added to the basic problems of poverty are the grave injustices which have been and are still being done to all native people by the systematic undermining and belittling of their cultural history, their customs and languages.

41. Most often the native woman shoulders her responsibilities alone, for any of a multitude of reasons. Their way of life demands that men be absent from the home to go elsewhere to find work and they cannot afford to take their families with them. They hunt or trap; they are sent away for training, often creating a gap between her experience and that of her husband when he does return; patients requiring hospitalization usually must be sent away from their own areas. Frequently the burden the native man carries becomes unbearable and he gives up; it is the woman who is left to cope with the on-going family problems.

42. The average life expectancy of an Indian woman in Canada is 25 years, and the infant mortality rate among Eskimos is more than 10 times the infant death rate for the population as a whole.¹³ It is unrealistic therefore to assume that all women in Canada today are given the same opportunity to achieve a decent standard of living, for themselves and their children. Beyond the cares the native woman has for herself and her family are the difficulties she faces in a society which considers her and her people at the bottom of the heap in every way - not only in an economic, educational and physical health sense, but also in the sense of social, moral and individual worth.

Special Senate Committee

43. The following are some specific RECOMMENDATIONS for changing the situation in which the indigenous woman in Canada finds herself today. It must be emphasized that all of these recommendations are considered urgent and should be carried out without imposing the standards of the white man and in consultation with the people involved - both the native woman and the institutions.

- (1) While material help is necessary and important, it is submitted that more emphasis is needed in individual counselling of women heads of families and their children, and that this personal service should be the main part of the program;
- (2) More possibilities for education and job training for women heads of families while receiving assistance with fees and living costs, and the establishment of convenient day care and/or homemaking services;
- (3) Motivation provided by the Indian Affairs Branch towards the involvement in various community activities to encourage contact with other people, such as workshops providing self-help for women in caretaker systems. These educational workshops could deal with the causes of poverty, and the psychology of women enmeshed in the situation.

44. The members of our committee charged with obtaining information on poverty among the indigenous families headed by a woman alone have compiled many examples which illustrate not only this situation but also the difficulties of the native poor generally, and in some instances the plight of poverty-stricken families whether Indian, Eskimo or White. While it is outside the scope of the brief, we felt that these cases might be of interest to your committee and have included them as an addendum.

UNMARRIED MOTHERS

45. There is a need for growing reality of specific vulnerable groups as poverty-risks. There is some evidence that unmarried mothers are retaining their children. While this acknowledgment of her responsibility may be a desirable trend, it does require corresponding acceptance by the community of the necessity to meet the special needs of these one-parent families.

46. In one particular province the number of unmarried mothers has increased by 10% per year in the last ten years despite the general decline in the birth rate, indicating a general increase in the problem. In this same province, 30.9% of women receiving Mothers; Allowance in urban centres are mothers of children born out of wedlock.¹⁴

47. We RECOMMEND that maternity benefits, including hospital care, be provided under the Medicare Plan in those provinces where these benefits are not now covered.

DESERTION AND MAINTENANCE OF FAMILIES

48. One topic which was suggested frequently by our members for inclusion in this brief was that of the deserting father. Another was the difficulty of enforcing judgments when the deserting father moves from one province to another. On these subjects the comments were not dealing in generalities, but citing cases all across Canada of which members had personal knowledge. Often separated and unmarried mothers run into problems when endeavouring to establish eligibility for General Welfare Assistance, Mothers' Allowance and Supplementary Aid.

49. It is submitted that the Federal Government authorities should investigate more closely the problem of the man who leaves his family thereby creating a financial burden for his wife and/or the community. Consideration should be given to laws on a Federal basis which would allow these fathers to be traced either through their income tax returns or through their Social Security numbers.

50. It is RECOMMENDED that within the Department of Justice a branch be established to which any court in the land which orders support for a mother and family, whether through separation, divorce or desertion, would submit the name and Social Security number of the father, along with the amount of monthly payments and the location of the family concerned. This would allow the deserting father to be traced and appropriate collection proceedings taken.

51. It is further RECOMMENDED that the law be amended to make it mandatory that irresponsible fathers who desert their families be forced to contribute to the support of this family until all children are of age to support themselves, and, as a deterrent to establishing a second family, legally or illegally, the first family should supersede any other families.

52. Court enforcement procedures employed as a qualification for welfare, places the onus of proving need on the mother, already physically and emotionally burdened. It is submitted that this requirement should be relaxed.

53. It is submitted that some consideration be given to families who are attempting to become established financially after difficult years, and it is therefore RECOMMENDED that a study be made of the possibility of income taxes being pro-rated over a five to ten year period. While this has a general application, it would be of particular benefit to the deserted woman struggling to raise her family.

DAY CARE CENTRES

54. Because the need for day care centres was so consistently voiced in the opinions submitted to our committee, it was decided to treat this topic as a separate heading.

55. In many instances the mother of the family suddenly becomes its head and must seek employment, and often retraining, if she and her dependents are to exist without becoming a liability by going on welfare. If she has small children, the burden of caring for them while she works must be eased. The pre-schoolers need care all day, and other children need care at lunch time and after school.

56. Day care is a service for any child who is threatened with neglect during any part of the day. The service is needed by many millions of children from homes that are well-to-do and homes that are poverty stricken, from homes that are broken or disrupted in communities that are urban, suburban, or rural.

At times it is felt that the child needing actual home environment should be cared for in her own home and this day care service is provided where a day care mother looks after the pre-school children in their own home all day, and the school-age children after school.

57. The need for day care service by mothers who must work and those who require re-training prior to work is so obvious that it will probably be included in every brief presented to this committee. The demand for the service is so consistent that provision of an extensive day care centre service is considered to be one of the most urgent requests of our organization.

It is clearly established that there is a shortage of day care facilities throughout the country and competent help for the in-home care is almost impossible to secure, even in emergency situations, particularly within the means of the female head of a family on welfare, or living on a minimal salary.

58. With the aid now being offered by the Canada Assistance Act, it is RECOMMENDED that municipalities be encouraged to set up day care centres, and those which already have them be encouraged to increase the number. Industries might provide nursery accommodation for small children whose mothers work in their factories, and indeed it is possible that many of the mothers concerned could be given training and find employment in the care of these children, whether in home or in established centres. (See also 65(b))

GENERAL WELFARE ASSISTANCE

especially if solely subsidized by the government. To remedy some of the multi-problems confronting women heads of families, it is imperative that existing government benefits be updated to meet present day needs.

60. We submit that the recipient of such benefits should be given every incentive to work and not be penalized if she seeks employment to supplement her allowance. This could be the means by which she could retain her dignity, allowing her to purchase much needed household equipment or repairs to her home.

61. In 1963 a joint study (by the departments of Public Welfare of the Province of Ontario and the City of Toronto) of Long Term Assistance Families was undertaken, and it was proved effectively in a demonstration project that families can be moved to independence and improved circumstances through concentrated services. "Of 100 long-term assistance families, 21 found continuing employment, 21 others also left the municipal rolls and in 54 of the remaining cases some definite benefit was experienced."¹⁵

62. It is therefore RECOMMENDED that current government programs and policies should be improved to cope more effectively with the problems of women heads of families living in poverty in Canada by

- (a) more re-training and rehabilitation programs for untrained welfare mothers, and
- (b) provision of supplementary income or greater tax exemption for baby-sitting costs, thus providing more motivation to self-support for working mothers with inadequate incomes.

Such programs would eventually benefit all Canadians since the number of welfare recipients would be decreased by a sizeable number.

63. Greater emphasis placed on the importance of family life through pre-marriage courses would be an asset in prevention of future broken homes because adolescents would be better prepared for marriage. Many young people today have not learned home management, how to handle family finances, basic child care, etc., with the result that they have difficulty maintaining a good family relationship after marriage, and for a substantial number of young people these difficulties become serious to the point of requiring appearance in court. We therefore re-affirm a resolution passed at our 1969 National convention RECOMMENDING to the Departments of Education of the Provinces of Canada a serious study of the possibility of implementing such a course of study in the two grades prior to the legal age for leaving school. Such courses as these would assist young people in acquiring the knowledge and understanding of themselves and others needed to make intelligent decisions now and in the future, and could only benefit the social structures of our country.

64. Since opportunities for self improvement are vital emotionally and culturally to women heads of families, an educational program for small groups of women who intellectually and socially consider themselves misfits in larger organized community groups would be greatly beneficial. We therefore submit that every encouragement, including grants if necessary, be given to volunteer organizations such as Parents Without Partners and Single Parents Associated in their efforts to provide such programs.

65. It is further submitted that projects and programs be undertaken at the local government level to assist sole support mothers through assistance to them as consumers of goods rather than of services. This group falls within the definition of poverty in that over 70% and often as high as 100% of income is spent on subsistence items of food, shelter and clothing. Instruction in purchasing techniques, budgeting and nutrition, as well as homemaking skills, is often required. This kind of training has been proven valuable by projects undertaken in Metro Toronto in 1969.

- (a) Groups which require attention in this category include those in-migrant women and immigrant women who have hopefully followed the fathers of their children to the large urban centres. These women are doubly disadvantaged due to cultural barriers and/or language barriers and for them the new way of life in a large urban area is complex and confusing. In the City of Toronto a successful project was undertaken with the Settlement Houses to educate immigrant welfare mothers in homemaking skills. It is our submission that this kind of program should be continued and expanded.

- (b) In the West Central area the Department of Public Welfare, in cooperation with George Brown Community College, used a mobile van equipped as a classroom to involve those women on welfare who sought re-training. The course offered prepared them to operate day-care centres by providing training in child care management, and served the dual purpose of personal education and training for employment.

66. Since the cost of living has constantly increased in the last 18 years and personal exemptions for income tax purposes do not adhere to this factor, we again urgently RECOMMEND to the Federal Government the consideration of an increase in the basic exemption under the Federal Income Tax Act from the present $1,000 to $2,000, thereby giving assistance to those Canadians in the low income bracket. This provision would be of particular assistance to the woman head of a family on a minimal income.

HOUSING

67. Adequate low cost housing was consistently requested, often demanded, by our members who submitted opinions for this brief. Pressure for the single parent to find low cost adequate shelter is an additional financial strain. Indeed, inadequate housing has been given as the reason in some instances for the breakdown of the family structure.

68. The Catholic Women's League of Canada has repeatedly expressed its concern for the welfare of the family, pointing out the right of all Canadians to the fundamental essentials of food, clothing and shelter through resolutions to the Federal Government in 1967 and 1968, and now reaffirms these RECOMMENDATIONS in this brief, as follows:

- (1) We RECOMMEND that legislation be enacted immediately to permit home owners to deduct mortgage interest payments from their income for the compilation of income tax; and
- (2) We further RECOMMEND that the National Housing Act be extended to allow for a program of rental supplements to families living in rented accommodation other than public housing.

This latter program was demonstrated successfully in a project undertaken in the City of Toronto in 1966 when 54 families, accounting for over 200 children, were accommodated for a year for $20,000.¹⁶ Our organization undertook responsibility for an additional 2 families under this program, thereby preventing the disruption of the lives of 15 children for the period of the project.

69. Presently in one large urban area, where a housing crisis exists, nearly three years is required from the initiation of a housing project to its completion. A plan must pass a total of 52 desks in the three levels of Government before it is approved for construction.¹⁷ Steps should be taken to streamline this procedure with a view to providing adequate reasonably priced homes for more Canadians in the shortest period of time. This could be facilitated by amending antiquated municipal building by-laws to permit new and cheaper methods of construction, using modern and more economic materials.

CONCLUSION

70. There are more than sufficient resources in Canada at this precise moment to change the many faces of poverty. If, while definitions and causes are being studied, Canadians are hungry, without shelter and clothing, it is indeed imperative that each of us, in whatever position of influence, power and authority, after considering well the problem, say sincerely:

Special Senate Committee

"I am only one, but I am one.

I can't do everything but I can do something.

What I can do I ought to do,

And by the grace of God, what I ought to do I will do.

'Let me do it while I can.

No delay, for it is plain

I shall not pass this way again'" Anon

All of which is respectfully submitted

In this brief the following RECOMMENDATIONS for the assistance of women, heads of families are respectfully submitted:

- 1.....that a Government-sponsored in-depth study be undertaken on "Problems of Women Heads of Families" to discover the underlying causes of family breakdowns and means of providing assistance to the mothers of such families;
- 2.....that benefit coverage should be extended in all provinces to include items essential to an adequate standard of living, related to the cost of living in the province;
- 3.....a greater development and collaboration of community services involving public welfare departments, schools, hospitals and the Canadian Mental Health Association in the promotion of an increasing number of group therapy facilities to establish a total health service;
- 4.....that whatever assistance is necessary be given to organizations such as the Big Brother Movement to provide this very essential service;
- 5.....(a) more emphasis placed in individual counselling of indigenous women heads of families and their children
 - (b) more possibilities for education and job training while receiving assistance with fees and living costs
 - (c) Motivation provided by the Indian Affairs Branch towards involvement in various community activities to encourage contact with other people, such as workshops providing self-help for women in care-taker systems.
- 6.....maternity benefits, for unmarried mothers, including hospital care, be provided under the Medicare Plan in those provinces where these benefits are not now covered;
- 7.....within the Department of Justice, a branch be established to which any court in the land which orders support for a mother and family, would submit the name and Social Security number of the father, along with the amount of monthly payments and the location of the family concerned;
- 8.....that the law be amended to make it mandatory that irresponsible fathers who desert their families be forced to contribute to the support of this family until all children are of age to support themselves, and as a deterrent to establishing a second family, legally or illegally, the first family should supersede any other families;
- 9.....that a study be made of the possibility of income taxes being pro-rated over a five to ten year period;
- 10.....that municipalities be encouraged to set up day care centres, and those which already have them be encouraged to increase the number:
- 11.....that current government programs and policies should be improved to cope more effectively with the problems of women heads of families by (a) more re-training and rehabilitation programs for untrained welfare mothers and (b) provision of supplementary income or greater tax exemption for baby-sitting costs, thus providing more motivation to self-support for working mothers with inadequate incomes;

- 12.....to the Departments of Education of the Provinces of Canada a serious study of the possibility of implementing such a course of study (pre-marriage courses in home management and child care etc.) in the two grades prior to the legal age for leaving school;
- 13.....to the Federal Government the consideration of an increase in the basic exemption under the Federal Income Tax Act from the present $1000 to $2000;
- 14.....(a) that legislation be enacted immediately to permit home owners to deduct mortgage interest payments from their income for the compilation of income tax; and

(b) that the National Housing Act be extended to allow for a program of rental supplements to families living in rental accommodation other than public housing.

ADDENDUM

The information which follows is quoted from reports of two committee members whose work is with the Indian, Metis and Eskimo population of their communities.

1. In the Provincial Government's C-12 report, issued in 1967 for the north-eastern section of Alberta, we find that out of 757 houses surveyed, 627 or 82.8% lacked any modern conveniences. 300 of these houses were one-room dwellings and 179 were two room dwellings, indicating that 63.1% are substandard on the basis of space available alone.

2. A survey was carried out at Kikino Metis Colony in 1967 by the Human Resources Development Authority. Of the adult female population, only 22.9% had more than primary education, compared to the provincial average of 56%.

3. Looking at the admissions to correctional institutions in one province, 74% of all female prisoners are of native descent.

4. All of these matters are more difficult to cope with by the woman who is the one to shoulder responsibility for the entire family.

5. In order to promote greater understanding, some specific examples of the difficulties encountered by the indigenous woman and her children in Canada today are listed, as reported to one of our committee members during her interviews researching this submission.

- (1) Attention was called to an article in the Edmonton Journal of December 13, 1969: To quote a book written for children and given to this writer when he was young - "The Red Indians were fierce and cruel howling savages". Nothing was said about Caucasian savages who slaughtered Indians, not in isolated incidents, but more or less as a matter of policy.
- (2) An Indian woman reports: (a) that she studied the reactions of children watching television, and then play acting. The Indian children all wanted to be the cowboy - no one wanted to be the Indian; and (b) "At an Indian hostel where part of our recreation (for 67 students) was movies, I have seen students hostile and emotionally and physically sick after being shown a movie that degraded the Indian and left no room to believe that the Indian people had contributed anything except cruelty, treachery, murder, etc."; and (c) "In the encounter with Indian teenagers who are disturbed I find it takes a long time to help the person to think in a positive manner about his or her future. 'My mother doesn't read or write' and 'What's the use - I'm Indian and I just can't make it'."
- (3) Eskimo culture is not downgraded by the mass media in the same way as that of the Indian, but the Eskimo person is still often treated as a less than human representative of a primitive group. The well publicized stereotype of the Eskimo is one of a cheerful gnome, industrious, and in some mysterious manner endowed with mechanical genius. This does not allow the Eskimo to be an individual human being with his own personality traits.

- (4) Eskimo children are still sent away to residential schools or to schools in southern Canada where they live the white man's way and learn nothing of Eskimo traditions, or even respect for Eskimo culture. It is reported that one boy returned home after his year at school and refused to go hunting with his father, to eat food from the land, to wear clothes his mother made for him, or speak his own language. How difficult to bridge a generation gap already wide enough, when the mother speaks scanty English and the child no Eskimo.

6. Further examples in specific communities are the following:

- (a) "In one community a major problem is welfare. A report says, "some of our people don't get enough welfare to feed a chicken". A woman with two small children, who asked for a clothing order, was told to go out and work. Even if there was work, should a mother with two small kids go to work? She applied to keep boarders who were taking up-grading courses. She was told she lived too far from the school: three blocks!! What kind of nonsense is this? Another mother with small children got a clothing order. The Welfare told her they would deduct, this amount from her monthly cheque at the rate of $25 per month until it was paid back. This will leave her with only $100 a month, of which she pays $60 for rent and $20 for fuel. Also, they would like to see something done about hospitalization. It is too much for the Indian and Metis families to pay.
- (b) "Houses need to be modernized. Many homes (government built) look nice on the outside. Enter one and you will see a home with no power, no running water, no toilet facilities - wood-burning stoves for cooking and heat, and walls so thin you could put your fist through with little effort.Kerosene and coal oil lamps are a novelty in a city, but in most Indian-Metis homes they are a necessity. Have you ever enjoyed the morning routine of entering your own bathroom? Well, one should be as lucky as the Northern Indian and natives who rise and in winter receive the bonus of tingling fresh air, a jaunty morning walk and outdoor plumbing like that of the first white settlers.

"Some general explanations are given within the Indian and Metis community today concerning their health conditions. The foods on which the Indians once lived are no longer available, or at the very least, difficult to acquire. Protein-rich game and fish resources, the nutritious wild plants, greens, nuts, fruits are depleted. The introduction of European foods into these formerly balanced ecological systems removed game sources, diverted or reduced water supplies, and provided as replacements are the staples available on market shelves, most often at considerable distances from Reservations. The substitution of white flour for the staple acorn meal, made inroads upon health and resistance to disease, according to medical practitioners in pediatrics and dietetics. Another major cause of disease currently, is that proper medical care is not available to the Indian people, particularly those in the rural areas and on or near Reservations."

7. It was suggested by these committee members that existing controls be enforced in the mass media concerning programming or publication of materials that are derogatory or defamatory to the Indian and Eskimo culture and people, and that emphasis be given in the education of all Canadians in an understanding of how the present situation developed, with increasing efforts through the activities of the Indian Affairs Branch to develop a sense of wider horizons for the individual Indian and Eskimo woman, head of a family.

8. Over two hundred thousand Indian Canadians - the descendants of our original inhabitants - now live outside the main stream of their native country. They are deprived of the social justice, human dignity, and the equality of opportunity which other twentieth century Canadians claim as their heritage.

9. Our organization supports the following recommendation of The Economic Council of Canada, published in its 5th Annual Review (page 124):

It would also appear useful to initiate an immediate study of federal and provincial legislation and administrative practices affecting native peoples. Two main objects of such a study would be to avoid allowing compelling needs to remain unmet because they fall between jurisdictions, and to identify instances where existing aid programs are not well-adapted to meeting the particular problems of Indian reservations and similar areas.

And we further trust that an immediate survey will be conducted of health conditions and medical needs both as scientifically determined and as defined by the Indian community at large.

The foregoing is respectfully submitted in the hope that it will be of some assistance to the Committee in its investigation of over-all poverty in Canada.

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Thursday, March 5, 1970

The Special Senate Committee on Poverty met this day at 9 a.m.

Senator Edgar Fournier (Deputy Chairman) in the Chair.

The Deputy Chairman: Members of the committee, as you know, the chairman, Senator Croll, is in Toronto today. I shall do my best to keep the meeting going in the right direction.

We are privileged this morning to have with us two gentlemen from the Ontario Welfare Council. On my immediate right is Mr. Trevor Pierce, who is the Executive Director of the Ontario Welfare Council. He is a graduate of the University of Wales in Social Science.

Next to Mr. Pierce is Mr. J. H. Craigs, the Welfare Director of the Ontario Federation of Labour. He is a member of the Executive Committee and the Board of Directors of the Ontario Welfare Council, and also a member of the Board of Directors of the Family Service Association of Metropolitan Toronto.

Gentlemen, we shall not ask you to read your brief because it has already been read and studied by the members of the committee, but perhaps you would give us a resumé and a brief history of your organization, after which you will be open to questions from the committee.

Mr. Trevor Pierce, Executive Director, Ontario Welfare Council: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman and honourable senators. It is a privilege for us also to be here to meet with you and offer some of our thinking on behalf of the Ontario Welfare Council. I should like to take just a few minutes, if I may, to highlight some of the concerns that we have.

It is important, perhaps, to make clear the context in which we appear here. As a voluntary provincial organization in Ontario our experience is inevitably related to this province, but perhaps some of this experience might be useful to you.

We should like to make reference to the fact that during the past year at our provincial conference and annual meeting we invited for the first time in our history—and we are over 60 years old as an organization—consumers of the social services, people in receipt of public assistance and the working poor, as well as professionals who are concerned with the administration of services, volunteers from a variety of voluntary organizations concerned with human need in the province, and representatives of the provincial and municipal governments, to talk in general about the social need in Ontario. In order to focus discussion we had at that conference four workshop sessions over a three-day period, where these kinds of people were able to discuss with each other ways and means of improving services, identifying need, and so on. These workshops focused on poverty, housing, Indians and youth.

The Deputy Chairman: When did that take place?

Mr. Pierce: This took place in May, 1969. We were surprised, in fact overwhelmed by the response to our invitation for this variety of participants to attend our conference. Their interest was such that at our annual meeting, which took place on the last day of our conference, it was decided that the traditional method of electing members to the board of directors was challenged. We accepted nominations from the floor and four recipients of service were elected in a democratic fashion to our board. Our experience with the participation of these people on our board of directors and committees since that time has been very helpful.

We would like to emphasize that there is some experience in trying to bring together those who have special needs but have not, generally speaking, had an opportunity to participate in discussion of the policies and programs that affect their lives. Another point to which attention should be drawn and which is implicit in the material that we have sent out is that as a provincial organization our main concern is to endeavour to influence public social policy in Ontario. This involves not only our broad membership, but communities and people across Ontario. In this context we draw on the experience not only of the voluntary organizations, but also that of governments at different levels.

One of the concerns very clearly expressed by a variety of people at our conference was repeated in our brief to the provincial government, which was presented to the Minister of Social and Family Services at the end of January. It is essentially the same brief as we have submitted to this committee. We are concerned about jurisdictional problems in connection with those of poverty. There is a tendency for governments at different levels to see the weaknesses in other areas. There are jurisdictional problems connected with the involvement of the federal Government, largely in the area of cost sharing. This is particularly so far a municipality which in Ontario has the responsibility of administering the General Welfare Assistance Act. This is mandatory on the municipality yet the municipal Government has limited opportunity to make decisions as to what it can do or cannot do. There are some real problems in this jurisdictional area, where the responsibilities of different levels of government tend to create conflict and impede progress in the development of social policy and programs.

Another point which is implicit in our brief is that while we refer to the social welfare programs which are related to a variety of categories of citizens in need, most of these programs require an eligibility test before individuals can benefit from them. We are concerned about the fact that the working poor are denied service very often because they do not qualify under the variety of categorical programs. We are fully aware that this point has been made several times, but our concern is in relation to bringing together the variety of interests in the Province of Ontario. One example of this occurred at our provincial conference last May, where we tried to bring people together for similar purposes in relation to the implementation of the Canada Assistance Plan in Ontario. We have organized meetings across the province in different localities each time, instead of having them at one focal point. These meetings were arranged in municipalities and the experience was different in each. We not only invited the social agencies, both voluntary and public, but elected representatives of the people at the municipal, provincial and federal levels.

The recipients of service and the working poor came to discuss their reaction to the Plan and how it might best be implemented in Ontario. One of the conclusions derived from the meetings is that there is a tremendous amount of ignorance concerning responsibilities and relationships, not only in the area of government, but in that of the relationship between voluntary agencies and public departments, whether they be municipal, provincial or federal.

There are also attitudes towards poverty and the responsibility of the individual for his own well-being. As a result of these meetings we found that these attitudes towards the poor, those who are really unable and unwilling to accept responsibility, do not appear in one particular segment of society. We discovered, for instance, that even amongst the poor themselves there was evidence of an attitude towards other poor, particularly the working poor. We found that there is a tremendous need for discussion and dialogue involving this type of people.

This is the first time that we have been able to bring together in Ontario a federal member of Parliament and a provincial legislator in an open session where the public are present, followed by more limited sessions where administrators of welfare service talked to recipients. In referring to the involvement of people, we are as concerned with providing an opportunity for the silent—I do not know whether these are the silent majority or the silent minority—but, as I am sure we are all aware, there has been a strong trend towards groups of citizens who are taking an aggressive and active interest in their own affairs trying to influence public policy. We have had individuals from these groups within our own organization, but we are concerned that we should also invite the less vocal to discuss their problems. We hope to be able to continue this educational process so that a greater variety of people, at least in our province—we hope that this might be reflected across the country—will have a better understanding of the problems arising from jurisdictional responsibilities and of the nature of poverty and human need, and will be able to find ways of overcoming some of these difficulties, to relieve poverty and need with a variety of innovative programs.

Mr. Chairman, those are the main points that I wanted to make as a general background. We have not set out to document this in statistical terms. First of all, we do not have the resources to do it, and we felt our main concern as a voluntary provincial organization was to pinpoint some of the kinds of problems we have illustrated. We would be very happy to elaborate on any of these points, and I am sure that Mr. Craigs would, from his vast experience, be able to add to those I have made.

Senator Person: May I ask a question now?

The Deputy Chairman: It is up to you, but I suggest that we now hear Mr. Craigs and then start the questions.

Senator Pearson: I just wanted to know how extensive the voluntary organization was throughout Ontario. Does it cover it completely, west to, say, Kenora and Sudbury?

Mr. Pierce: Perhaps the simplest way to answer that is to say that we are currently working on a series of company type conferences, but it is related to the effort to get people involved in a public discussion centered on the social needs in Ontario. With the provincial government we are, as partners, co-sponsoring a series of regional conferences, with their staff and our staff working together. The first will be in about three weeks time. This year we will have six of these. There will be three in Northern Ontario, one in Kenora, one in Thunder Bay, covering the whole of the northwest. Obviously, this is very general, but we are a provincial organization and try to stimulate interest locally. The other meeting will be in Sudbury next September. These plans are well under way, and will include the districts of Algoma, Sudbury and Manitoulin. We are using places like community colleges, which is a new type of resource in our province, and we are reaching out to a variety of agencies, both public and private. In Southern Ontario we will have a meeting in the Guelph-Wellington area, another in the Peel and Halton area. There is a varied composition in the eastern area, where we will have one in Belleville involving four counties. Again there is public and voluntary participation and things are going really well. If that does not answer the question, I would be glad to elaborate on it further.

Senator Pearson: How do you supply the news of war to this organization?

Mr. Pierce: In terms of dollars, we are financed partly by United Appeals across Ontario. Last year, out of a budget of approximately $120,000 we had $65,000 from United Appeals, but the Toronto United Appeal provided almost $40,000 of that. We have not been as successful as we would like to be in persuading others to support us. The provincial government makes a grant of $28,000 a year. We get roughly ten per cent from the membership. We have some endowments here and there, and we have a very small amount, depending on what we are asked to do, from fees for services and so on; if we undertake a study for an agency or a community, sometimes they are able to make a contribution towards our costs.

Senator Pearson: Thank you.

The Deputy Chairman: Mr. Craigs.

Mr. J. H. Craigs, Member, Executive Committee and Board of Directors, Ontario Welfare Council: Mr. Chairman, honourable senators, I do not propose to say a great deal. Perhaps most of what I will say is explanatory more than anything else. The organization I have the honour to represent is the Ontario Federation of Labour, which as a trade union organization accounts for 600,000 trade union members in the Province of Ontario. It will be no surprise to you that my comments will focus primarily on what are generally described as "the working poor".

The dilemma of the working poor is extremely serious, primarily because they exist in an area in which they literally balance on the razor's edge; the margin separating them from total catastrophe, both economic, social, familial and everything else, is a very real thing. It is ironic that the working poor are subject to the most exploitation. In spite of legislation purporting to protect people from exploitation, there is nevertheless a great deal of human sweat expended.

The problem of the working poor is that when they do work, they invariably work in small enterprises and small operations, where it is extremely difficult for surveillance by government inspectors of one kind or another to reach. In larger industrial plants infractions relating to health, working conditions, minimum wages and so on are relatively easy to spot and police. However, in the garment industry, for example, although it has done a commendable job in some respects, there are a great many of what we call sweat shops, a term that will not be strange to you. There are also in this category bakeries, all sorts of jobbing enterprises, small contractors, sub-contractors—the list is almost endless.

The working poor are seriously exploited, and in addition, any kind of domestic trouble with recalcitrant children, illness and so on leads to a situation in which the family unit can easily and simply be destroyed in a remarkably short time, which in turn merely produces more social problems.

The problem of the low wage income worker is, of course, overtime and strain. The demand for more and more work in order to provide better income leads to the second job—working all day and driving a taxi at night. Here again there is a very real danger that the family is literally, as I said before, living on the razor's edge.

It is also ironic that the working poor are very difficult to organize. They work in small units. Usually they are widely scattered. Even where organization has taken place in spite of some rather difficult legislation in the province, the servicing of these people is very expensive and difficult. The result is that, in spite of the best efforts of trade unions, it is very difficult to raise the level of these people's income sufficiently to remove the danger in which they always live.

In making provision for future income, retirement income via pensions, it is difficult for the small employer to fund the pensions, with the result that where they do exist the pensions are usually too meagre for either present or future needs. The Ontario Federation of Labour is extremely concerned about these problems. It realizes that we have an overlapping in which we have provincial and, of course, federal jurisdiction. There is also the question of how far the federal Government can reach down to implement legislation or programs that would alleviate the matters which I have just explained to you. That is all I have to say at the moment, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Craigs.

Senator Fergusson: I should first like to congratulate the Ontario Welfare Council for having had the vision to call into their meetings people on assistance, and the working poor. This certainly was quite an innovation. I am pleased to know that it seems to be working out and that they are contributing. I am familiar with your council, because actually I am a member, having been drawn in by belonging to the Ontario Committee on Aging, which eventually was amalgamated. Even though I belong to the council and do not contribute anything except financial aid, I do find your news letters of tremendous interest. They give us a great deal of good information. I wish to also congratulate you on your brief which will be very helpful to us.

You spoke of the three meetings in which you were going to discuss things to be done under the Canada Assistance Act, and you intimated that we have not been doing as much as we could. Have you come to any actual conclusion as to other practical things which could be done under the Canada Assistance Act that we are not doing at the present time; that is, without any further legislation at all?

Mr. Pierce: I would have to answer by saying that when we first launched this idea of meeting with communities across Ontario, in order to find out from local communities opinions as to ways of implementing the Canada Assistance Plan, we felt that we would be able to go to the provincial government and tell them that we wanted this or that. We had come to a conclusion as soon as we saw the legislation. For instance, regarding the emphasis on the possibility for developing services in the area of prevention of social deterioration and the rehabilitation of those already dependent, we saw great hopes through this piece of legislation and we were quite sure that it was the logical thing to do. We felt that this would get general support from the public at large who would not argue against a program calculated to prevent social deterioration and poverty and those who would argue against improving the social services which would rehabilitate those already dependent. We were already prepared to take to the provincial government our recommendations that this should be immediately implemented. As our discussions with the community progressed, we began to realize the ignorance about responsibilities at the federal and provincial levels. Before provisions of the Canada Assistance Plan could be implemented the provincial government had to be persuaded to do so. We also found that municipal councils had some reservations as to how quickly they would be able to move.

In Ontario, for the past five or 10 years, but particularly the last 10, there have been substantial changes in the kind of monetary assistance and implementing types of programs and improvements in public assistance programs. These have been quite substantial and we feel they have moved quickly. They have picked up on a number of recommendations over the years which the Ontario Welfare Council suggested. There has also been improvement in monetary assistance and the establishment of programs, such as visiting homemaker services and nurse services where we participated in the influence of developing this policy. We do not take full credit, because if the Ontario Welfare Council had not existed this would not have happened, but there is a relationship in the area of improving nursing home facilities, primarily for older people. We conducted a province-wide study. There have been improvements, but we have to also contend with the thinking in certain areas and certain segments of our population. This came out in our meetings. For instance, there was a morning meeting at which the local politicians were invited. They seemed more concerned about saying that many of the people who had been dependent for a long time did not want to get out of this dependency position. They gave a little lecture to the people who were there and departed. There was no real interest in participating in the discussion about their own attitudes towards the poor. They were quite convinced that they were correct and, as the leaders in that community, they were responsible for protecting the "good guys" against the "no-good guys".

In another meeting which we had, the chairman of the welfare committee of that particular municipality, which happened to have a city government, became very excited and involved in the discussion when he realized the possibilities within the existing legislation in the Province of Ontario. He said, "Let's take advantage of what we have got. Sure, I am very interested in this, but why can't we do this?" We got into discussions in which we explained that they could not really move very far in that area because there is an education program to be done. You then involved the educational system and in these meetings you found that it was necessary to provide an opportunity for people to talk to each other, including municipal welfare officials, having their own clients present. As long as they were protected from reporting in public, they were able to use illustrations, naturally not by name, in order to support their arguments. It seemed to us that for the first time there was an opportunity for the elected councillors to have an understanding of some of the problems that their own local officials were up against. The provincial representatives also had an opportunity to explain what would be possible but which the local municipalities had not implemented. When we get into this broad area of federal responsibility, which is primarily in the area of cost-sharing, they are far away.

Our experience is limited, but I know that there was sufficient evidence there to emphasize the need to pursue further this kind of discussion. We found that rather than focusing on the legislation itself, the important thing is to get people talking about the real things hurting them as individuals, for example, the working poor saying they are denied services, or the recipient of public assistance being penalized for his willingness to be rehabilitated. So there is a tremendous need, we find, for pursuing this kind of discussion.

We are continuing at the provincial level. In our brief to the provincial government we have said we feel the provincial government ought to move ahead, even though the general public may not be fully aware and fully ready. We said, for instance, that in implementing the Canada Assistance Plan in relation to extending service to the working poor, they should not be cut off. As soon as they respond to the kind of service and treatment that I think the vast majority of society would support, we immediately cut them off from further assistance. We are very concerned about this.

The recent figures from Metropolitan Toronto, I think, show approximately 30 per cent increase in the number of people, compared with December of last year, seeking assistance under the General Work Assistance Act. Those are people who have become unemployed. This puts a tremendous strain on the local municipality. Sure, it is an 80-20 sharing, with the federal Government sharing 50 per cent. But on this level the impact of this kind of change is felt. I am talking now about our particular role as the Ontario Welfare Council in Ontario. We are not suggesting that we have the answers, but in trying to bring together these various interests, we are continuously working with the provincial government, we are trying to work in a more traditional way. When we appeared before the minister at the end of January, for the first time in our history (and we thought this was responding pretty quickly) in our delegation of five, one of the recipients of assistance who was elected to the board last May—and who was in the delegation—was able to illustrate from personal experience what it meant to try to find money to repair a washing machine when the regulations under particular programs did not provide for this. She wanted to find $20 to do a job that was not specifically provided for. This was an illustration of a need to be flexible in regulations. She had some other examples. So we had the combination of perhaps more experience, the professional, intellectual, almost the professional volunteers, in our type of organization, with the very respectable type of relation with the provincial government and we had always been well received. Here we were introducing some new elements and we were trying to establish a balance. I do not think they ran scared in the other direction. We were not marching on Queen's Park yet, and we are not likely to march on Parliament Hill, it is too far, we will leave that to others. We think we succeeded. On the very fact that we are collaborating with the provincial government in going out to communities, I suppose we can be criticized for being reasonable in our approach to the provincial government and saying, "Yes, we think you ought to implement the provisions of the Canada Assistance Plan, particularly in this year, by extending preventive services and helping the working poor and helping those on assistance so that there will be some encouragement for them to accept services."

We are making this kind of representation.

Senator Carter: On that question, you talk about collaborating with the provincial government and you describe a very close working relationship with the provincial government. Who takes the initiative? Does the initiative start with the government and they ask you to do certain things; or does the initiative start with you and you take it up with the government and get their sanction? Or how does this working relationship operate? How does it start?

Mr. Pierce: We still have our provincial conference bi-annually. It was decided some four years ago that people from across Ontario would not be able to come to one spot, to Toronto; so we decided to have these regional conferences from time to time. The Ontario Welfare Council took the initiative with the provincial government and said we would like to focus these conferences on the policies and programs of the provincial government in Ontario.

We felt that, in order to provide information and discussion about what was available under provincial programs, we really needed to have the provincial government participate. There had been some reaction in the past that in our provincial conferences we were really setting up the kind of public forum where provincial officials were coming forward and then a pretty substantial group would attack the provincial officials because they were sitting ducks. Very often they were being asked to respond to criticism of policies which the civil servants were not really able to deal with—in other words, these were responsibilities of legislators.

There was some question on behalf of the department to become involved in this kind of program, so we said we agreed that there is not enough understanding of what they were doing and we encouraged the Department of Social and Family Services to work with us and they would provide their senior professional staff people to come to these conferences and they would talk about different programs available, in child welfare, in aging, in assistance, and so on.

In the first series, which was two years ago, we only had three, involving one in south-western Ontario, centred in Chatham, covering four counties; one in Cornwall, with only five counties in that area; and one in north-eastern Ontario, in Kirkland Lake.

The senior officials went and talked about these programs at the meetings. Then there was a discussion around the program. They were not the kind of conferences where the participants would attack the government for lack of progress—although this came in, too.

This year, as I have mentioned, we will have six conferences. It is interesting that the provincial government is responding to the kind of thing that we experienced last May, and we are now bringing in the recipients of service to a greater extent.

A year ago, I think the only group that might have been described as recipients of service, for these conferences—Senator Ferguson will be interested in this—was a group of senior citizens who came to a session on the needs of the aged. This was the first crack, if you like, in involving somebody other than the professional—which is a significant attempt in our collaboration in the federal-provincial work. They are very responsive to the involvement of people on public assistance and they are very eager to participate.

As a matter of fact, the first flier for our first conference went out last week, and in it they have an adapted cartoon with "people power". The provincial government is in on this, they are in on the planning, they will participate. So I think our relationship is really a very good one, and they are participating in this dialogue.

While the initiative originally was ours, it is a shared program, and we feel very good about it.

Senator Carter: I gather from what you are saying, that your council provides the vehicle or medium through which government officials and the poor people can communicate.

Mr. Pierce: We have felt that for a long time...

Senator Carter: That is the missing link in many of the problems we have come across in this committee, that there is no dialogue, no communication.

Mr. Pierce: For instance, regarding the Canada Assistance Plan, it was touch and go whether it would be passed—that was at the time of our annual meeting, and the Plan was before Parliament. At that time we had the senior people from the federal Department of Health and Welfare come to our conference to talk about that. Also at that time the provincial government was in a very difficult position to be involved in because the Canada Assistance Plan has not yet been enacted federally. So they were not able to be involved.

Now, in respect of the Canada Assistance Plan, you must be aware that we work with the provincial government and then work with the Canadian Welfare Council, and we have collaborated in all these meetings I have referred to in Ontario. With respect to the regional meetings that are now current in northern Ontario and so on, again there is a focus on the provincial programs, but this does not mean that there is not an opportunity to discuss the weaknesses, even in terms of policy, but what we feel is that the provincial government really needed to come face to face with communities and talk about the programs. We felt they had not explained sufficiently, but it was easy enough for us to act as a vehicle.

In relation to this, and this is a side issue in a sense, another example of collaboration comes to mind; the Ontario Welfare Council publishes its standard reference in Ontario, which was originally produced by my predecessor, "Ontario: Its Social Services". This was originally produced in 1953, and the provincial government has apparently felt it appropriate for us to continue to produce it. That is another example of where there is an advantage in having an organization like ours publish such a document, because in that way it is not simply a government document but, in other words, we are able to introduce some comment about the services as well.

Senator Fergusson: How many provincial welfare councils are there?

Mr. Pierce: There is apparently a new one in B.C., on which I believe we had some influence in respect of its development. It now has a full-time professional staff member. Inevitably, its role and purpose is somewhat different from ours, partly because of the very nature of the province being different, I suppose. In the province of Quebec they do not at the moment have a professional staff so they are not very active, to the best of my knowledge. In New Brunswick they did start but again I am not too sure what the present status is. For practical purposes, Ontario is the only province in which there has been any history of a provincial organization. We have been in existence for over 60 years.

Senator Fergusson: That is what I had understood. On page 5 of your brief you say that it was specifically pointed out that in Ontario low-income people have to apply to the welfare department to get day-care services, and you also go on to say that this was considered demeaning for those who had struggled hard to stay off welfare. The implication is, of course, that they were getting welfare. What I want to know is whether many applied and, if they did, did they get the services?

Mr. Pierce: I am sorry, but I cannot answer that specifically. The summary report on our meetings was done rather hurriedly, and I must apologize for that, but it is, incidentally, a reflection of the thinking of the people who attended those meetings, and I think the point they are trying to make here is related to the question of attitudes towards the poor and the needs of the poor, and that there are still many people who feel that, if they need a service like day-care services, they would like to have it in a somewhat different context than having to go to the welfare department in order to be admitted, even if they were part paid.

Let me illustrate the attitude aspect: last week when I was attending an annual meeting of a voluntary agency in Toronto there was a lady of 70 years of age sitting next to me. She had travelled to the meeting by city transit and had used two fare tickets. I asked her if she had her card for the reduced fare in Toronto and she replied that she could not get herself round to going to apply for that and have herself photographed and fingerprinted. I asked her if she preferred to pay twice the amount than apply for the card and she said that perhaps she was old-fashioned, but it did hurt her. So this attitude cuts across the whole spectrum. What I am trying to emphasize here is that, while we may and do take aggressive action vis-a-vis the provincial government in order to make our case, we also recognize that in situations like this we have to work with the people to get a change in attitude. As a matter of fact, we are moving towards the completion of study on attitudes towards aging people. You may be aware of that study. In it we find that there are many wrong attitudes towards the aged. Although I don't wish to get into the question of our attitude towards youth, I should point out that we also have a committee on youth, and that the youth at our conference have certain recommendations which some people find frightening—recommendations about what we ought to be doing.

So we do feel that we must convince people to change and to recognize that there are some questions they might not have examined.

Senator Fergusson: We certainly have to make them change their attitude towards the poor. It seems to me the attitude is not changing as quickly as it should in view of information that is actually available.

The Deputy Chairman: Honourable senators, the time is passing quickly. There are quite a few members of the committee who wish to ask questions. I wonder, therefore, if the witnesses could make their answers as short as possible, and if there is time afterwards, we can come back to any questions they wish to elaborate on.

Senator McGrand: I have a few short questions requiring short answers. Outside the larger cities where poverty is very evident, in what other parts of Ontario, other than in the areas where the Indians live, do you find a great deal of poverty?

Mr. Pierce: One of the meetings of this series on the Canada Assistance Plan was held in Muskoka during the winter. There we found a great deal of serious rural poverty. That is just one example.

Senator McGrand: Now, I presume the working poor are usually employed in small industries. Do you find the working poor in the large cities such as Toronto or do you find them in what you would call the areas of Ontario where you have regional disparity?

Mr. Pierce: Both. Inevitably, we tend to see more of the poor people in the urban or metropolitan centres because there is more opportunity for association and they make themselves known.

Senator McGrand: They are more evident?

Mr. Pierce: Yes.

Mr. Craigs: There is no question, sir, that this is a pervasive thing throughout the province. It really does not matter whether you are in Kenora, Dryden, Sudbury, Chapleau, Toronto, Windsor or anywhere else. You will find the same proportions.

Senator McGrand: The same proportions. That is what I wanted.

Now, the people on welfare have had some attention paid to them by organizations who are interested in their welfare and who are trying to organize them to meet their needs. Has the work been in any way carried on among the so-called working poor, or have they not yet reached the point where you can give some organization to the working poor?

Mr. Pierce: A surprising number of the working poor did participate in our conference, and again in order to follow up on this I have met with some of them in groups locally. They tend to organize around questions such as housing and tenants' associations and so on.

Senator McGrand: Nearly everybody who comes before us seems to recommend a guaranteed annual income. Now I know you people have been in business for a long time and you have carried out a tremendous task. What would you estimate as being the cost of a guaranteed annual income, and here I am not asking you to give an estimate for Canada, but simply for the Province of Ontario.

Mr. Pierce: I have to say we do not have the answer to that question. I am sorry.

Senator McGrand: But you must have done some research on this.

Mr. Pierce: No, we did some research on the possibility of immediate increase in family allowances, and we decided for a number of reasons not to push this. We did try it out with the provincial government as an immediate step, but then we took it back. However, the general area of guaranteed annual income we have not studied.

The Deputy Chairman: Reference to a guaranteed annual income has been made in practically every brief which has been presented to us. But to my surprise very few people have given any serious thought to where the money is going to come from. So, if this is the answer, where is the money going to come from? Is it to be printed by machine or is it to be obtained from an increase in taxation? I think this committee would like some information on that aspect of the recommendation.

Senator McGrand: That is why I asked the question.

Senator Inman: Mr. Chairman, in reference to that recommendation and under the heading of social security and guaranteed annual income, in subsection (c) there is mention of "a uniform income floor." How could this work when there is such a variation in the provinces in rents, prices and services and so forth? How could you have a uniform floor?

Mr. Pierce: I think the thinking here again was related to the kind of approach taken in such programs as family allowances, for instance, where there was a uniform and fairly general approach and also in the old age security program. I think the intent here was that while there may be need for consideration for regional disparities, the principle is that certain categories should not be treated differently. In other words, there should not be a fragmentation or breaking down into groups because this carries with it a very real disadvantage. This is why we favour a universal approach in order to recognize the fact that the cost of payments made to those who do not require them, can be recouped through taxation. Incidentally, this recommendation on all welfare income and allowances provided in a general way came out of our own conference of people on welfare, the working poor. Where such allowances are not needed, they can be recouped, so there is a certain transfer element here.

Mr. Craigs: Madame Senator, let me give you a classical example of the wide gulf that separates the working poor from others and why we suggest there must be a floor. Take the City of Sudbury, for example, which by and large is dominated by the mining of nickel. Now the legal minimum wage in Ontario is $1.30 per hour for a 48-hour week. However, the average rate per hour for an individual working in INCO is close to $4 per hour for a regular 40-hour week. So here you have a large segment of the population earning good wages, and in my view quite properly so, but you also have a percentage of the population who are beyond help because the minimum legal wage does not reach the level to keep these people even within shouting distance of the vast working population of Sudbury. I am referring now to the people who work in small stores, secondary industries and secondary enterprises.

Senator McGrand: You have really answered my question, but I have another one. What is the proportion between the two groups? You mentioned that that segment of the population which is employed in the nickel industry would be in that high bracket of $4 an hour.

Mr. Craigs: The minimum is close to that anyway.

Senator McGrand: What proportion of the population would be in that bracket and what proportion would be in the bracket of $1.30 per hour?

Mr. Craigs: All I can say is that the membership of the United Steel Workers Union, local 65 in Sudbury is approximately 14,000, so that you have that number at least in the high category. Now how this relates to the total population is difficult to say at the moment, but obviously with 14,000 people on a good level of wages, this is reflected in prices not only of goods but of services as well. This in turn imposes a great hardship on that segment of the population which is not in that high bracket.

I do a great deal of arbitration work and I can give you a typical example of what happens where there is a lack of flexibility and where a decision was made within the existing legislation which imposed a tremendous hardship. We had two families both consisting of people who were barely literate. When I say they were barely literate, I mean they could barely sign their name rather than putting a cross. Now the male heads of these families were working for the Public Works Department in Sudbury as labourers, cleaning out ditches, digging holes and filling them up again and so on. They were discharged by the city on the basis of an excessive number of garnishees. The union appealed the dismissal and it finally came to arbitration. The city, under the collective agreement between the union and the city, which contained the perfectly normal clause that exists in every one of these agreements, had the right as an employer to hire, fire, promote and demote. Now the total number involved in the two families was 17 persons. Now, these men had all these garnishees because they could barely read or write and consequently were fair game for the hard-nosed, second-hand car dealer and others like that. It is interesting to note that the only thing these garnishees were applied to were domestic appliances, a television set, a washer, an automobile and so on. There was no question of indebtedness to finance companies for borrowed money. So, as I have said, the city fired them. The union filed a grievance, and we took it to arbitration. I begged and pleaded the chairman of the Board of Arbitration to order the city to reinstate this man. I told the board: "I am not worried about their past seniority or past service. We will let that go. In discharging them all that has been done is that 17 people have been put on public welfare and they will never get off." The city would not take them back. At best they would give them only short term temporary employment. They were almost transient workers. The chairman of board refused my request. He said: "The law requires that I interpret the collective agreement, and the agreement says that the employer has the right to hire, fire, promote, and demote for cause, and the employer has decided that too many garnishees is cause for dismissal." Here you have two families dumped on public welfare, and they will probably remain there for the rest of their lives. That was because of the rigid application of legislation.

Senator McGrand: A point that is often made is that there are small industries that cannot pay the maximum wage. From your experience over the years in this work do you think that many small industries would go out of business if they were forced to pay maximum wages?

Mr. Craigs: If you will pardon me I should like to clarify my answer by saying that organized labour is not suggesting, and never has suggested—and it would be insane to do so—that minimum wage rates should all be raised to the average of a large city. What we are maintaining is that the present legal minimum of $1.30 an hour is just too low, and that it could be increased by 30 to 40 per cent without doing any significant damage to small enterprises.

To answer the second part of your question I will say that there are many small enterprises that are badly managed. This, of course, is something over which you and I have no control. I do not know whether it would be an unfair punishment to drive a small enterprise out of business by insisting that it pays a better minimum wage, but it is not the fault of the individual worker that an enterprise, big or small, is badly managed.

Senator Inman: When I asked my question about uniform income I had in mind that it has been said that the minimum income to maintain a family of four people at the poverty level is $4,200, and I know that there are small country villages, for instance, where rents are low and accommodation is easy to get, and where $4,200 a year is affluence. This is what I was referring to when I asked how you could manage an income floor which in some cases barely keeps four people, and in other cases keeps them very well. Senator MacDonald will bear me out when I say that I know where you can buy a whole bag of turnips for 50 cents, while in the city you can buy only one for 50 cents.

Mr. Pierce: The allowance provided for children under the income tax system means a larger cash benefit to a person with a high income than to a person who is on a low income. I know that this does not answer the question, but this is not the only area where we have this problem of providing a basic income and trying to relate it to regional disparity across the country. What we are saying is that we start from a certain point and apply these variations in the area in respect of rent, fuel costs, and so on, and then make provision for regional differences. I would think that something of this nature might be woven into this kind of system. If we are going to accept a basic minimum income, then it should be an income floor.

Again, this is not to say that we do not recognize the fact that there will be regional disparities—we recognize this in Ontario—but there may be other ways of adjusting to that kind of difference.

Senator Carter: I will follow along the same line for a little bit. Your first recommendation concerns the guaranteed annual income, and you talk about an adequate minimum wage. What do you consider to be an adequate minimum wage, and how would you combine it with the guaranteed annual income? I ask that question because you imply in this paragraph that you are opposed to what you call the subsidization of employers. What do you regard as an adequate minimum wage, first, for the country, and, second, for Ontario.

Mr. Pierce: I think the point we are trying to make here is that the people receiving public assistance in Ontario are actually receiving more in actual cash income than people who are working and earning the minimum wage. There are also people who are in full-time employment who are receiving less than the minimum wage. Our concern here is that if a guaranteed annual income is established there should also be some consideration for the kind of effect that was raised earlier about what this does to industries that are not able to pay the full minimum wage. It seems to me that there would have to be consideration given to some form of subsidy to industry which provides employment for a community. As so often happens—not so much with small industries, but with industries that may pay well above the minimum wage—an industry can withdraw from a community without any responsibility to that community, and leave a number of people unemployed. In other words, there is a question of social responsibility.

Sweden is an example of a country that has been able to cope with this kind of shared governmental and industrial responsibility for the community in which the industry operates and provides a livelihood for the residents. I think what we are trying to get at here is that these problems should not be attacked without recognition of the fact that there are areas where the minimum wage has to be related to some form of minimum income across the board.

Senator Carter: I cannot say that I find your answer very helpful. Did I understand you to say in your reply that somebody, people on welfare are getting more than the minimum wage?

Mr. Pierce: Yes.

Senator Carter: We had a table presented to us a few days ago showing the welfare rates of the various provinces compared with the minimum wage. It showed that in Ontario the welfare rates were far higher than the minimum wage. Have you brought this to the attention of the provincial authorities, and asked them to bring their minimum wage rates into line with the welfare rates?

Mr. Pierce: We have. When we met with the minister we drew attention to this, and the reaction was that it was hoped the Department of Labour would deal with it.

What we are getting at is that this kind of discrepancy does not help to attack some of the real pockets of poverty. That is what we are saying. These cannot be treated as separate approaches. They must be looked at together. This is the emphasis we are trying to get across here. I am sorry if my reply does not satisfy you.

Senator Carter: This is better, but I really could not understand your earlier answer.

Mr. Craigs: The honourable senator mentioned figure of $4,200 per annum income. The present maximum of the minimum legal wage in Ontario is $1.30 with some qualifications for learners, and so on. Working a legal 48 hour week in Ontario only earns in round figures $3,500 which is, of course, substantially below the income of $4,200 mentioned by the senator. Only last week we appeared before Mr. Robarts and his cabinet, pleading this very point, that the legal minimum wage is a farce in Ontario because it ignores at least one very vital aspect of the so-called working poor. That is, in the rather trite phrase, that they have rising expectations. The reason they have rising expectations in their own minds is because they are working, not because they live in a North American, materialistic society. At $1.30 they have no rising expectations at all.

Senator Carter: We have had two proposals with regard to attacking the problem of the working poor. One is to subsidize the individual worker with some sort of work incentive so that it will pay him to continue working; secondly, to subsidize the small employer. I gather that you are against subsidizing the small employer?

Mr. Craigs: Yes, sir.

Senator Carter: On page 2 reference is made to Old Age Security and the Canada Pension Plan. It is stated:

Old Age Security and Canada Pension Plan payments should be continuously reviewed and adjusted to the cost of living.

My understanding is that the Canada Pension Plan is adjusted to the cost of living. Is that not so?

Mr. Pierce: Yes.

Senator Carter: What do you mean by this recommendation?

Mr. Pierce: Reference to Recommendation 1 (f) will explain what we have said in Recommendation 3 (a), that the basic amount of Old Age Security should be raised. We refer to the recommendation of the Canadian Welfare Council in its statement of social policies for Canada that:

Payments to Old Age Security beneficiaries should be increased sufficiently to protect beneficiaries fully against erosion in purchasing power and to relate payments to changes in general living standards for the country as a whole.

You are quite right that there is provision for adjustment in the cost of living in the Canada Pension Plan.

The Chairman: Do you differentiate between the cost of living and the general living standards?

Mr. Pierce: Yes.

The Chairman: Because there is a difference; it depends how you look at it.

Mr. Craigs: Without question; we would support that.

Senator Inman: I refer to paragraph 3, quality of service, on page 3 of your recommendations. We have heard complaints regarding social workers and their approaches to people. You say in subparagraph (b):

Welfare administrators and personnel should be appointed on the basis of administrative leadership, and personal suitability as well as appropriate education.

I am in agreement with that. Why is it not done more? Should persons employed as social service workers not be screened more? Education is not all.

Mr. Pierce: In the area of the traditional public welfare there was a tendency to employ people who were not qualified, either by education, training or even personality very often, to handle the job they were expected to do. I must go on record as saying that in Ontario there has really been a substantial effort made to improve the quality of service and the understanding of what the social services are all about. The Ontario Welfare Council, for instance, works very closely with the Ontario Welfare Officers' Association in an attempt to improve the quality of service and understand the needs of those who require public assistance. This is related to a point I made at the beginning regarding the problem of jurisdiction within the province. We have on the one hand the municipalities, who say to the provincial government your are pushing us too hard, you are forcing us to do this and we do not want to do it. On the other hand the larger municipalities are saying, we want you to take advantage to a much greater extent of the Canada Assistance Plan, for instance. There are examples in Ontario where the welfare administrator has taken the initiative in developing new kinds of programs, having people in receipt of public assistance with other recipients. There is a very definite trend toward improvement, but there are pockets where there is still a negative, demeaning attitude towards anybody who requires any assistance outside the family.

Senator Inman: Your attitude means a great deal to these people.

Senator Cook: Your Recommendation No. 1 is for a guaranteed annual income. On page 2 you suggest as an alternative or until guaranteed annual income becomes reality, an increase in the family allowances and the basic amount of Old Age Security. Assuming that there will be money available some day to take care of these matters, it would be helpful if you could give us some amounts. Has any research been carried out to determine what the guaranteed income should be or, until it comes into effect, what the increase in the basic amount of the Old Age Security or family allowances should be? We must be realistic about it. The poverty level is said to be so and so, but you cannot give a guaranteed income to take care of the whole amount. What would be a starting point?

Mr. Pierce: We did explore the possibility of doubling the family allowances. It was estimated that for doubling the current amounts for children and youth allowances...

Senator Cook: Which are how much per child?

Mr. Pierce: This was from $6 for a child under 10, $8 for a child aged 10 to 16 years and $10 for those from 16 to 18 years of age under current provisions. The doubling would amount to $12, $16 and $20. Our calculation here was that the doubling would mean a gross additional cost for Canada of $616.6 million. We recommended a cost recovery by taxing the payments, which would produce $199.3 million so the net additional cost would be $417.3 million. That is on that specific proposal.

Senator Pearson: What is the present cost of family allowances? Do you have those figures?

Mr. Pierce: I am sorry, I do not have that.

The Deputy Chairman: It would be half of that.

Mr. Pierce: Half the $616.6 million. That was gross.

Senator Cook: The increase would be $300 million, in other words, not $600 million. How much would the cost of the increase be?

Mr. Pierce: The net addition would be $417.3 million, but this provides for a tax recovery through taxing the payments, because we recommended that they would be taxed. There is a certain transfer involvement here, too, but this was on doubling.

Senator Carter: At what income tax level do you start the recovery?

The Deputy Chairman: All incomes, I imagine.

Mr. Pierce: Yes.

Senator Carter: At the present rate it becomes taxable.

Senator Carter: In recommendation 1(d) you say "by taxing benefits 100 per cent above a certain income level". I did not know whether you were talking about a certain income level or the present level.

Mr. Pierce: That is not related to what I am quoting. This was something we had not presented to you, for a number of reasons. Frankly, it was because this was thought of as an immediate poverty aid because of the increase in unemployment. This was a program that could be adapted immediately without changing administration, legislation or anything else. We were afraid that if we recommended this as an interim measure it might become a final arrangement. As I recall, the Senate Committee on Aging recommended certain changes in old age security as an interim measure, which has become permanent up to now. We were a little confused about this in looking at the question of the minimum guaranteed income as a long-term measure, but we had not worked out the cost specifically.

Senator Cook: Of old age security?

Mr. Pierce: We had not worked that out.

The Deputy Chairman: Why did you object to giving us these figures?

Mr. Pierce: We had presented them to the provincial government because we wanted the provincial government to consider this as a proposal they would take to the federal Government, because of our relationship to the provincial government. This was not supported, so we had some reservations about taking it to the federal Government, as we indicated earlier. We usually relate federal matters to the Canadian Welfare Council, who have an appropriate role in that regard. However, we thought we had something to say in interpreting this.

Senator Cook: Have you done anything on the guaranteed annual income?

Mr. Pierce: No.

Senator Cook: On the amount or the cost?

Mr. Pierce: No, we have not worked on that.

Senator Cook: It is all very nice to suggest to this committee a guaranteed income, an increase in family allowances and in old age security. We are all against sin and in favour of motherhood. But how much will it cost, and how much should it be?

The Deputy Chairman: And how are we going to do it?

Senator Pearson: Referring to the first paragraph on page 3, I should like to ask as a matter of record what causes unemployment? Could Mr. Craigs say something about that? Everybody knows what unemployment is, but what causes it?

Mr. Craigs: At the risk of being facetious, I think you ought to ask Mr. Stephen Roman, who wants to take his marbles elsewhere.

The Deputy Chairman: I think you could say a few words on that subject.

Mr. Craigs: The causes of unemployment, of course, are manifest. Probably nothing has a more significant impact than the general attitude of confidence within the country. How that confidence or lack of confidence comes about depends on many things. I do not think personally, and I believe my organization would be of the same opinion, that taxation per se is necessarily a factor that creates unemployment. Unemployment is caused by a mix of ethnic groups, for example, where there is an abundance of one kind of skill, or a lack of skill and a superabundance of another. It is brought about by failure to develop resources, and also by the excessive development of resources. I would give the typical example of Dryden, which is virtually a one-industry town; it is a pulp and paper town. The problems of pollution there are very significant and are causing unemployment; the sheer productivity and efficiency of the industry in Dryden is creating unemployment.

Geography is another factor. Mobility or lack of mobility is another. By mobility I am talking not at the provision of transport but of the attitude towards moving from one place to another, the willingness to do it and the encouragement and assistance available to do it as against the lack of facilities and lack of encouragement, as a defined social attitude against change of any kind.

Last, but by no means least, of course, is the economic policy of the country or the province. This is a hotly debated subject at present and I will not get into that.

Those are all factors, and in these times it is difficult to say there is one major contributing factor towards unemployment. I certainly share the Prime Minister's opinion, expressed yesterday, that however and to whatever degree we are taxed we are not going to see an exodus out of the country. Quite the contrary. I am sure that my organization, if I may speak for it, simply does not believe it, and for the reasons that Mr. Trudeau gave.

Senator Pearson: If a sufficient guaranteed annual income were introduced would there be any necessity for family allowances or other welfare programs?

Mr. Pierce: I would not think we are likely to achieve a situation in which a minimum is established beyond which there is no need for special intervention and aid. Certainly we see the need for service for a considerable time. In fact, once a minimum income is established, service could be more meaningful, more productive, and could contribute to the prevention of poverty and the rehabilitation of those needing assistance. Somehow in this society it is becoming more and more difficult for individuals to become self-sufficient; the choice for individuals is becoming more and more complicated, so some kind of service available to people will be required in the future, because life seems to be becoming more complex. There may also be need for some special assistance in the area of certain categories and this may be handled in another way. I think that the provision of institutional facilities may be one way of dealing with it.

Senator Pearson: In your recommendations of social security you say that a guaranteed income plan should be universal. Don't you think that is rather a cumbersome or expensive way of handling things? It could be taxed back of course, but it seems to me that a tremendous number of civil servants would be necessary in order to handle this.

Mr. Pierce: As against the present system where we have a variety of categorical programs that crisscross in all directions, in terms of assistance and geography, we have said that this one needs more or that one needs more. In other words, all the time we are finding another category which needs more. The principle we are trying to establish is to start with a universal approach and then make adjustments as required, just the same as looking at some of the legislation where the regulations are specific and you can't have flexibility in order to meet an immediate need.

The emphasis which we are putting here starts with the universal approach, because it is easier to administer. Family allowances are much easier to administer if there is a choice in relation to the category.

Mr. Craigs: May I add something, sir, in order to clarify some of the contradictions that have arisen from what Mr. Pierce has just spoken about? May I offer this to this distinguished committee to wrestle with. I am talking in the area of Workmen's Compensation. This is a national problem since every province has it. As you well know, for a permanent industrial injury you can get a permanent disability award, either partial or total, depending upon the severity of the injury. In the Province of Ontario and elsewhere in this country a man can receive a permanent partial disability award of X number of dollars per month for the rest of his life and continue to work. In such situations it is not uncommon to find a man who has suffered an injury, to have his income raised because he is able to return to employment and in some cases to even more fruitful employment than he had at the time of the accident. His permanent disability award is added to that so his gross income increases. It has been seriously considered that in the event an individual in receipt of a permanent disability award retires at the mandatory age of 60 or 65, whichever applies, he should lose his permanent disability award on the theory that added to his Canada Pension Plan and possibly a private pension plan with his employer, his income would significantly exceed at retirement what he had been earning during his working life. What we are saying is that if a man is able to work and go ahead and do so without any detriment to his income, how can we logically argue that when he retires he is not eligible, in spite of the fact that a permanent disability award is society's attempt to put a cash value on a disability? It is not intended to support him in life, but it is a payment. You may say this is crude. Nevertheless, it is our attempt to give a cash value to the loss of a finger, arm or hand. This idea has been seriously put forward and I ask this committee what could possibly be the results, and it is fair?

Senator Pearson: You can get ordinary casualty insurance from an insurance company for the same thing and that is for life, which puts you in a different category to the Workmen's Compensation.

Senator Carter: Following Senator Pearson's question, in your brief you stated that it would be desirable to have a guaranteed annual income and to have Family Allowances increased, and so forth. In terms of the working poor, and subsidizing his income, if you had to choose between, say, $600 million and whether you would use this to impose a maximum guaranteed income or increase Family Allowances, which do you think would be the best way to spend that money from the standpoint of the working poor?

Mr. Pierce: If you are thinking about the immediate situation, there are advantages to the current Family Allowance programs. Administratively this is very simple to handle and can bring assistance to families whereas a wage approach does not since it is not geared to the size of a family. There are very positive advantages in promoting an increase in Family Allowances as an immediate step.

Returning to the point I was making earlier, we made this proposal at the provincial level. The alternative is to introduce a negative income tax type of approach. This could also be administratively simple by raising the personal exemptions. I am not sure that I am able to give a categorical answer to the long-term approach. We still feel that there is a need for continued discussion of the alternative approaches for the establishment of some form of guaranteed income.

Senator Carter: We have had experts before us who have said that even if we introduced a guaranteed annual income it could not take care of everything and that there would still be special needs which would have to be looked after in some other way and that therefore we would need, in addition to the guaranteed income, some sort of Canada Assistance Plan, particularly to provide services. When we talk about the guaranteed annual income we are not talking about it in isolation as one thing that is going to eliminate everything else. We must think about it in terms of part of a structure, but the structure must also include provisions for special needs and services. That is what the Canada Assistance Plan was set up to accomplish.

I want to ask you two questions about the Canada Assistance Plan: to what extent do you think it is feasible to gear and consolidate the present welfare programs under that one umbrella instead of eliminating disability payments, such as allowances for blind persons? I realize that you have had a lot of experience with the provincial government in these welfare matters. How many could be consolidated and brought in under the same administration of the Canada Assistance Plan?

Mr. Pierce: First of all, in Ontario the Family Benefits Act was the province's way of implementing a part of the Canada Assistance Plan and there was consolidation of categorical programs under the provisions of the Family Benefits Act. The administration would still have to be provincial, because the federal act provides for cost-sharing.

I think that this could be extended further. One area which we have advocated to the provincial government is that where one now sees a separation between the family benefits approach, which is in effect a long-term assistance category, as against the general welfare assistance which is theoretically a short-term assistance. We considered this should be in the general welfare assistance program, which is in the hands of the municipality but is mandatory in the provincial legislation. We have a long-term dependency position, but it is on and off. Our consideration is that this is likely to be dependent over a long period of time and should be included in the broader group.

Also advocating one important element in the Canada Assistance Plan, the provision of preventive services that may be extended to the working poor—we see a very real need for this kind of extension, because of the possibility that the result would be that we would prevent people from falling back into a dependency situation.

Senator Carter: You state on page 2 that Ontario is not making full use of the Canada Assistance Plan. With your close relationship with the Ontario government, have you been able to find out why they are not doing so?

Mr. Pierce: Partly that was its cost and they had to make choices in the area of where they are going to expend additional money even though there is federal sharing. But they do assure us that the possibility of extending services in Ontario under the Canada Assistance Plan to provide assistance to the working poor is under serious consideration by the provincial government. We certainly have been pushing this.

Senator Carter: One of the problems in administering the Canada Assistance Plan is that it is geared to be paid on the basis of need rather than on a means test as it was heretofore. But the problem is that the need, or the definition of "need" is made by the province, and every province works out a definition to suit itself, therefore there is no uniformity. Have you found out why Ontario has such a restricted definition of need?

Mr. Pierce: We are still trying to find out.

Mr. Craigs: I was part of the delegation before the Robarts' Cabinet only last Thursday and, perhaps to misquote the late Winston Churchill, it was a sort of mystery wrapped in an enigma. I think we have to be candid about this and recognize that in the present government of Ontario there are some portfolios of higher status than others. The cabinet is composed of human beings, with all their frailties and strengths and weaknesses and so on. As far as organized labour is concerned, we have no evidence to convince us that the present portfolio has any real status within the cabinet. In other words, it has no political crunch. For that reason it is relegated to a lower order of priorities as the cabinet sees them.

Senator Cook: You mean, the labour portfolio or the welfare one?

Mr. Craigs: Both. Emphatically, both portfolios.

The Deputy Chairman: I think it goes away beyond the province, to the municipalities; and in some provinces you may have 15 different interpretations of the rules.

If there are no more questions, I would like to express our thanks to this delegation. I want to thank Mr. Pierce and Mr. Craigs. We had before us this morning two valuable men with a lot of experience. I wish we had time to spend a whole day with you because you have so much experience and knowledge. I am sure we have learned something from you this morning. It is interesting to see that others are finding the same troubles that afflict us—conflicts between governments, trying to bring more people to participate in their organization, trying to build up a public social policy adaptable to everybody, trying to bring varieties of organizations and interest together. They are finding also in many cases that the politicians have not the full knowledge, even of their own ridings, about the poverty situation. This is especially so, I would say, with federal members, who have a very limited time to spend in their own ridings.

We appreciate the effort that you have been making and we hope that you will be successful. We are grateful for the information you have given us, and we hope you did not find the senators to be "tough" with you this morning. Thank you very much.

The committee adjourned.

APPENDIX "A"

BRIEF
to the
SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE
on POVERTY

The Ontario Welfare Council is grateful for this opportunity to make recommendations to the Special Senate Committee on Poverty.

The existence of this Committee is a reflection of the nation's concern about poverty. The Ontario Welfare Council is a provincial organization and we have in the past confined our recommendations to changes in provincial policies while supporting, as a member, recommendations made by the national body, The Canadian Welfare Council.

It is not the Ontario Welfare Council's intention to take your time defining poverty since brief after brief has said what poverty is and what poverty means. In this presentation we have eliminated proposals which are peculiar to Ontario, and confined ourselves to improvements which we believe should be made across the board.

The recommendations at the conclusion of this brief are based mainly on the findings from the Poverty Workshops at our annual meeting and conference last Spring. We believe ourselves to be among the first organizations to invite those on assistance to come to a conference and tell those who make the decisions and deliver the assistance and services, what is wrong from a recipient's point of view. Included in the workshops also were members of the "working poor". Many of these working poor are so precariously close to the edge of that week's illness could push them from the independent category into the group requiring assistance.

The resolutions out of these workshops have been reviewed by the Ontario Welfare Council's Social Policy Committee and put into a form where it would be practical to incorporate them in legislation. They have already been presented to the Honourable John Yaremko, Minister of Social and Family Services of Ontario.

These proposals, which are our recommendations to your committee, are attached to this brief.

Concurrently the Ontario Welfare Council has been concerned that in Ontario full use is not being made of the provisions of the Canada Assistance Plan. Consequently, last Fall we arranged for three meetings in widely separated areas and invited those concerned with social and welfare services, including welfare recipients.

The discussions in all areas quickly moved away from the provisions of the Canada Assistance Plan and concentrated on the problems of poverty.

You will note that these findings only serve to reinforce the Social Policy Committee proposals which are our recommendations.

Canada Assistance Plan Meeting Findings

Some of the findings from these meetings applied to Ontario only. However others would seem to apply all across the country and we include them here for your information.

1. Rate of unemployment has an important effect on the financial picture. Insecurity of job tenure produces a marginal group for whom poverty becomes a way of life. They are characterized by high residential and geographic mobility, instability of expectation, inadequate housing, high debt rates and inadequate budgets. These factors produce instability of family life, inadequate performance of children in school and eventually in jobs.

2. There was agreement that the co-operation of public and voluntary agencies in health, welfare and education, is necessary to break the cycle of poverty which conditions children to the same way of life as the older generation.

Recommendations which came out of these meetings were:

- (a) The implementation of a guaranteed annual income.

- (b) The raising of Family Allowances which have not been increased since 1945. (It was stressed that the needs of large families cannot be met through the wage structure.)

- (c) Greater federal participation in meeting the financial needs of municipalities.

- (d) Purchase of service from the private sector under the Canada Assistance Plan.

Other concerns out of these meetings on the Canada Assistance Plan follow:

Service provisions for marginal income families: those on public assistance have access to day care, homemaker services, health services, counselling, etc.—the low income family has difficulty meeting the cost of these services and may go into debt which ultimately may mean that it may require public assistance. Consequently the implementation of the provisions of the Canada Assistance Plan regarding preventive services is extremely important.

Implicit through all the discussions were the attitudes toward the poor. The stereotype of the poor being lazy, promiscuous, improvident, drunk and generally different emerged time and again. It was interesting that this view was often presented by the respectable poor as well as by the providers of services.

Throughout the Canada Assistance Plan meetings it was pointed out repeatedly that almost everyone in our society receives some kind of social service. Even the middle-income may need day care for children, care for the aged, homemaker or medical services.

However some social services are attached to income maintenance programs. There was a feeling that receiving a service within the "welfare" system was qualitatively different from receiving the same service on the basis of social or private insurance or for a fee.

The distinction is important because the dignity of the recipient is involved and may be the clue to some of the complex causes of perpetual poverty. Specifically it was pointed out that (in Ontario) low income people have to apply to the welfare department to get day care services. This was considered demeaning for those who struggle hard to stay off welfare.

At all of these meetings there was a great deal of concern about the life style of financially dependent people. Both those who were sympathetic and those who were critical agreed that in a work-oriented society, financial dependency does not mean loss of income only, but also the loss of control over one's way of life, the loss of social status and the ultimate loss of initiative.

RECOMMENDATIONS

The recommendations resulting from the conference Poverty Workshop and The Canadian Welfare Council's Statement "Social Policies for Canada" follow.

The Ontario Welfare Council hopes that they will receive careful consideration.

RECOMMENDATIONS PROPOSALS RESULTING FROM STUDY OF THE CONFERENCE

The broad areas in the Ontario Welfare Council Recommendations can be divided into two: SOCIAL SECURITY and SOCIAL SERVICE.

SOCIAL SECURITY

1. Guaranteed Annual Income:

The Ontario Welfare Council supports the principle of Guaranteed Annual Income. It recognizes that it is a complex issue and that it will take time before it can be translated into a feasible program.

In any implementation of a Guaranteed Annual Income Plan the Council recommends;

(a) All welfare income should be subject to taxation.

(b) Income structure should be related to family size.

(c) A 'uniform income floor' is a "must" because provisions under social assistance programs are providing assistance in different amounts, which are not uniform and often provide only for subsistence.

(d) A guaranteed annual income plan should be universal. The present system is geared to particular segments of the population, excluding many who cannot provide for themselves and must rely on categorical programs. These are complex and expensive to administer and subject to widely different interpretations depending on the region or the administrator. (We point out here that by taxing benefits 100 percent above a certain income level, a universal plan could meet the needs for adequate income distribution without benefitting those who do not need it.)

(e) Provisions for an adequate minimum wage should be combined with guaranteed annual income to avoid the possibility of subsidizing employers.

(f) Inflation: Public social security programs should be adjusted realistically and on a continuous review basis to the rising cost of living. In this context the OWC also supports the Canadian Welfare Council's Statement, Social Policies for Canada Recommendation, Part 1, page 72:

"Payments to old age security beneficiaries should be increased sufficiently to protect beneficiaries fully against erosion in purchasing power and to relate payments to changes in general living standards for the country as a whole."

2. Universal Health Program:

The Council recommends that: existing medical, hospital and drug coverage should be expanded to include everybody and these programs should be administered by one authority, with a dental plan providing preventive dental care initiated.

3. Old Age Security and Canada Pension Plan:

(a) The basic amount of Old Age Security should be raised.

(b) Old Age Security and Canada Pension Plan payments should be continuously reviewed and adjusted to the cost of living. IT WOULD BE COMMENDABLE IF PENSION PLANS IN THE PRIVATE SECTOR would follow the principle above.

(c) The Council points out that the Canadian Welfare Council policy in (f) above is equally significant here.

4. Family Allowances:

(a) As an alternative to guaranteed annual income, or until such time as it becomes a reality, Family Allowances should be substantially increased to a realistic level, to meet the financial needs of dependent children.

5. Family Benefits Act and General Welfare Assistance Act (Ontario):

(a) The maximum allowance clause of the Family Benefits Act and the General Welfare Assistance Act should not apply to the overall amount. It may be necessary to retain maximum clauses for component parts of the budget.

(b) The present provisions in the areas of rent and pre-added budget should be reviewed and the maximums increased to meet actual costs.

(c) It is recognized that public welfare at this time is geared to a subsistence level, not to an adequate minimum standard of living. Therefore benefits should be extended to cover family requirements beyond the bare necessities.

(As a general comment the Ontario Welfare Council wishes to point out that it is aware that very few recipients get the maximum allowance, and that it has some doubts as to whether provisions in some other areas are adequately implemented.)

SOCIAL SERVICES

1. Day Care and Homemaker Services:

(a) Day care and homemaker services should be extended to all single parent families.

(b) Working mothers should be able to get help in case of sickness in the family.

(c) The cost of these services should be geared to the ability of service recipients to pay for them.

2. Vocational Retraining:

(a) Retraining programs should be changed to develop the potential of human resources. Currently they meet only the manpower needs of the economy.

(b) Machinery should be set up to counsel and direct potential trainees to appropriate training facilities.

3. Quality of Service:

(a) Municipal welfare services should be incorporated into county, region, district or city units so that they are able to hire adequate staff.

(b) Welfare administrators and personnel should be appointed on the basis of administrative leadership, and personal suitability as well as appropriate education.

(c) The competence of welfare personnel should be fostered through staff development, appropriate administrative supervision, education and training.

(d) There should be easily accessible channels for complaints of recipients. Information concerning the rights of welfare recipients should be readily accessible to them.

(e) Welfare recipients must be protected effectively against the violation of their civil rights.

SOCIAL SERVICES—GOALS

The following four recommendations apply to all organizations, government or voluntary, including the Ontario Welfare Council itself, whose decisions may affect the quality of life of those who are not able to operate without assistance. It is based on the philosophy that these people should have some control of their own destiny, some part in the making of decisions carried out on their behalf.

(a) Assistance should be given to the development of community projects in the social service field, in which the people who are to be affected by these services, define their own program, form their own groups and choose their own leadership.

(b) When decisions are to be made which affect the nature and quality of services, encouragement should be given to the participation of those who may receive these services on decision-making bodies, such as boards of directors of voluntary agencies, government commissions, etc.

(c) Funds should be provided to allow organizations of low income people to set up neighborhood centres or other facilities for helping the poor. While the funds may come from public or private sources, the Council feels there is urgency in taking advantage of the Canada Assistance Plan provisions where they affect community development and preventive programs.

(d) This is an extension of (c) to emphasize its importance. The Council believes the preventive potential of the Canada Assistance Plan should be carefully explored and implemented through innovative programs as soon as possible.

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

EVIDENCE

Toronto, Tuesday, March 10, 1970

The Special Senate Committee on Poverty met this day at 9.30 a.m. at The St. Lawrence Hall, 157 King Street East, Toronto.

Senator David A. Croll (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: I will call to order the meeting of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty. There are a few preliminary remarks that I need to make. The committee will be sitting in Toronto today, tomorrow and Thursday. We have 23 briefs that have already been spoken for and presented to the committee. We shall be sitting here and in other parts of the city, as indicated.

Senator Fournier, the Vice-Chairman of the Committee, along with Senators Carter, McGrand, Pearson and Sparrow, will form one committee, and the rest of us who are here at the present time will be in the other committee.

Senator Fournier will have to return to Ottawa for a very important obligation that he undertook some time ago, and Senator Pearson will take the Flemingdon meeting tonight.

Tomorrow, Wednesday, we have three meetings by the Fournier committee, and Senator McGrand will be chairman of the morning committee, Senator Carter of the afternoon committee, and Senator Pearson will again take the evening committee.

The administration officer for Senator Fournier's committee will be Mr. Clague, and of our committee Mr. Lord. The clerk for Senator Fournier's committee will be Mr. Savoie, and for ours it will be Mr. Coderre.

The people who drew the schedule apparently did not appreciate the considerable distances involved between the hotel and where we have to meet in the evening. I assume, Mr. Controller, that they thought the Spadina Expressway had already been built. They are a little ahead of time. For that reason all of you will have to be on time. If it calls for leaving at seven, it must be seven, or you will hardly make it in time for the meeting.

We have had a couple of calls from people who said that they had some presentation they wanted to make to the committee. I suggest that they get in touch with Mr. Joyce, who is the Director of the committee, on my left. If they will get in touch with him we will try to make some arrangements that are suitable within our capacity considering the obligations we have already made.

We have a submission prepared by the Welfare and Housing Committee and the Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto, represented by Mr. John G. Anderson, whom you know; on his immediate right, Controller Mallett, who is chairman of the committee.

Then we have a very old friend, Mayor True Davidson of the Borough of East York, who is making a presentation of her own.

The rules are the same as we always apply. Mr. Anderson will speak for about fifteen minutes; Mr. Mallett will speak for about the same time; then we will ask questions. Later on I will leave room for Mayor Davidson who wants fifteen minutes.

Mr. John G. Anderson, Welfare Commissioner, Welfare and Housing Committee, Metropolitan Toronto: Ladies and gentlemen of the Committee. I being the first speaker and this being the first experience in Toronto with this Committee, I was not prepared for a ten or fifteen minute presentation beyond the content of the submission itself.

Very briefly, this report of the Municipal Committee is not going to cover the whole field of welfare administration or poverty in Canada by any means. We are trying to deal with those things that the Welfare Committee of Metropolitan Toronto considers to be some of the most significant factors in the problems of the municipality, particularly as they are or should be affected by federal or provincial programs or commitments.

A single area, even one as large as Toronto, cannot introduce plans for wage supplements without contributions from the senior levels; beyond contributions from the senior levels towards such programs, it is hardly feasible for us to do anything significant in this field and create greater incentives for migration to this area of unskilled labour that affect us on a unilateral basis.

If Toronto is to be the only place in Ontario, as an example, which provides wage incentives and wage subsidies, then obviously Toronto will become more and more singled out as the place that would receive the higher rates of unskilled and uneducated labour.

I believe that no-one in Toronto, particularly those members of our committee and our council would wish to discourage migration of people within Canada or immigration to Canada. We understand full well that the migration is basically intended by the people involved to improve their own circumstances and to improve the opportunities for their children.

We feel that everything is being done at the present time that is required by legislation on our part, but much more should be done in this area, particularly in the places from which the people are departing. It does not need repeating that in Toronto, as far as the Welfare Department is concerned, one in five of all new welfare recipients has arrived in Toronto almost immediately prior to their application for assistance. Five per cent of all the people on welfare at any time in Toronto are people who have arrived in Toronto within the year.

These could not be significant factors alone, if it could be assumed that such arrivals and such requests for assistance were of a short term nature, it is becoming more and more obvious that many of the situations with which we deal are conditions that will require long-term assistance.

In one week in one of our offices—and we have nine—five teenagers from a single province arrived requesting assistance, all of them having less than Grade 5 education. Dealing with our family hostels, within the period of a month we received several families which are mother-led with four or five children, with no accommodation, no household effects and no plans for long term residence in Toronto beyond an appeal to the Welfare Department for assistance, for accommodation and for financial needs. These situations are multiplied many times over, and indicate the need which our Committee stress as vital, for information services not only with regard to welfare but with regard to education, health, family planning and a variety of other services—not only in Toronto, where steps are being taken to provide this information service, but at the point of departure. The Committee has emphasized what we consider to be a need for not only planning for the departure from the place of origin, but some assistance—probably at the federal level—with the financial requirements of a family coming to Toronto as settlers.

Now, we feel that this is not something that should be regulated or regimented as far as moving from place to place is concerned. If families are going to move and if their moves are going to be stimulated by their local governments, then a financial arrangement would be an added inducement to these families to make their plans known and to have those plans forwarded in advance to the place where they would be received, so that we can not only consider their needs in terms of welfare but we can plan for their reception with regard to accommodation, which would mean long-term planning of housing, for hospitalization, education and all of the requirements which a family have when they come into a new area.

In some parts of Ontario, particularly rural parts of Ontario, the reception of one large family can mean a disruption of the whole school system for the area. This may seem rather incongruous, but if you have a very small school and a family of twelve arrives, it can upset the school system for the particular area. This is an aside which does not concern Toronto basically, but this problem multiplied many times over does indicate some of the need we have in the educational field alone.

For the balance of the brief, the Committee has instructed me to state that combined with any program of increased benefits based on family allowance, such as is recommended in the brief, there should be combined a strong emphasis on the need for limitation of family size and for family planning. Family size can contribute significantly to poverty.

We recognize that a full public health program, including the provisions of family planning information, must be a part of any total approach to the poverty problem. This again re-enforces the need, recognized by the Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto, for a strong and effective information service for all citizens. Family planning, to defeat poverty, must begin before the welfare services are required.

Linked with credit buying, unplanned families can create instant financial chaos among young couples who are committed to high payments, used to a double income, and are suddenly required to live on the earnings of the husband alone. It is difficult to assess the financial problems which are linked to this last-mentioned problem of our society. The alteration in living standards that stems from the elimination of working wives from the family income for varying periods cannot be over-emphasized.

We are all aware of the young couples, relatively unskilled, who can start out in marriage with incomes which themselves are relatively low, possibly in the neighbourhood of four or five thousand dollars per week. On this double income, such young couples are encouraged to live and buy at a rate of income in the junior executive level. They may be living on a standard of eight to twelve thousand dollars a year with two incomes, and a sudden pregnancy reduces this at a time of most financial need to half of what they have been used to over a period of a year or two years, with the commitments that have been made in this regard.

Much has been said throughout the country about the need for a guaranteed income floor. The Committee of Metropolitan Toronto has not gone further in this recommendation than to emphasize the existence of such a system within the family allowances program. Some years ago the family allowances program was a significant item in family budgeting; it could represent, in a family of four, as much as 25 to 30 per cent of the family income. If this were related to the cost of living today, family allowances would be perhaps in the neighbourhood of $40 to $50 per child.

While we realize that this is possibly not a program which the federal government want to embark on at the present time, since they have indicated some desire for selectivity, we think that the tool to do the job is immediately accessible in the family allowance program. It only requires to be re-programmed for larger amounts of money; and if this income is then linked with the income tax system on a graduated basis, the selectivity which the federal government seems to want can again be applied with the system of collection of family allowances back in the form of income tax from those who do not require it as an income floor.

There are other points in the brief that you may wish to ask questions on, and certain of these points have been particularly identified by two members of my council or of my committee who are here and would possibly want to answer questions on these points themselves.

Without identifying the opinions, I think that particularly those questions relating to housing are of interest to the two elected officials who are with me today. One in particular has made reference to the need for smaller homes, for lower cost homes for working people; another has put particular stress on the credit purchasing problem.

With those remarks, I think I will introduce Mr. Mallett.

Controller Karl Mallett (Chairman, Welfare and Housing Committee, Metropolitan Toronto): Mr. Chairman, members of the Committee, ladies and gentlemen in the audience. I am Controller Mallett, and I represent Scarborough on the Metropolitan Toronto Council. I happen to be the chairman of the Metropolitan Toronto Housing Committee this current year.

Mr. Chairman, I wanted to bring to the attention of the Committee some factors involved in the cost of housing that I feel should be in part reviewed and, secondly, taken into account in your future thinking.

The second item on the brief is the point that shelter is one of the major outlays of each family. In the Metropolitan Toronto area these shelter costs are about the highest on the continent, if not the highest; and they are high for a number of reasons.

I would like to bring to the attention of the Committee the fact that the federal government has often primed the construction industry in the past to create employment, as an economic means of increasing employment. The means by which they did that in the 1950s, and particularly the early 1950s—not everybody here today will recall that we had a surplus of housing in around 1955 or 1956 when this was occurring—the devised means and they interfered with the basic laws of supply and demand.

I bought my house in 1949, and up until that year you had to save up 40 per cent down payment before a mortgage company would supply you with the rest of the money to purchase a house. It meant, of course, that you were a little older and a little more responsible at the time that you purchased your house.

Concurrently at that time there was a great deal of unemployment. The federal government took advantage of the fact that when you build a house you can create a lot of employment in producing the material that goes into a house, the furniture that goes into a house and the appliances that go into a housing unit. They set up regulations under the National Housing Act which allowed persons to obtain a house with 10 per cent down. They were also allowed to take two-thirds of the wife's income to qualify them for the mortgage.

We have had the most experience of any place in the country in my municipality of Scarborough. We have the greatest number of minimum size N.H.A. homes in Scarborough of any municipality in Canada.

As a result of the lower payment, and also what in my opinion were illegal second mortgages allowed for gas-heating equipment, gas dryers and gas refrigerators, some persons got into homes for $150 with up to a thousand and eight hundred dollars mortgages on gas equipment.

Of course, the point that Mr. Anderson made just a moment ago applies, because when young couples have the privacy of their own homes, their families come along quicker. As a result, we had a higher birth rate in Scarborough for a number of years than India or China; we suddenly had this great influx of young couples, and 50 per cent of our population was under the age of sixteen.

It is all very well for the federal government to say that there is a constitutional problem which prevents them from considering the cost of education, but those families that were attracted to Scarborough had to be educated. We had to supply parks; we had to supply recreational facilities; we had to supply libraries; and, believe it or not, we had to supply hospitals.

Shortly after the 1950s, we were in the throes of trying to provide these facilities, the schools and the libraries and the hospitals, when the federal government made another mistake. They offered a scheme whereby you could borrow money for something for which you had not planned, so long as you completed it in 1967 as a Centennial project. At the same time, they encouraged the creation of Expo in Montreal. Now, the damage to the economy will never be gauged, because in an eighteen-month period ending in 1967 the cost of construction rose 30 per cent. This had the effect of increasing the costs of the hospitals that we were attempting to build at the time from about $22,000 a bed up to about $30,000 a bed. It increased the cost of all the construction in which the municipality was involved, including schools, including housing, and this is all included in the shelter cost today.

There is another factor that the federal government appears to ignore. As evidence of that, I draw your attention to a large four-column ad in the Globe and Mail this morning by Central Mortgage and Housing, under which they are calling for builder proposals for loans at 7 7/8 per cent, when, as you know, the going rate is 10 1/2 per cent. I think you should all be cognisant of the fact that a one per cent increase in mortgage rate adds twelve dollars to the average cost of a rental unit, and certainly adds a great deal to the cost of a house.

More recently the federal government made another mistake in the result—not in the initial action; they introduced the Canada Pension Plan. The first month that the Canada Pension Plan was introduced, the financial pages of the Toronto Daily Star reported that $75 million was lost to the insurance companies that normally provided most of that money for mortgages. The federal government was advised by economists that they would have to replace those mortgage funds. They failed to do so, and they increased the shortage of mortgage money by allowing the Canada Pension Plan money to be turned over to the provinces. In the case of Ontario, the Ontario Capital Corporation was set up.

The pension fund moneys that you pay into the federal government are turned over to the province, and they re-loan to the municipalities to build schools. In this way, the Ontario Government avoided increasing taxes conveniently until after the election.

The net result, of course, is that this is all added cost on the cost of shelter.

The fact that the federal and the provincial governments take advantage of the municipalities in times of unemployment, have the exact opposite effect today. The federal government has cut down the funds for building; they have reduced the mortgage funds by the introduction of the Canada Pension Plan; they have encouraged the increase in construction cost by Expo; they have left the municipalities to cope.

On the provincial level, we are contained to repayment of debt of 25 cents on the dollar, so that the Ontario Municipal Board refuses the municipalities the opportunity to service land; and because we cannot service land, we require the developer to service land. He has to hire an extra set of engineers and he has to pay the 11 per cent sales tax on the federal level on all housing and servicing for the housing. He has to pay the provincial 5 per cent that is compounded on top of the 11 per cent. He has to pay corporation income tax to the federal government and provincial government; then, by golly, as an individual he has to pay his individual income tax on top of that.

Now, you have to be realistic. A developer is not there for the good of the country; he is there to make a dollar; so he adds his profit on top of that, and when you buy a house you pay it all.

So in my opinion it is somewhat a posturing position when the Central Mortgage & Housing places an ad in the paper this morning suggesting that they have a fund of $200 million to build housing, that cannot be taken advantage of in Metropolitan Toronto because the municipalities are not in a financial position to accept the low assessed housing. In Scarborough we simply had to zone up to a size of house that would give the financial return to the municipality, whose only source of income is the assessment of houses and businesses; we had to zone up so that that house paid its own way within the municipality, because south of 401 we already have the greatest number of single family N.H.A. houses in Canada.

The Chairman asked me to speak for ten minutes. I would just like to bring your attention to one other factor. The federal government utilised the limited-dividend financing procedure to build quite a number of apartments. There are 2,545. I notice from your schedule that part of your Committee will be visiting Warden Woods in Scarborough this evening. I would like to ask you, sir, that you have some of your Committee visit some limited-dividend apartments. I have visited rental accommodation yesterday in North York and I have the prices for the rental accommodation, the condominium accommodation, in my briefcase. You will find that it costs from $217 basic upwards for a two-bedroom apartment, either to buy or to rent. I can arrange, sir, that your Committee visit three-bedroom limited-dividend apartments of equal size which are electrically equipped and rent for $109 a month.

I would like to suggest to your Committee that there be a suggestion to the government that greater use be made of the limited dividend features of the National Housing Act in this growing municipality also that they make arrangements so that municipalities can afford to absorb them.

RECOMMENDATIONS:

1. That families with children be given priority in provision of an increased and realistic income floor through Family Allowances;

2. That in view of the pressing need for low-cost housing, consideration be given for rapid increases in public housing stocks in areas of rapid urban growth, and that standards be approved for provision of smaller, economical units of housing as single family dwellings;

3. That Federal immigration and migration plans be developed to provide for training and settlement allowances for families and single persons;

4. That earning exemptions and incentives be provided in income maintenance programs;

5. That welfare schedules be re-examined for inclusion to a greater degree of social needs of family above the subsistence level;

6. That welfare schedules provide for incorporation of annual living cost adjustments at specified dates;

7. That documentation requirements be standardized to the various levels and departments of government to the convenience of the recipient;

8. That the senior governments undertake extensive public information campaigns relative to the dangers and costs of credit buying as it affects the low-income group and that increased protection be afforded this group through credit regulations.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, gentlemen. Senator Fournier.

Senator Fournier: Mr. Chairman, in the brief on page 3 I read this:

Families go hungry to repair a television set, buy a birthday present, or to spare an older child the embarrassment in high school of not being able to buy a gym suit...

What is your experience in this with the people who receive welfare? Is welfare money always well spent? I have a long list of my experience, but I would like to hear from you. Do you think that welfare money is always well spent?

Mr. Anderson: No, no one could say welfare money is always well spent. I think when a family does a reasonably successful job of raising a family, seeing that they are clothed and fed and housed on welfare money, then it must be well spent because the money is only adequate just to do those things. If they are doing that, then they must be doing marvelously as far as financial budgeting is concerned.

Certainly there are situations where the intelligence level or mental health of the individual is such that they are not able to accomplish good family budgeting. This particular section is referring to many of the welfare families who do a good job.

In the case of Toronto, particularly, much of the public housing that has been going on has been to decentralize away from the downtown areas, with the result that many families who have lived in what were concentrated poverty areas are now living in areas of relative affluence, or at least middle-class standards. When you put a public housing project with, say, forty or fifty or a hundred and fifty children into a school section where the rest of the children are reasonably affluent, then these children have the kind of problem—and this is only one of the problems that was cited—where the child in a public housing unit on welfare goes into a school where the balance of the children are from families with incomes of $10 to $15 or $18 thousand a year range. They are put into situations that are very embarrassing, where school trips are planned, where even outings are planned, in which they cannot participate.

Here is an example, we felt, where the school system either should withdraw this as part of the school program, or some arrangement should be made within the school system—not necessarily within the welfare system—to make these self-supporting ventures rather than individual contributions from children where in a class of twenty-five, twenty-two of them can participate and three must withdraw from almost all activities.

This is just an example. To get back to your question, certainly in Toronto there are all kinds of examples of drunkenness on welfare, flagrant misuse of money which often results in Children's Aid Society intervention. The only thing we can do with that is to try to intensify a small program that we have in Toronto of a home economist going into the home to teach home economics, family budgeting and family or household duties, for the benefit of some of the people who do not have the capability.

Senator Fournier: I thank you, sir.

Senator Carter: I would like to follow on the question raised by Senator Fournier, because the type of phenomena that Senator Fournier refers to is pretty general, and it is not confined to Canada. I remember in Italy in 1966, when we were going from Naples to Pompei, on the way we passed a little community which was really a slum—just a collection of huts with corrugated roofs and bits of cardboard, sheets of iron, anything they could get to put together and make a building; and the one thing that was noticeable about that community was a whole forest of television antenna. It seemed incongruous.

In your definition right on the first page you say:—

...poverty includes the inability to acquire and enjoy without stigma those goods and services which are necessary to preserve human dignity.

I think this is part of the explanation of that type of phenomena: it is an attempt on the part of those deprived people to stay within what they consider to be the community, to have some outward sign of the goods and services which they feel are necessary for human dignity. I think that is an inner urge that we must accept. I would like to get your opinion on that.

Mr. Mallett: We were concerned, sir, as noted in one of our recommendations here, with the huckstering that goes on in advertising. If you pick up the paper any day, you will see ads in there from Air Canada, for instance, urging you to fly to Britain and pay later, and urging you to go south in the wintertime. The poor people are exposed every bit as much, and perhaps more so, to this type of advertising on-spot as perhaps persons that are out working harder. They feel they are entitled to it because that is what the ad says. That is what the advertising says, that you are entitled to it whether you work or not: you can go now and pay later. So that if they have not the opportunity to watch television, as your story suggests, or if they have not the opportunity once in a while go get out and do something, they feel they are being left behind as compared to other people.

Senator Carter: Do you not think it goes a little further than being entitled to it? Do you not think it is the necessity on their part to have and to try to hold on to some outward sign that they are still part of the community? Do you not think that it goes beyond this, that there is an urge inside of them?

Mr. Mallett: Yes, clothes perhaps, vehicles, television: they are outward signs of prosperity.

Senator Carter: Mr. Anderson gave us some breakdown of welfare cases on the basis of their time of arrival and the period that they had been resident in the municipality. I wanted to ask him if he has any other type of breakdown besides that, based on other criteria?

Mr. Anderson: No, I do not have them with me, but at any given time we can produce the number of people who are on welfare as the result of unemployment directly, but, there again, we tend to talk about people who are employable and who are unemployed, and simply on the basis of a medical certificate usually; but quite often this does not get to the bottom of the problem of the unemployed person who is unemployed for a variety of reasons, including emotional problems, illiteracy. There is a tendency to call these people employable, whereas in fact many employers would reject them from the type of job that is available in this industrial society in Toronto.

We know what the figures are with regard to desertion, with regard to unmarried mothers within a given time.

Just the economic impossibility of living on what you are able to earn is sometimes a factor. If you have eight or ten children in Toronto, your welfare benefits can go up as high as four hundred dollars a month for a family of that size, plus drugs, dental programs, health programs that go with it. If your earning capacity is sixty-five or seventy-five dollars a week, at the present time it becomes uneconomic for some families to work under those situations. That is why we have strongly recommended this income floor.

Senator Carter: How are these scales worked out? Do you have a general scale for Metropolitan Toronto; does each municipality have a scale of its own?

Mr. Anderson: No. The Province of Ontario, under the General Welfare Assistance Act, lays down the scale which must be provided. It budgets for every adult in the family, every child on the basis of three age groups over its period of time from one to sixteen years of age. We are required to pay that scale as a mandatory feature. We must pay a rent scale as a mandatory feature, or a mortgage scale as the case may be, a shelter allowance, a fuel allowance, a household items allowance, and utilities allowance.

Senator Carter: Do you know the basis on which that scale is compiled?

Mr. Anderson: The basis is presumably on the basis of the home economists from the Department of Social and Family Services of the province, and it is up-dated periodically. It is one of the recommendations that it is behind times at the present time.

The Chairman: When you say it is up-dated periodically, there has been no up-dating since 1967, the cost of living has gone up twelve-and-a-half or fifteen per cent, so it is not periodic.

Mr. Anderson: This is exactly the point I make, that although it is done periodically it is not obviously done on a continuing basis. We have recommended in our brief that it be done on an annual basis. This is the recommendation from the municipality to the province.

Mr. Mallett: One major factor, Senator Carter, is the fact that the province does not make allowance for the higher shelter cost areas in the province. The maximum, I believe, is around $85.00 a month, which simply would not get you accommodation in Metropolitan Toronto.

Senator Carter: One last question. You mention on page 2 in paragraph 3.4, that:

Much of the client bitterness at the local level of administration comes from the local inability to ignore or exempt the casual or limited earnings of the recipient.

If you were in a position to exempt the casual earnings of the recipient, how would you go about it? Would you do it on a flat rate basis or a percentage basis, and, if so, how much exemption would you give?

Mr. Anderson: The province has already laid down a standard which applies to their own long-term assistance cases, which could be applicable to ours. It is on a flat rate base plus a percentage of earnings to a given amount and reducing percentage from there on.

I think that unless we get into, at the federal level, wage supplementation, this is a thing that might continue to be discretionary and limited in period of time by the municipality involved; because it can involve such situations as the family limit their intention, their hours of work, to the most economically profitable situation.

So I would like to see in the case of employable people, having time limits and being discretionary, but at the same time having the authority.

Senator Carter: I am sorry. Did I understand you to say that the province does give exemptions now?

Mr. Anderson: Under the Family Benefits Act, the province does provide exemptions on earnings of any member of the family.

Senator Carter: How much?

Mr. Anderson: Part-time. As I say, it depends on the size of the family. There is a small amount which is permitted without any deduction. Beyond that, depending on the size of the family, the exemptions increase or decrease.

The Chairman: It is thirty dollars without, is it not?

Mr. Anderson: I could not give you the actual figure. There is a member of the audience who could.

The Chairman: Who is it?

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Bassett from the Family Court.

The Chairman: Let him tell us. What is the amount, Mr. Bassett?

Mr. Bassett: I believe it is $24.00 for one person.

The Chairman: Thank you very much.

Mr. Anderson: It grows with every member of the family. That is not the total exemption; that is the point at which percentages start to be deducted.

Senator Carter: Can you give us the percentage?

Mr. Anderson: I am afraid I do not have the Family Benefits Act.

The Chairman: We will get that in the next brief.

Senator Carter: I just want to get his opinion as to whether the present state is satisfactory or he has some ideas as to whether it should be changed and how it should be changed.

The Chairman: Go ahead.

Mr. Mallett: What we are concerned with is that when a person goes on to family benefits, what we used to call mothers' allowances, after they have come off general welfare assistance they have those incentive provisions, but presently those incentive provisions do not apply to the general welfare assistance section of the Act that we have to administer.

Senator Fergusson: I would like to refer to Section 7 on page 6 of the brief, where you refer to the need to involve in welfare decision-making the people who are the recipients of welfare. I think all of our Committee have heard this before, and I think they are very sympathetic and we all agree that this is very important; but it has been brought out to us that only recipients of assistance, as you say, can really comprehend what the problems are.

You go on in your brief to say that there is danger in this, and you say that you hear complaints often that it is only the best educated or most intelligent of the consumers or recipients that take part in these things. So it seems to me that even if we do draw into participation with the administration some of the recipients, we are not getting the participation of those who actually need it the most.

What I particularly want to refer to is the last paragraph, 7.3, where you say:

Too often these client groups have themselves displayed a lack of understanding and compassion for the illiterate, the alcoholic, the emotionally ill or mentally retarded.

I do not remember, in any evidence before us, that we have been told of this lack of understanding by people of the group. I wonder if you find this quite often in your Committee?

Mr. Anderson: I don't think the Committee finds this, because the Committee has not such involved discussion; but this is simply, in one sense, my own thinking, I guess, that people on welfare are, generally speaking, the same as people everywhere else, and if these failures to understand exist in population as a whole, then this exists equally among welfare recipients.

We have not said that only recipients understand the problems of the welfare recipient. I would not agree with that, and I do not think the members of the Committee would.

The Chairman: You used the words "client groups," and the only client groups that Senator Fergusson is talking about are the welfare people.

Mr. Anderson: I said that there often emerges the opinion that only a recipient, but that is not necessarily the opinion of anyone else. I think that this is an erroneous opinion; I think probably the Committee feels that, that the recipient of the particular service, because of a particular need understands that particular need best; but the problems of the welfare recipient as a group are so diverse that no one of them, any more than one of us, can understand all the problems of the other welfare recipients. I think that this kind of simple attitude towards the welfare recipient as a single type of person is one of the problems that is involved with this client group approach. Quite often we have seen the client group becoming administered by certain members either of the group itself or by outsiders who have a particular understanding of a particular problem but ignore others within the organization.

We simply do not believe that welfare recipients are a single type of person with a single type of problem.

Mr. Mallett: I would like to add this, senator, that there is the source to be considered, and you certainly cannot have people receiving benefits saying how much they shall be entitled to, without consultation with the people who are providing that source. Somebody has to create it before you share it.

Secondly, as to administration, of course our people are human beings and we need feed-back from the recipients as to the ability of our workers to do the job and get along with people, so from two sources we need some feed-back from the recipients.

I think you would appreciate that a situation such as marching into the Ontario Housing Corporation and dumping garbage in the offices there, shows a lack of consideration; and certainly a threat to go on strike by people who are already in Ontario housing indicates a lack of understanding of their position relative to the people paying the taxes that are subsidizing their rent.

It comes home to you very clearly in an election when you talk to people living in assisted housing, and they say they want more recreation facilities. Your normal response to that would be that "fine, if you are willing to pay more taxes, we will provide more facilities and more services," but they are not, of course, in their situation subject to the market place. Their rent is geared to their income. It does not matter how much it costs to service the building or provide recreation or anything else: their rent is still fixed. So that it is simply irresponsible to say that you can go to recipients and have them advise you how to improve their situation. Naturally they will ask for more, but there has to be the ability to pay on somebody's part in order to provide it.

Senator Everett: I wonder if I may ask a supplementary question, Mr. Chairman. In Section 7.4 of your brief, Mr. Anderson, you state that:

In an effort to identify with such groups, some workers now repudiate counselling, training and education efforts because they are not pertinent to the group, but knowing full well they have complete validity among other parts of the welfare problem.

Would you say this is very widespread with the workers?

Mr. Anderson: No, I would not say it was widespread. I would say it possibly comes from small groups who receive—and the welfare situation throughout the country does receive—great attention from all segments of the information media; so that the opinions of small groups might seem to receive or might seem to carry much more weight and be more reflective of the total situation than they really are.

Senator Everett: There you are talking of the public, presumably. Your brief is talking about influence it has on the workers. Presumably these are the professionals who really understand the problem, and you say they are influenced by these client groups to that extent?

Mr. Anderson: Some workers who really believe they understand the problems exclusively. I do not believe they are necessarily reflective of all professional workers. There are some groups of professional workers who work very intensively with client groups who may hold more conventional opinions; there are others who might have more radical opinions. I do not know what the ratio of these is to the total professional groups. I do not think the profession has spoken out on this particular matter, but this is simply what has been observed or seems to be observed of some groups, and this might be a false assumption on our part.

Senator Everett: In any event, it is not widespread.

The Chairman: We will have that group before us some time at the end of this month.

Senator Everett: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Senator Fergusson, had you finished?

Senator Fergusson: I have one or two more, but I think I would rather let somebody else put some questions.

Senator Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I have been on this Committee since its inception, and so have all these others who have been at the hearings this week, and we have heard a great many briefs up to now. One of the things that we run across all the time is the fact that people do not understand that there is a cure for poverty. Every time we have a talk with somebody saying, "I am going down to Toronto or going to so and so on this Poverty Committee", they say: "Well, what are you going to do about poverty? Poverty has always been with us and always will be with us".

As a committee we do not admit this. We feel that we are going to be able to come up with something that is of advantage to this country.

As to your statement you made there about your financial problems in the municipality, we realize too that the finances of the province or the municipality must come from the senior government as far as we are concerned. What I was wondering is whether or not you think that you could do a lot of work in educating the general public to the fact of the poverty in their district, so that they become more involved in the thing. Do you think there is a possibility that you could do anything in that line?

Mr. Mallett: In reply to that, Mr. Chairman, first of all I want to point out that everything we tax for, including this suggestion, reflects in the shelter costs, which are already too high.

Then, poverty is a matter of comparison. If our standard of living keeps climbing, more persons have to be classified as poor because of the comparison.

There is a limitation on providing truth to people. As an example, it is generally assumed that people with large families are the core of the poverty problem, when in fact if you examine the application list for Ontario housing, for instance, a 16,000 list, you will find the bulk of their requests are for one bedroom apartments, indicating small family units. This is a factor that is simply not understood. In newspaper and radio work it is a matter of sensationalizing something, and the publicity given to a large family creates the impression that all families are large.

I find it difficult to keep the poverty problem in focus in relation to the rest of the municipality. No doubt if we had more money available to us, sir, we could perhaps do a better public relations job between those that are poor and those that are paying the bill.

Senator Pearson: You say there are young people moving into the city here who immediately go on relief. Where do those young people come from, small towns or farms, or where?

Mr. Anderson: On that particular point, I was speaking specifically of migrants to Ontario.

Senator Pearson: Migrants to Ontario from outside of Ontario?

Mr. Anderson: Yes.

Mr. Mallett: We have had figures indicating that in the last year the greatest number of the migrants came from areas east of Quebec. We also have quite a number of migrants coming from the western provinces, as well as the rest of Ontario.

Senator Pearson: Are they looking for work?

Mr. Mallett: Yes, they are looking for work opportunities, sir.

Senator Pearson: Another question I want to ask.

The Chairman: Senator Pearson, I think we had better get this clear now. Those migrants have been coming to Toronto and Ontario for the last fifteen years, have they not?

Mr. Mallett: Well, sir, to put it in perspective, Metropolitan Toronto absorbs 50 to 60 thousand persons a year, and we have in the last twelve to fifteen years. Amongst those new persons, of course, is the birth rate here, migrants from elsewhere in Canada, and we receive 95 per cent of the immigration allowed into Canada.

Senator Pearson: But they are not all relief recipients?

Mr. Mallett: No, sir, but this is the rate of growth in Metropolitan Toronto.

The Chairman: Not 95 per cent of the immigration to Canada?

Mr. Mallett: My understanding is that about 95 per cent of the immigration to Canada arrives in Metropolitan Toronto.

The Chairman: It is not pertinent, except I think my friend is mistaken. Let us get on.

Mr. Mallett: Mr. Chairman, I would be glad to be corrected, but these are the figures I have been supplied with.

Senator Pearson: On the question of housing, in Scarborough are the houses mostly single units or in multiple units?

Mr. Mallett: For many years it was almost exclusively single units, but in the late 1950s and early 1960's the City of Toronto had such restrictive building requirements that there were few apartments built there. At that time and at about the time of the introduction of the limited dividend financing, there were apartments begun to be constructed in Scarborough.

At present about 46 per cent of our housing would be single family units, but because it is not economically feasible to supply single family units in the present tax system, we are moving strongly to the multiple family type.

Senator McGrand: Mr. Chairman, I have two or three questions. On page 5 you say:

In the absence of a definite plan for movement and reception of migrants, too many persons travel to major centres on their last pay cheque, their last welfare allowance or their last unemployment insurance benefit.

I presume this takes place when people go to meet their relatives who are coming from foreign countries. Now, is that just occasional, or is it common?

Mr. Mallett: We differentiate, sir, between immigrants and migrants. Migrants, in our opinion, are persons who are coming into the metropolitan area from elsewhere in Canada; immigration is from outside the country.

The Chairman: But, Senator McGrand, the Canada Assistance Act and the law of the land says that a Canadian can move any place, any time, anywhere, and he is the responsibility of the place where he is located.

Senator McGrand: That is not my question. My question is: these people that travel on their last pay cheque or their last welfare allowance to meet relatives, and they are migrants, is that common or is it just an occasional occurrence?

Mr. Anderson: I think there is a misunderstanding here. When we talk about migrants, we are talking about a person who has left somewhere else and come here to Toronto, and he has done that on the last bit of savings or the last income that he has.

Senator McGrand: It is the migrant that is travelling.

Mr. Anderson: It is the migrant that is doing the travelling on his last cheque, and he arrives in Toronto with an immediate need for assistance with housing cost and housing location. If something could be done at the point of departure to see that he has enough money for settlement here, at least to keep him away from welfare offices for two or three months, the situation with regard to employment and housing would be much better, and his emotional stability on his arrival in the city would be much better if he did not have to make his first call to a place that he considers to be not suitable for his first call, that is, the welfare office.

Mr. Mallett: I would like to say, Mr. Chairman, just in case this has created any impression that we are against migrants, we certainly are not. The papers put us in that position, but we are not. We have suggestions in this brief that we think there should be a federal responsibility to facilitate the movement within the country. We are quite prepared to take the political attitude that we are part of Canada, and we are quite willing to accept migrants in the metropolitan area.

Senator McGrand: You mention something like 50,000 people coming into Toronto in a year, is that right?

Mr. Mallett: Yes, our population increase every year has been 50 or 60 thousand in the metropolitan area.

Senator McGrand: And that includes people who are immigrants from other parts of Canada and people who are immigrants from foreign lands?

Mr. Mallett: And as a result of the birth rate.

Senator McGrand: Then you mention that most of these come from east of Quebec, is that right?

Mr. Mallett: No, I am saying, sir, that our figures in one of the recent reports to our committee show that in the past year, of those persons coming on to welfare, over half of the new recipients for the past year came from areas east of Quebec.

Senator McGrand: That means the Maritimes, is that right? What percentage of Toronto residents are on welfare, and what percentage of Toronto people are in the working poor?

Mr. Anderson: It is impossible to say what percentage is in the working poor, because that is completely in the area of opinion.

The Chairman: How many people are there on welfare in Toronto?

Mr. Anderson: I am not aware of how many people are on welfare in Toronto. There are roughly 1.8 to 1.9 of the population in receipt of municipal welfare. There is a percentage unknown to me at this time of people in Toronto who are on provincial welfare in the form of family benefits. Anyone whose expectation is to live on welfare for more than six months continuously is likely to be on family benefits.

The Chairman: Our statistics indicate that you have had about an average of 15 thousand families with about 50 to 60 thousand people...

Mr. Anderson: Forty thousand.

The Chairman: Forty thousand people on welfare during the course of the year.

Mr. Anderson: No, in the course of a month.

The Chairman: But that has been the average, in the course of a month, for a year.

Mr. Anderson: No, the average would be 35 thousand men, women and children on municipal assistance, but that is not the question that is asked. The question asked is how many people are living on welfare, and you have to differentiate between municipal welfare, which is intended primarily to be for the unemployed, employable people, or for short-term disabled; but there is a greater number living on almost identical welfare scales at the provincial level; and this is not to take into consideration other people over 65 who are in receipt of old age security who may be considered to be living on the welfare scale because if they are getting the minimum and that is their total income then they are living in a manner almost identical to welfare, so we do not have that figure.

Senator McGrand: A short question which needs a short answer. You have a great many new Canadians coming into Toronto from Europe. What percentage of those people become recipients of welfare within a year or two after coming to Canada?

Mr. Anderson: We only keep the figures for one year at a time, and we only identify them as such for one year at a time. Most current figures show that in a six month period approximately 1,700 families applied for welfare within the first year of their arrival here. Of that number only about 300 were immigrants from any other place than the provinces of Canada, which means that 1,400 of the 1,700 new cases came from within Canada but outside of Ontario.

Senator Inman: On page 2 in the first paragraph you have mentioned:

Municipal welfare payments now approach and in many cases pass the earning capacity of many recipients.

And then go on to say

Many others in the community not in receipt of welfare (including unemployment insurance beneficiaries) work and live on a level equivalent to or below the welfare standard.

I would like to know what are your thoughts on this. What would you suggest as a limit for his? Do you think welfare should be decreased?

Mr. Anderson: No, our suggestion through this brief and in our suggestion with regard to the family allowances being increased markedly was that that should be the income floor on which a family would live, because the families which have these welfare entitlements beyond their earning capacity are those with three, four, five, six or more children. If these people could get a definite large income floor from family allowances, they should not need to go through the process of welfare administration. As long as a man is working, in our opinion he should not need a welfare examination of his income over and above his going to work every day, in order to qualify for what he needs to live.

Senator Inman: But at the present time in some cases, as we have heard in our briefs, welfare is above the average of the wages of the working poor, shall we put it that way.

Mr. Anderson: That would not be the case in Toronto; it is not above the average of the working poor, but there are many people who live close to the welfare standard. This suggestion that we have made would eliminate that group, and at the same time assist the people on welfare and just indirectly assist the municipality.

Mr. Mallett: We did a study very recently which showed that with two children the welfare benefits exceeded the minimum wage in Toronto. We are concerned, if I could refer to paragraph 3.2, that on welfare you are protected from garnishees if you are in debt. You have drug, medication, dental and optical assistance, whereas a family earning the equivalent amount of money is not given that protection.

In our recommendations we have attempted to recognize that in the case of two people doing identical work for an employer, because one man has three children at home and the other man is a bachelor does not alter the worth of the work being performed. We have tried to channel our recommendations to provide direct assistance to families through the family allowances, because they are the ones that need it until the children are earning for themselves. We have tried to address ourselves to that particular problem because we certainly recognize it.

Senator Inman: On page 7, paragraph 8.1, you say:

Much criticism is levelled at welfare spending and at welfare recipients which should better be directed at inadequacies in comprehensive health, education and other programs.

Is your thinking that consumer education is the problem there?

Mr. Mallett: Yes, madam.

Senator Inman: You think it is?

Mr. Mallett: Yes. So many people are unable to comprehend what they are getting themselves into, first of all, when they buy an N.H.A. house; secondly, if they buy a car or television set or anything on time. In this country, you know, it is rather peculiar that if you go into the bank and you want to borrow money at a reasonable lending rate, if you can afford it you can get it. If you can't afford it, you go upstairs and get it from the finance company which borrowed it from the bank in the first place. Too many people get in debt because they do not understand economics.

Senator Cook: Mr. Chairman, the brief contains eight excellent recommendations. However, it is all going to cost money. I wonder, would the speakers indicate what level of government is going to pay the cost of these recommendations?

Mr. Mallett: It is obvious, sir, that the municipality can only tax and increase shelter costs, which is one of the basic causes of poverty; so it should be perfectly obvious that a broader based tax source has to be provided. To the extent that the government is successful in trimming inflation and keeping a level on the standard of living, if you can start levelling that off, then the persons that are rated as poor will not keep climbing up within the standard of living. So the federal government can limit it; if they limit it, that would help, and any further assistance or service to people must come from the broad basis of income and sales tax.

Senator Cook: In other words, the municipality cannot pay for it, so it must be either the federal or the provincial government.

Mr. Mallett: We have had to manage in the past and we could continue to manage, but it is an unfair way of taxation. Anything we tax increases one of the main components of poverty, that is shelter costs.

Senator Cook: The second question is: have you made any estimate of the cost of your recommendations?

Mr. Mallett: No, we have not.

Senator Everett: I believe in your verbal statement you stated that in the early 1950's the federal government had interfered with the law of supply and demand by permitting low down payments. Presumably that permitted people to get into housing who would not otherwise have been able to do so. What in your judgment should have happened to those people?

Mr. Mallett: I think the government should have acted in that manner at that time. I think the government had the responsibility to consider the effect of their actions. When they now claim they do not have the constitutional right to assist with the education of those persons that resulted in the privacy of their single family housing for these young families, then they are abdicating their responsibility and ducking behind the constitutional issue.

Senator Cook: You do not think it was wrong for the federal government, as you say, to interfere with the laws of supply and demand?

Mr. Mallett: No, sir. At the time unemployment had to be corrected, and that was the most practical and fastest step. But the reverse is happening right now and unemployment in Toronto is jumping very rapidly because of action and reaction, and this is the reaction to the cut-down. What I am saying is that once they created that situation they should have had regard! I will give you one concrete example. Hospital beds in Scarborough, the last ones we built, cost us about $30,000. The federal government provide $3,200, as they have for the last fifteen or twenty years. We went down to meet Miss LaMarsh who was Minister at the time but they did not do anything.

Senator Everett: You were talking about the unavailability, I thought, of limited dividend funds. As I understand it, these funds were available under Section 16 of the National Housing Act; and about a year ago some of the restrictions of that section were removed and the funds available were markedly increased. Are they not available to Scarborough?

Mr. Mallett: They are available under the present conditions. As I recall it, the limited dividend were at $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent interest rate for fifty year mortgages, and the federal government put up 95 per cent. It is described quite well in this ad today, except it is now up to 8 $\frac{1}{2}$.

Senator Everett: I think you will find that those dividends have changed under the Act; under the Act the dividend was limited to 5 per cent return on capital.

Mr. Mallett: It is now 7 per cent.

Senator Everett: I do not think there is any limitation under the Act. The proposal...

Mr. Mallett: We have not had limited dividend buildings built in Scarborough, financed in Scarborough, now for quite a number of years.

Senator Everett: I am suggesting to you that under the old Act under Section 16 there were limitations that made it exceptionally difficult.

Mr. Mallett: That is right.

Senator Everett: But I think if you look at the Act today you will find those limitations do not exist. I think also you will find that there is a considerable increase in the amount of money that is available for limited dividend housing, and in fact there has been an increase of considerable magnitude in the applications that have been made for this sort of housing.

Mr. Mallett: Yes, I think you will see a surge on that now, because at $10\frac{1}{2}$ per cent you cannot build apartment buildings to rent to that market.

Senator Everett: You are not opposed to that?

Mr. Mallett: Which, the use of limited dividends?

Senator Everett: Yes.

Mr. Mallett: No. Not at all, sir, because we are sitting with a 2.4 vacancy rate for apartments. If more limited dividend could be introduced and continue to be introduced up to the 5 per cent, we would temper rents on the conventional plan as well.

Senator Carter: I would like to draw the witness' attention to page 8 of their brief Section 8.3, and I will ask a short question. If they had to choose between family allowance and guaranteed income, negative income tax or guaranteed income, which would you choose—assuming there is not money enough to finance all three and you have to make a choice?

Mr. Mallett: As our first recommendation indicates, sir, family allowances.

The Chairman: How far would the family allowances extend, to what age?

Mr. Mallett: I think it is obvious that they would have to be paid up to about age eighteen at least, because your length of time a school now is extended because of the technocracy in which we are living. You have to stay at school longer to gain enough education to equip yourself to find a job. I think now it certainly should be up to eighteen.

Senator Carter: I do not think there is any point in pursuing that.

Mr. Mallett: I think, sir, the guaranteed income does not overcome the difficulty that people are not able to manage their money, and if inflation is occurring at the rate it has been at 4 or 4½ per cent a year, there is no sense in giving a person a guaranteed amount of money. It is like the Old Age Pension. When you started it was worth something, and when you get it it is not worth as much.

The Chairman: Let us understand each other. In the first place, any thought about guaranteed income would have to include the usual and necessary escalator clause to keep it up to the current living standard; but, moreover, when you speak about not giving these poor people money when they won't know what to do with it, no-one has ever given it to them to find out whether they do or do not, that is the difficulty.

Mr. Mallett: Mr. Chairman, we were asked just a year ago by the Metropolitan Credit Counselling Service to provide a grant of $50,000 from the taxpayers' pocket to provide a service of counselling to people, to advise them how they should repay the companies who did not check their credit rating in the first place and loaned them more money than they could pay back. The number of debts and garnishees that you run into, both as an employer at the borough and that you become aware of as a public official, and the times that you investigate personally welfare situations and you find this debt situation, it is perfectly obvious that under this huckstering system people are not able to pay their way. They get into debt too quickly, and it is too easy for them to get into debt. It is encouraged; it is encouraged by the federal and provincial governments and it is encouraged by the larger companies.

Senator Carter: I was going to ask the Controller if he is not aware that what he has just said has been disproved by an experiment carried out in the United States in New Jersey.

Mr. Mallett: Yes, I was reading the results of that recently, I believe in yesterday's paper. I have not seen the detailed results, but our experience has been that there are people in receipt of welfare assistance who are not able to manage.

There are two factors. As Mr. Anderson pointed out it is very difficult today to feed a family, but also when you get to the point where they are in debt and you find out why they are in debt, it is obvious there has to be some economic education for these persons.

The Chairman: Mr. Mallett, no one denies the need for economic education of persons, and that relates to me and to you as well as it does to the others. What you are talking about is that these poor do not know how to manage their affairs. They are only 20 per cent of the population of this country that we are talking about, but the other 80 per cent are in trouble too, right up to their necks, some of them. Wherein do they differ?

Mr. Mallett: As Mr. Anderson pointed out, Mr. Chairman, they do not differ. You get the same type of thinking with people who are welfare recipients as you do otherwise. The point is that we are simply not informed. We are led to believe that we should save a buck and put it in the bank and they make lots of money on it. We are led to believe we have to buy insurance. When I buy my home I have to pay 2 per cent insurance fee on my N.H.A. mortgage when in fact the federal government has already guaranteed the repayment of that money and this is just a straight grab. I have to prepay my taxes over to the municipality, and the mortgage firm has the use of my money until they turn it over to the municipality. I think our fiscal year in the municipality, for instance, ends with the calendar year. We cannot set our mill rate until June, because the province's fiscal year ends on March 31st. We are being taken left, right and centre. If there were economic education in the country, there would be an awful lot of people...

The Chairman: I have one question for Mr. Anderson. How many people are on the rolls for which the Canada Assistance Act pays the 50 per cent portion in Toronto?

Mr. Anderson: I could answer your question very briefly, but I am a little bit perturbed by something that has been asked in this hearing, and I would like to get it absolutely clarified. There has been a suggestion that we have said that people on welfare are not good economic managers. There was a question asked about the use or misuse of welfare funds. I said that certain people on welfare did not manage well, but the bulk of people on welfare must be almost economic geniuses because they do manage well, because they manage as well as they do. So we are not suggesting that they do not have the capacity and that they do not exercise that capacity. That suggestion has not been made by this municipality.

The Chairman: Mr. Anderson, that was the very first question that you answered to Senator Fournier. I am very glad that you corrected it, because I was under the wrong impression. You elaborate it further, if you like, because we do not want any wrong impression.

Mr. Anderson: I think that is as far as I need to go, because I think as far as people on welfare are concerned once they get on welfare their credit ratings are such that they are not permitted in many cases to get into further trouble. That is not so much a problem of the welfare recipient as a marginal earner problem.

On your point, everybody who receives welfare in Metropolitan Toronto in the form of financial maintenance, is provided for 50 per cent by the Canada Assistance Plan.

The Chairman: The provincial government, too?

Mr. Anderson: Yes, our arrangement here in Ontario is such that everybody who goes on welfare at the municipal level, we receive 80 per cent subsidy from the province, who in turn receive 50 per cent of the total amount from the federal government under the Canada Assistance Plan. If we give them special assistance, the province recovers the whole of their share of 50 per cent.

The Chairman: The Committee is aware of that, and what I want to know is how many families are on welfare, as we refer to the term, in Metropolitan Toronto?

Mr. Anderson: Under general welfare assistance or under the Canada assistance?

The Chairman: Give me Canada assistance.

Mr. Anderson: I cannot give you the figure.

The Chairman: Give me general assistance.

Mr. Anderson: Approximately 15 thousand family units.

The Chairman: How many of them are single—that is 15 thousand family units?

Mr. Anderson: Yes.

The Chairman: Approximately three to a family, something like that?

Mr. Anderson: It averages out to three, but on the other hand half of those 15 thousand are single persons.

The Chairman: Half of the 15 thousand roughly are single persons.

Mr. Anderson: Roughly, yes.

The Chairman: Can you explain that, because that is a most unusual figure from anything we ever heard before, not as to the number of people but as to the percentage of those who are single.

Mr. Anderson: The assistance is mandatory for persons in need, so any single person unemployed is just as eligible as any married person.

The Chairman: No one is denying their eligibility, but is that normal, do you think, across the country?

Mr. Anderson: I would not say it was normal across the country. I think it is fairly normal in an urban area, because there are so many, particularly women, who are widowed between the ages of 55 and 65, who then become single people who have been out of work for as long as 35 years and are relatively unskilled, and they have a ten year waiting period.

The Chairman: For Old Age Security?

Mr. Anderson: Yes, so that a good number come in that category; a good number are emotionally ill.

The Chairman: I do accept the fact if it is so, but I was surprised when I heard it, because it is a most unusual figure, that large load of single people. However, that is neither here nor there. One question and we shall have to break off.

Are you aware or is your Committee aware that in seven out of ten provinces in Canada there is a wage supplement by the provincial government with some incentives, and that Ontario is not one of them?

Mr. Anderson: Obviously at the municipal level we are not necessarily aware of what goes on in other provinces by numbers, but we are obviously aware that there is provision and the extent that we have asked for that authority.

The Chairman: For wage supplements?

Mr. Anderson: Not for wage supplements for full time earnings. We have said that should come through the family allowances wage floor.

The Chairman: I am talking about supplements. Do you grant any supplements?

Mr. Anderson: No, not normally, because that is going to be a 100 per cent municipal cost, so we have restricted ourselves from doing it.

The Chairman: No, the wage supplements that I am talking about are shared by the federal government under the Canada Assistance Act. It is not a charge on the municipality or the province.

Mr. Anderson: They are not shared by the Province of Ontario.

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Anderson: Since we do not have that legislation, we cannot do it. That is what we are recommending in this brief.

The Chairman: But are you recommending that you approach the province to ask them to do something about it?

Mr. Anderson: Yes, this Committee, as the Welfare and Housing Committee has.

The Chairman: Approached the province for the purpose of doing something about wage supplements?

Mr. Anderson: Yes, sir.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. Anderson, and thank you very much, Mr. Mallett.

We are now to have a brief from Mayor True Davidson, who has some views of her own in connection with welfare in Metropolitan Toronto, and she is hardly ever fearful of expressing herself.

Mrs. True Davidson, Mayor of the Borough of East York: Mr. Chairman, members of the Committee and members of the public. I felt I should present this brief because there were certain elements in our Metropolitan Welfare brief about which I have some misgivings, and there are points which are raised by members of your Committee also.

They had to do with the definition of poverty, and I tried to distinguish among three kinds of poverty: absolute destitution which, of course, cannot be allowed and must be relieved; a sense of deprivation, in the manner of the birthday presents, the rompers and the television set and other things, and it goes as advertising costs; finally, honest poverty, which is something which I do not deplore. In any case, I represent a municipality of working people which, prior to its forced marriage with a wealthy bride,—the Town of Leaside in 1967 had the lowest per capita assessment in Metro, and yet was one of the proudest and most independent communities. The former Township of East York is full of deserving, hard-working poor, and I myself have been one of them and think I know something about how they react. They find it difficult to accept public aid, but they are gradually finding the maintenance of their homes more and more difficult as the property taxes rise, and the gas tax, if they have a car and so on. Life becomes more and more difficult every day for the deserving poor, for the hard-working poor.

My point is that I have not tried to go into the theory of this. I am a working politician and what I try to look at is what can be done, when there is only a limited amount of money. You keep raising the welfare standards higher and higher, and you keep putting more and more people on welfare as a result, and the thing is just a vicious circle.

What you have to do, I think, is to relieve destitution; then put as much of the extra money as you can into the prevention and reclamation of the kind of poverty which is really a mental hazard—this feeling of inferiority. This involves educational programs of various kinds, assistance of various kinds, and there should be a great deal more flexibility.

I am very impressed with the work that our Welfare Commissioner has done. You did not hear from him any example of the sort of individual things, except the one thing that he has done in introducing educational homemakers to try to help working families to establish themselves on a better budget and in better housekeeping habits. However, there are many other special features that he has introduced, and there are many more I know he would introduce if we had a little more flexibility.

I know also that in the days when there was local welfare instead of metropolitan welfare, we had many times given a few hundred dollars to a family because illness or accident or something of that sort had temporarily descended on the family like an earthquake, and by giving them a few hundred dollars, which they were not entitled to under any law, you could help them to get on their feet again; whereas if you did not, the house would go and the job, and before you knew it the family would be on welfare for goodness knows how long. This is the sort of flexibility I would like to see more of.

I do not think you will ever cure poverty, but I do not think poverty is a disease. You must relieve destitution.

I would like to make one other comment. I kept out of the other thing because Mr. Mallett was Chairman of the Committee, although I am a member of it also; but you have spoken of the need for letting the poor decide what they want.

The Chairman: Not to decide, but to involve themselves.

Mayor Davidson: No, but there has been a good deal of talk by certain leaders of allowing them to decide what they needed. I would say that if you do this, I am going to lead a group of ratepayers to decide for ourselves what income tax we should pay. The one is about as sensible as the other. You elect people to do something, and you have got to go along with them.

The Chairman: I will go with you.

Mayor Davidson: I do not know that there is very much that I need add. You have the brief in front of you.

I notice that there is a good deal of time spent on questions, and I would be glad to answer them.

I know you all disapprove of this, because to say you do not want to remove poverty is like saying you do not believe in motherhood and you want to spit on the flag.

The poor have become the enfants gâtés, the object of all the social workers, the dedicated public-spirited humanitarians.

I am the champion of the working poor, the people who need to be encouraged, and I believe in head starts for their children; I believe in public services that will enrich their lives so that they will have an opportunity.

You, Mr. Chairman, are the last person who should say that being poor in Toronto is a handicap, if you are intelligent.

Senator Carter: May I ask the witness if she agrees with the rest of her Council about the family allowance and guaranteed income?

Mayor Davidson: I think the increase of family allowances would be a very much better way of increasing help than a basic minimum wage. The minimum wage will simply throw more people out of work.

Senator Carter: We are not talking about minimum wage.

Mayor Davidson: Negative income tax simply throws more burden on the other income tax payers. To me, it increases poverty and increases the demand for relief.

I think the only reason for the addition services is for the sake of the children, and if you put a greatly increased family allowance on that enables the parents to do for their children what they would like to do for them, and at the same time it can be taxed in the case of people for whom it makes a larger income than is exempt.

I would say, though, that if you are trying to equalize things, if you are going to make the low income person pay for all his medical care and various things of that sort which are paid, then the welfare person whose income is equal should also pay them. The income should be the same, and the payments then should be the same, the additional services. This is putting on a premium, and the person who loves his children might well feel that he had to give up his job in order to get the larger scale of benefits.

The Chairman: Are you satisfied that you have said what you wanted to say, Madam Mayor?

Mayor Davidson: Yes, provided you will read the brief, and provided you will think about it as a possible alternative.

I would like to draw your special attention to footnote 7, which refers to several of the suggestions in item 3. It refers to, on page 4, sections 3(b) and 3(e) and 3(f) are matters which have been raised again and again by the Association of Ontario Mayors and Reeves. It was the lack of reference to these which was another factor in leading me to present a brief.

The Chairman: Madam Mayor, I read your brief when I received it. As a matter of fact, my reading was more charitable than the Globe & Mail reading of it.

Mayor Davidson: I do not want to spend less money but I want to spend it on rehabilitation.

The Chairman: The comment when we met this morning with some of the senators was that they had read your brief. They wanted to know who you were and I said you would be here. Now we have answered the questions pretty well, too. Thank you.

(Recess)

Upon resuming at 11:15 a.m.:

The Chairman: The meeting will please come to order. On my right is Mrs. H. W. Rowlands. She is president of the Association of Women Electors of Metropolitan Toronto, who presented a brief to us. She will introduce the ladies with her, and then she will give you a short rundown on the brief.

Mrs. H. W. Rowlands (President, Association of Women Electors of Metropolitan Toronto): Thank you, Mr. Chairman and honourable senators. It is, of course, a particular pleasure and privilege to appear here before you this morning.

I would like to introduce my deputation. On the far right is Pat Rice, who is a member of our association, but more importantly, she is chairman of the Family and Tenants Association. She is a welfare recipient; she is on Mothers' Allowance at this point, a widow with a number of children. She will be very pleased to answer any questions about welfare or family allowances.

Mrs. Pat Murphy is former President of the Association of Women Electors and the observer of City Council in Toronto.

Mrs. Audrey Burger is my partner in crime; she is chairman of the Welfare Committee of A. W. E., former president of the A. W. E. and present president of Canadian Mothercraft. She has observed the Welfare Committee, first of all, of the City, and now of Metropolitan Toronto, for twelve years, so she has a very good background in what has happened at the city and metro level in welfare.

I shall just run through my presentation very briefly. I shall ask Mrs. Burger to bring forward the preliminary results of a pilot project in very young infant education. Mrs. Rice and Mrs. LeMay, who is down in the audience, will be able to answer questions that you may have with regard to welfare, family assistance, the problems faced by low income tenants. Mrs. LeMay and Mrs. Rice are both working. Mrs. LeMay and her husband are both working and living down in the Trefann area.

In our brief we have tried to confine ourselves to those aspects of poverty of which we felt we had some experience and perhaps a little knowledge.

Consequently, of course, our brief is not comprehensive.

The most frequently recurring recommendation is the recommendation for a guaranteed annual income at or somewhat below the poverty line as established by the Economic Council of Canada.

It is necessary, we believe, to rationalize our approach to income maintenance in this country. We do, of course, now have income maintenance through various bits of legislation spread throughout the province and the federal government—the welfare assistance legislation, the old age pensions, unemployment insurance, and what-have-you.

If the guaranteed income is established at a level which is far below the poverty line, then, of course, we have the tremendous pressure on our social services and we are inadequate, of course, to meet this need. If the guaranteed income is set at a level very close to the poverty line, we run into this whole problem of incentive, and I think this is one of the areas that troubles Mayor Davidson. This we believe, though, can be overcome.

To meet the cost of the guaranteed income, we believe that there would be savings on administrative costs of all the various programs which we have now, lessening of pressure on our social services, and, as time goes on, an increasing proportion of the increase of the gross national product being channelled to this particular need.

In our brief we have talked first about the urban disadvantaged, and we divide them into three groups: the working poor, the elderly and those on small pensions, and those on public assistance.

Among the public assistance group, there are two groups. There are those who have the ability and the motivation to be at least partially self-supporting, and the other group who are physically or mentally incapacitated and who are largely unemployable and whom we refer to as the incompetent poor.

We discuss first of all the working poor, because we feel that this problem must be spot-lighted; it must certainly be drawn to everyone's attention here in the metropolitan area. We have appended the excellent report of the Welfare Commissioner, whom you just heard, of Metropolitan Toronto, where he points out that within the metropolitan area of Toronto there are approximately 30,500 families—and these are working families—whose incomes are less than what they would receive if they were on welfare; and, of course, welfare payments are extremely low.

We are aware, sir, through our contacts in the downtown areas of this city, that many fathers desert their families because they cannot support them adequately on the wages that they are earning, and the families are forced then to claim welfare. We know this would be a very difficult situation to uncover, but we suggest some attention should be paid to it.

There are two statements that should be made in connection with the working poor. First of all, the working poor have insufficient income, and this is their basic problem. Secondly, that valuable as counselling is for troubled or disturbed families, no amount of family or budget counselling overcomes the basic deficiency of too few dollars.

Rather conspicuous for its absence in our brief is any discussion about the minimum wage. We did not feel this was within our area of competence to recommend certainly, and we would only comment that if the minimum wage is too high, of course the marginally productive become very hard to employ, all businesses run into problems, and the disparity between the de facto rate and the legal rate—the de factor rate being, of course, what a man will work for rather than be idle—if this is too great, your local problem becomes reasonably serious.

On the other hand, if the minimum wage is too low, there is very little we can do for welfare recipients, and indeed their rates being to bump up at the minimum wage.

On the other hand, if we develop a guaranteed income of some type, if the minimum wage is too low, then the guaranteed income will be too heavily subsidising the inefficient or ineffective business.

The recommendations under this section, of course, are for income maintenance at a reasonable level, manpower retraining, and housing which we discuss later on in the brief.

Immediate recommendations are tax relief for families and individuals whose income falls below the poverty level, and, of course, assistance with dental costs and prescription drugs.

Under the section dealing with senior citizens and people living on small pensions, we have suggested that the problem should be approached in a spirit of generosity. I think possibly we should have chosen our words better and suggested that it should be approached from the simple point of view of social justice; because many, of course, who felt that they were providing for their old age, through the pressure of affluence find that their 1930 dollars, of course, are not very valuable today. Again, our recommendations follow.

With the individuals and families on public assistance, generally the statement is, of course, that all these levels of income are entirely inadequate. We suggest that the Board of Review—and this is a forward step in this province—the Board of Review that has been set up have its area of jurisdiction extended to cover not only the mandatory parts of the legislation but also the permissive parts of the legislation which delves in the whole area of special allowances, and indeed many of the special allowances should not remain permissive but should become mandatory.

The recommendation for guaranteed income again; also that legislation governing general welfare assistance and family benefits be widely publicized so that the welfare worker as well as the recipient knows what recipients are entitled to under the legislation; and that the Board of Review's jurisdiction be extended.

Families and individuals that have the ability to become partially self-supporting under the welfare assistance today, are absolutely and utterly discouraged from any such action. They may keep back no part of any earned income. There is a ceiling, even though we are supposed to decide the income of a family on the basis of needs; the legislation imposed a ceiling of $300 a month to a recipient with three children, and allowed $10 per added dependent. I do not know how we can expect a family to support a child on $10 a month plus, of course, what they get under the family allowances.

Under the Family Benefits Act this situation is somewhat relieved, in that a recipient with one dependent can earn up to $24 a month, and then it is $12 a month after that. A slight improvement would come about if people could simply save up this allotment over the period of a year, and then perhaps for six weeks before Christmas work and replace the broken down sofa or buy themselves a washing machine; but the legislation definitely says it must be done each month, and this other thing is illegal.

We recommend, of course, for immediate action that the income allowance be raised substantially to the level of the Economic Council's poverty line.

Moving along to those families and individuals who are basically unemployable, in our Association we have become increasingly concerned about the plight of children caught in families that we refer to as problem families.

We refer briefly to the position that the Children's Aid Society find themselves in. This was the situation late in the fall, and I do not think it has really changed substantially now. We state very definitely that generally speaking the position of children of families where the parents are retarded or alcoholic or both is deplorable. Only by changing the destructive environmental or, failing that, removing the children from its debilitating effect, can any real change be brought about. In families where foster care is not the answer, long term supervision is the only way the problem can be controlled, and this is how I think we have to look at it, from this point of view of supervision and trying to control it.

Here we want to emphasize the role of the public health nurse. There is probably nothing that could be done as quickly as enlarging that could be done as quickly as enlarging the scope of her activity to tackle this difficult problem of the problem family. The public health nurse, is, of course, a respected person in the depressed areas, and she comes with service that is very much appreciated and very tangible.

Under this section we are recommending a very greatly expanded child care program concentrated in the depressed inner area.

The Minister of Health and Welfare's brief to you, sir, indicates that 23 per cent of Canada's children experience poverty in childhood. We suggest educational programs geared to the long-term disadvantaged parents.

St. Christopher House sponsored a few years ago a most imaginative program. The children that were referred to the settlement house from local schools as needing additional nutrition, their noon hour lunches were paid for providing the mother went to the settlement house and took part in a course in nutrition. This apparently was very successful.

We are suggesting that legislation be enacted to make attendance at such clinics mandatory, and this, of course, can be done through the Family Court. We are thinking particularly of the Baltimore Housing Clinic, which proved to be a very successful sort of venture.

We are suggesting, too, that voluntary sterilization and therapeutic abortion be made more freely available.

Under the section on public health, we deal with the need for enlarged public health areas. One aspect of the public health program which we failed to include in our brief—and I am not sure how we could possibly have missed it because it is something that our association has supported over the years—is our family planning clinic. There are two or three in Toronto; there are two or three within the Metropolitan Toronto area. Many of the municipalities in Metropolitan Toronto have not taken advantage of the funding which is available at the provincial level. Information on family planning, of course, is freely available to the affluent majority in our communities, but it is not freely available to the poor and it should be.

Under Manpower retraining, we have some suggestions with regard to making the training in some way relative to the availability of jobs, to make sure that the jobs for which the trainee is being trained will be sufficiently remunerative for him. The medical services available at the induction centres are not sufficient.

Under housing, there are a few statistics that we think might be of some interest to you, sir.

In our section on urban renewal, we speak particularly of the need for rehabilitation of housing in urban renewal areas, with protection for tenants as well as home-owners. This is something we have spoken about for a long time.

Under the section on social development of areas under renewal planning, we are bringing forward this morning a specific proposal that the federal government require the municipality, when it requests funds to develop a plan for urban renewal under the National Housing Act, to file also a request for funds under the Canada Assistance Plan, to bring forward a companion scheme for social renewal or community development; and that the two schemes together, one for the physical renewal and one for the community development, make up the urban renewal plan.

The provincial government should be requested to enact its share of the legislation to allow that particular section of the Canada Assistance Act to become operative in urban renewal areas.

Social planning, of course, in neighbourhood areas requires very close consultation with the people who live there, and this may be facilitated by the provision of a friendly meeting place. It only has to be a room somewhere with a coffee pot and a friendly project coordinator that can bring people in to discuss their hopes and fears for their area.

We believe that the goal for citizenship participation in urban renewal planning should be the development of neighbourhood councils or corporations capable of taking over the direction and coordination of community recreation and service programs.

The City of Toronto is shortly to start planning with the people living in the Trefann Court area for their urban renewal scheme. We are suggesting that this would be an ideal time to take hold of this opportunity that presents itself in the Trefann Court area, where there are two or three well-developed citizen organizations, to bring forward a pilot project in community development, so that we can begin to learn slowly some of the techniques involved in this activity.

In conclusion, sir, our brief emphasizes the need for greatly increased recipient participation, citizen involvement or participation, whatever you want to call it, in the programmed planning.

We endorse the Ontario Welfare's 1969 Conference of Workshops, in which it says:

Social agencies should help the poor to help themselves, by encouraging consumer participation on all boards of directors of voluntary agencies providing counselling and social services and on boards and commissions of government departments dealing in consumer services.

Our association is of the opinion that as a general principle, too, any service which is accepted in the community as a necessary and normal part of that community should be not financed as it is now out of voluntary giving or charitable giving out of the United Community Fund, but instead should be supported in a very major fashion by the broad tax base.

If we were able to do this, the finding available through the United Community Fund could be freed up and could become responsive. We would be able to develop the type of flexibility in our programs which is very badly needed if there is any hope at all for us to keep up and remain responsive and remain flexible to the ever accelerating need and changing need in our community.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that those are all the remarks I wish to make at the present time. Mrs. Burger now can bring forward her points.

Mrs. Audrey Burger: Mr. Chairman, we had hoped to speak a bit more about the children caught in the poverty trap of their parents, because these children have really no future. For this reason, Mrs. Murphy and myself became volunteers with the Canadian Mothercraft Society in their joint program with the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education on a demonstration program in infant care and education. I think the ladies and gentlemen of this committee heard Professor Ryan from Carleton University talking about early education, and he did mention this project. Since he has been heard, Dr. Fowler, who is director of this particular project, from the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education, has come out with remarkable findings. We have found that children from really very underprivileged families who came to us with an average I.Q. of 92—there were many under that—have all, within a period of nine months, starting from the age of four months, at their own age, now achieve an I.Q. of 111.

I think there was some discussion previously about children coming to school badly clothed and therefore not having a chance. What is far more important is that the children come to school with no powers of concentration, quite incapable of absorbing any information for which the taxpayer is paying; but if you catch them early enough and stimulate them, they are then at least able to keep still, to stop fidgeting and listen to what the teacher is trying to teach them. This is another aspect of education that perhaps we have not thought about enough.

I do not want to take too much of everybody's time. We would suggest that Dr. Fowler's paper should perhaps be worthy of your consideration and he would, I am sure, be glad to let you have his report. It is entitled; "A Report on Demonstration Program, Infancy and Education, from September 1966 to June 1969". Both Mrs. Murphy and I know these babies and we saw what had happened we saw what happened to the mothers of those babies, the families. The children came to us first absolutely filthy, and the mothers were so despondent and helpless and hopeless. Then suddenly the children were clean after ten months they come to us in decent conditions, with motherly cooperation.

We have been able to get in touch with the public health authorities about our single mothers, mothers of illegitimate babies. We had one baby come to us at four months when unfortunately another baby was on the way. We got in touch with the public health authorities, and that mother is now having birth control information and guidance. If we had not intervened—and I am afraid I must say this because neither the Wellesley Hospital where these two babies were born nor the public health authorities contacted this mother—she might well have several more children. She is a teen-ager with her first child, and she is a very, very lonely person. This is what we have found out, that these mothers are desperately lonely; they have nobody to whom to go and they do not know what to do. They go into hospital, they have operations, they don't know why they have operations, but they are completely apathetic; they are not really living. They are being motivated by plenty of people and they do not know why. The loneliness of these single women, many of them teen-agers, in Toronto, is very desperate, especially if they are going to continue producing children who, without the type of care that these children are now getting in this project, are doomed to begin with. Thank you.

Senator Fournier: Mr. Chairman, my question is a follow-up from the previous brief which we had this morning. I am very happy to have the chance now to present this question to the women, because it deals with education and women.

Coming from a small community where you know everybody, you know the working poor and who is on welfare. I made it a point in the last six months to follow them in shopping centres and around Christmastime mostly. Believe me, I saw good management and some pretty pitiful sights. I will not go into the details, but they were on welfare in most cases.

I believe that in the case of the working poor and people on welfare and all the poor people in general, your woman is the manager of the home; she is the bank manager and she is the boss.

Now, with all the school systems that we have across Canada, all the education that we have built-in, very few people talk of consumer education programs. I believe that a lot of people who are poor remain poor because they lack consumer abilities.

You just follow some of these women in the shopping centres and see what they are buying. Some families on one side of the street you can give, say, $400 a month, and the lady will make a wonderful job of it. With the same number in the family, same type of problem, across the street you have the same income but very different management, and it is a pitiful sight.

My question is, again: are you doing enough in training consumers by having consumer programs in education?

Mrs. Rowlands: I would agree with you, senator, that we are not doing sufficient. Mind you, judging from the people that I know, most of the families that are on welfare that I know manage marvellously well. I do not know how I would manage as well as they would seem to.

Certainly, this whole thing of household management, I think it should be more than simply consumer management or budgetary management, because there is a lot of things involved. I would say that in the high schools and in the commercial schools, certainly for the girls particularly, there should be some training in this whole business of household management, including nutrition, household buying, all of these things. I think it would be extremely helpful. I think it is through this kind of educational program, done at many levels and in many different ways, in creative and imaginative ways, that we are going to begin to tackle some of these problems that we really have not faced.

The Chairman: It has been a long time since I was in public school, but do they not teach this subject? They did in my day, household...

Mrs. Rowlands: Household economics, yes. There is certainly something being done along this line, but household economics when I went—perhaps it has changed a little bit—meant learning how to sew a straight seam and learning how to cook a few recipes.

I am thinking of something quite different. I am thinking of an approach perhaps of discussion and consultation, and developing an awareness in these girls of the very importance of nutrition and proper child training, perhaps psychology in a very simplified sort of way, an approach towards child psychology.

Senator Inman: Mr. Chairman, on page 3, paragraph 2, the brief says

We are aware that private agencies are anxious to enter into contracts with municipalities to supply counselling service. Valuable as counselling is for the disturbed and troubled family, no amount of family or budget counselling can overcome the basic deficiency of too little income. The working poor urgently require more money.

What were you suggesting, higher wages or government assistance?

Mrs. Rowlands: I think our recommendations are divided into two groups. The long-term cure possibly is a reasonable income maintenance program. We are suggesting in the meantime income tax relief for these families and added financial assistance with dental costs and prescription services.

We have not made a recommendation with regard to the minimum wage, because it is a very difficult problem, but it is perfectly obvious that $1.30 in this particular community is much too low, there is no question about this.

Our other recommendations have to do with manpower retraining programs and a reasonable supply of housing at a rent people can afford to pay. We have low income families paying $150 a month rent for their housing and having to heat it after that.

What do you pay, what is the rent for your house right now, Mrs. Rice?

Mrs. Rice: Where I just moved?

Mrs. Rowlands: Yes.

Mrs. Rice: $125 a month.

Mrs. Rowlands: Plus.

Mrs. Rice: $38 a month to heat it, plus hydro—$50 a month to heat it.

Mrs. Rowlands: Plus hydro, plus gas.

The Chairman: What does that amount to?

Mrs. Rice: I have no idea, sir. I just moved into the house. It does not look much better than an outhouse.

The Chairman: And how many of you in the family?

Mrs. Rice: I have five children myself.

Mrs. Rowlands: Mrs. Rice moved into a house just north of King Street. What is your income on your mother's allowance?

Mrs. Rice: Until they take my son off, it is $292. I think they will be taking $36 off of that this month.

The Chairman: What age is he, sixteen?

Mrs. Rice: He is seventeen now.

Mrs. Rowlands: He stopped school.

Mrs. Rice: He was laid off before Christmas.

The Chairman: What do you mean, he was laid off?

Mrs. Rice: He was working and he was laid off just before Christmas, but I wrote to the Mother's Allowance people and told them that he was out of school but they have not taken him off it yet. Now I am going to have to pay them $200 and some back. We will make it.

The Chairman: Better forget I asked you that question.

Mrs. Rowlands: This is what she, of course, is going to have to find, scrape up $200 somewhere to pay it back.

You can see the problem, anyway. Certainly it is the very high shelter costs, in answer to your question, which is a large part of the problem being faced by a low income family.

Senator Inman: In your recommendation No. 3 you are speaking about special allowances. What allowances do you suggest and how much?

Mrs. Rowlands: I am not just sure where you are, what page. I am sorry, we did not set this brief up in the way we were requested. We set it put before...

Senator Inman: I am speaking about where you mention about senior citizens.

Mrs. Rowlands: Senior citizens—again, we are suggesting that these allowances come up to the level of the poverty line as established by the Economic Council of Canada, which we consider reasonably fair, certainly no overly generous.

Senator Inman: These are where these people are in their own homes.

Mrs. Rowlands: Yes, I think so. I do not think there is any question about that.

Senator Inman: I was interested to know what special assistance you ask for.

Mrs. Rowlands: Assistance, of course, which could be rendered immediately—income tax relief. The present exemptions are very unrealistic.

The Chairman: You are not talking about the senior citizens?

Mrs. Rowlands: Yes, I am talking about the senior citizens.

The Chairman: Their immediate need is an increase.

Mrs. Rowlands: They certainly do need an increase, there is no question. They also need increased assistance with the cost of prescription drugs and dental services and medical care.

The Chairman: As a matter of fact, there is a great possibility that there will be some assistance for them in the budget next week, we hope.

Mrs. Rowlands: Hopefully.

The Chairman: Well, it is a little more than hopeful.

Mrs. Rowlands: That is very good.

Senator Inman: Just one other question on page 7, the last paragraph, speaking about retraining and so on, and these people sometimes being trained for things for which they are not suitable. Do you agree that there is not enough screening done here?

Mrs. Rowlands: There is no question about that, there is insufficient screening. There is insufficient medical screening from the point of view of physical health and mental health, and there is insufficient attention paid to the remuneration that the jobs will afford after the training is completed. These people go through retraining, and then find the job will not pay them sufficient to support themselves and their families.

Of course, there are problems involved in this. There are administrative hang-ups that are reasonably unbelievable. The medical report, when it gets to the hospital, does not indicate what course the trainee is headed for.

Senator Inman: This is what I mean.

Mrs. Rowlands: All sorts of hang-ups of this type that should be eliminated and could be eliminated easily.

Senator McGrand: There was some reference made this morning to children from slum areas, downtown areas, being moved into the newer areas. I have been told that when children from low income families attend school with children from the more affluent areas, they are often not socially accepted by their school mates and they are neglected by their teachers; they become drop-outs and eventually as young adults they end up on welfare.

If this is so, then we have discovered a cause of poverty. What I would like to know is: is this discrimination common, is it only occasional, or is it only hearsay?

Mrs. Rowlands: Sir, I do not think that we can really jump to the conclusion that moving a poor family from the inner depressed area to the suburban area will cause the child to become a drop-out and that he will then not be able to cope and will become a welfare recipient; because if the youngster remained in the depressed area, I am not sure that his chances are any greater that he will remain in school.

The basic problem, I feel, with these youngsters is that when they start in school right at the very beginning they are not equipped to cope; they have not the linguistic ability, they cannot concentrate, and they are perhaps a year behind at that time. They continue through school, but by the time they get up to Grade 8 or 9 in the inner school they are usually a full year behind or more.

Then, of course, the real adjustment into the new suburban setting where the standard of schooling is probably higher and where the kids are different, where they speak and dress differently—certainly this creates tension, there is no question about that, but I do not think that we can jump from that and say that this will cause him to be a drop-out. It may well cause him to drop out. There is no way of knowing how far he has gone.

Senator McGrand: Has there been any study of this?

Mrs. Rowlands: Yes.

Senator McGrand: There has been?

Mrs. Rowlands: Yes.

Mrs. Burger: May I say that with the project with the infants, we wanted to call our babies "under-privileged" babies and our staff said, "No, please do not use the word. There is sufficient discrimination already". So we used the word "inner city babies". So the staff are aware of this problem.

Mrs. Rowlands: I think Mrs. Rice can give an answer to this problem. She has lived in "Cabbagetown" all her life. She was educated there and her children were educated there. A few months ago she moved to a suburban area and her children started to go to a high standard suburban school. She is now back in Trefann because she could not afford the rent for the particular house, which was $150 a month plus everything else. Now she is back once again in a very depressed area. Perhaps she could tell you what happened when the children went from the inner school to the suburban. What did happen, Pat?

Mrs. Rice: I am not all that sure that moving out of town and going to a more affluent school was a problem of my kids, because I had it here in the city. It got to the point where my older children were identifiable by their faded jeans and worn out shoes. I found my older ones became very resentful.

The Chairman: Boys or girls?

Mrs. Rice: Boys. I have had eight, two boys and six girls. It was another thing, too, that when they first entered school a note was sent home, "This boy needs $5 or $10 for an activity group". I could not afford it. Therefore my children are excluded from any activities within the school. They were pointed out, of course, because of their worn clothing and shoes. Then it became a battle royal between the kids and myself. They did not want to stay in school. I could not afford car fare and lunches. I am facing that today. Right now I have to supply my son in high school with car fare and lunch money, and it means an added meal at noon hour. I have not been to the Board of Education because I have not been here that long. Just last week we moved back in. I think the same thing is going to happen.

This boy now, I think he is more than average intelligence and I would hate to see him discouraged, but it is going to happen. I do not have the money for clothing, I do not have the money to put proper food on the table. You are "robbing Peter to pay Paul". I think the amount of money given Mother's allowance recipients, welfare recipients and the low income a man is making, causes us all to be dishonest in one way or another.

The Chairman: How many children do you have living with you?

Mrs. Rice: At the present I have five.

The Chairman: You have five children and yourself, and you have $290?

Mrs. Rice: Yes, $292 right now until the end of the month, and I think it will be $260.

The Chairman: But that is less than the normal amount.

Mrs. Rice: I have the book at home, sir, Family Benefits Act, and each time I try to figure it out I should be getting over $300, and I have not had it yet.

The Chairman: But according to my book you should be receiving that.

Mrs. Rowlands: Mr. Chairman, we discover that kind of situation over and over again. I have known families now for more than fifteen years living in depressed areas of the city and this problem recurs constantly.

The Chairman: If it recurs constantly and you are a pretty good spokesman, what do you do about it?

Mrs. Rowlands: We have the Board of Review now.

Mrs. Burger: This is something very recent.

The Chairman: But do not forget that on the Board of Review, if I read your brief correctly, you are not very representative. You rather forget it is kind of a closed club.

Mrs. Rowlands: Did we suggest that here?

Mrs. Burger: I think we suggested in the field of special allowances it is a closed club. For instance, I happen to know, observing the Metro Housing and Welfare Committee, that there was an allocation made, for instance, under special allowances for blankets. In, I think, October of last year suddenly there were no more blankets and, of course, December was pretty cold; and even though the Commissioner of Welfare would very much like to have given people blankets, he just had no more money left for blankets.

This is something that Metro Toronto very graciously took over, that they could make this allocation with the assistance of the province, but there are hundreds of municipalities which just do not make use of the special allowances. It is not mandatory, and this is what makes this a closed club.

Mrs. Rowlands: This is the reason for this recommendation of ours that these permissive allowances should be made mandatory.

Mrs. Rice would just like to further point out that her heating allowance is cut off at the end of March, and it does not matter what April weather is like; there is no more money after March.

Senator Carter: At the bottom of page 5 in your brief, you recommend that the working poor be allowed to keep an increased portion of their earnings as an incentive.

Mrs. Rowlands: I think we are not referring there to the working poor; we are referring to those who are on general welfare assistance or on the provincial allowance, family benefits, and that they should be allowed to keep a larger proportion of any money that they earn.

Indeed, under general welfare assistance they cannot keep back anything at all, but under the provincial allowance, as Mr. Anderson explained this morning, in theory a person is supposed to only be on general welfare assistance if he is temporarily either unemployed or ill. If it appears that he is going to need assistance over a period of time, he is transferred and comes under the provincial allowance, Family Benefits Act. In fact, of course, some people remain on general assistance for a very long time; and after that experience of not being able to earn anything or have a boarder in the house or anything, all incentive is taken away.

Senator Carter: What earnings are you talking about, casual earnings?

Mrs. Rowlands: Yes, casual earnings, certainly, part-time work.

Senator Carter: That is what I am talking about. A person, if he is poor and he is working, he is working poor, is he not?

Mrs. Rowlands: Yes, all right, you can look at it from that point of view, if you wish. We're talking about the people who are on welfare.

You see, for a mother with a number of children, it is a very, very big step for her to decide to try to support her family and go off welfare, because immediately she does not have any medical coverage for her kids, she does not have any way of getting dental care for them. She faces constant transportation costs and all the other uncertainties, so it is a very big step. Most simply cannot afford to take the risk, to go off welfare and decide to try to support a family. If they were able to, or encouraged, as long as the children are not too young, or as long as the children are somewhat older—because we tend to think of a mother with children on family assistance as not working, whereas she is working very hard looking after the family. Once those children are older, it is a very healthy thing for her to get out and at least feel she can contribute something and perhaps provide some of the extras which, of course, on the kind of allowances which are paid they simply do not get.

Senator Carter: Mr. Chairman, the question I was going to ask is: has the witness given any thought to the form of this incentive? She just says, "Increase the portion of their earnings". Would it be an increased flat rate, or would it be an increased percentage so that the person would have some incentive to continue earning?

Mrs. Rowlands: I would think that if the present rates under the Welfare Assistance legislation are not raised, then the welfare recipients should certainly be able to keep back the proportion of income which brought them up to at least the poverty line as established by the Economic Council. They should certainly be able to keep that part; they should be able to keep anything back which is a cost to them for working, that is, transportation costs, or costs for looking after children or what-not. These things also should be allowed; anything above and beyond that, perhaps 50 per cent taken back, but there has to be a real incentive.

Senator Carter: I think you have to be realistic.

Mrs. Rowlands: That is realistic, do you not think?

Senator Carter: It is realistic in theory, but when you have everybody starting to bring in transportation costs and all those little things, you are getting tremendous bookkeeping. It is much better to say: "Here is a lump sum", or "Here is a percentage", because what you gain one way you lose in administrative costs.

Mrs. Rowlands: This may be true, but certainly there is no question at all that they should be able to keep back any earnings which take them up to the poverty line as discussed by the Economic Council.

You see, the poverty line as discussed by the Economic Council suggests that for each dependent $600 a year income would be allowed. General welfare assistance allows $120. There is the difference. That is what we are talking about. We are talking about utter deprivation, and you are talking about a family being allowed $10 a month for a child; you are talking about kids going to school in running shoes at $1.79 a pair in the middle of winter.

The Chairman: You do not need any help, I will give you some right now. The Economic Council figure for Mrs. Rice would be $4,800 to $5,400; if there is no male head of the family $4,800. What she is getting at the most if $3,600. That is just about what she is talking about, approximately within $10.

Mrs. Rowlands: Mrs. Rice says she could go to Florida on that.

Senator Carter: In your last paragraph you speak about a rising discontent and uneasiness, and a feeling of separation between the affluent majority and the minority of the poor. Can you give us some of the signs and indications of that?

Mrs. Rowlands: I think the signs and indications are in our newspapers daily. My involvement in the downtown area of the city, particularly in Trefann Court, convinces me that this is so; that the poor, the disadvantaged are now beginning to discover that they can organize and they can make their voices heard, which is a great forward step. I think this is a tremendous thing that is happening. However, unless they feel that there is a responsiveness and understanding on the part of the affluent majority, this could become ugly. There is no question about that at all in my mind, and I think most people who are involved in the downtown areas realize the potential.

I think there has to be this horizontal integration, if you like, of people who are disadvantaged, to get to know one another, to get together and be able to talk, and to be able to put their case forward very, very strongly; but there is also the necessity for a vertical integration, and that is for people who are disadvantaged to be very strongly represented on boards and commissions.

Senator Carter: Is your Council doing anything to help them organize and pool their ideas?

Mrs. Rowlands: The job of the Association of Women Electors, I should have said at the beginning, is the association of women electors, and what we have done over the last thirty years is to observe everything that goes on at City Hall that is of a public nature. We observe City Council, Board of Control, now the Executive Committee, all the committees of the City, the School Board, both the Metropolitan School Board and the City Board of Education; we observe Metro Council, Metro Executive and all the committees. We publish reports, and they are sent out to our subscribers. That is the job we do.

Through this involvement, of course, we become extremely aware of what is going on in our community, and many of us are involved at many levels in many organizations. I just do not know how many organizations would be represented by we four here.

This is what we do—and, of course, presenting the brief to you this morning is another indication of the kind of action that we take.

We have three members now in our Association who are people from the depressed inner area of the city. There is Mrs. Rice here, Mrs. LeMay and another woman that was not able to come this morning. Does that help answer?

The Chairman: We have nothing but compliments for the work you are doing, take my word for it. I am very serious about that.

While we are on that subject, one of the things you put great emphasis on, which was a matter of satisfaction for myself, was the working poor. You have been at the City Council for twelve years; not only are you knowledgeable but able to present an argument. You are genuinely interested in the poor, and we give you high marks for that.

How is it possible that you have missed the fact that provinces like Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and somewhat in the Province of Quebec they supplement the working poor; yet I have not heard a voice of protest raised about it in the Province of Ontario and in the City of Toronto.

Mrs. Rowlands: Sir, I attended the Welfare Conference in Baltimore this fall, and one of the workshops was on Canada and particularly the Ontario situation, and some of the officials of the Welfare Department were there. I raised this problem at that time, because the Americans were pointing out, of course, as you point out, that in many other places in Canada supplementation is what is done. This was reasonably stoutly defended by our Welfare Department. Now, of course, there is a feeling at many levels, and certainly we support it, that this supplementation should be done. However, it seems to me that, again, this is another sort of ad hoc approach to the problem, and a reasonably guaranteed income would be so much better, but in the meantime...

Mrs. Burger: I think what you are getting at is that the Province of Ontario is not making use of the Canada Assistance Plan.

The Chairman: You could not put it a better way. We knew it; we thought you did too. That is not the reason we came here. It is all very well: you see people around here working very hard and trying to find some solution to this problem. They need help. It is no use your saying: "Let us get the poor and the others to organize to do it". You are a voice. It is nice to hear your voice in Baltimore and, of course better still, to hear it in Toronto.

Mrs. Rowlands: We raise our voice constantly here.

Senator Pearson: Coming to the question of housing, on page 8 you say that approximately one thousand dwellings have been torn down annually.

Mrs. Rowlands: Yes.

Senator Pearson: And these have been torn down for the purpose of putting up hospitals or schools.

Mrs. Rowlands: Or private re-development.

Senator Pearson: The question I would like to ask is: what happens to those people that are displaced?

Mrs. Rowlands: They get pushed from pillar to post. They move into other deteriorating areas of the city and then, of course, you get overcrowding of dwellings. You can go into a house where three or four families are living. Rents are extremely high. This causes, of course, further deterioration.

Now the Ontario Housing Corporation, with its building program, are putting it back into stock at rents that are reasonable, a certain amount of housing, so this is being replaced; but not only, of course, are we having housing demolished—and the houses that are being demolished, of course, are usually the older housing. This last year I just saw the figures and they are down somewhat approximately 200. This is, of course, because of the decline in private apartment building at the present time.

It is a very serious problem, but added to this is the fact that low income areas that for years have been havens for working people are now turning into middle class areas through this whole thing of private re-location, as the more affluent move back into the city and take over whole areas. So not only are we losing them from this demolition, but this re-location process.

Unless public money is spent in some way to offset this, we are running into more and more serious problem as the older areas become more and more crowded.

Senator Pearson: Does the city not take over in particular cases in the displacement of these people?

Mrs. Rowlands: The City of Toronto, if you are talking about it, has divested itself of any responsibility in the housing field; has disbanded its Toronto Housing Authority and turned over its authority for supplying houses to the Ontario Housing Corporation. This is really what has happened. The Metropolitan Toronto government has some responsibility for housing for senior citizens. As far as family housing is concerned, the city has washed its hands and it is now the responsibility of the provincial government.

Senator Pearson: On the other hand, the city is the one that is getting these expressways through this city.

Mrs. Rowlands: Precisely.

Senator Pearson: And tearing these houses down.

Mrs. Rowlands: No question about that.

The Chairman: How you tread on tender toes!

Senator Pearson: It seems to me they have a responsibility there which they are neglecting and leaving it to the province to do what they like.

Mrs. Rowlands: There is something that goes on in the City of Toronto, which I should have mentioned earlier, concerning this whole area of by-law enforcement. The City of Toronto, for its size and age, has fewer slum areas than any other city in North America. Now, the City of Toronto developed a housing standard by-law back in the 1930's, the first one in North America, and while this has not been rigidly enforced over the years, at least it took out the very worst and it prevented the very worst from happening.

Within the last four or five years we have had—we have now moved on to greater things—an extremely imaginative and good director of housing standards, and a most imaginative program has been developed in this city to do with housing standards. We have an appeal very different to the provincial appeal for welfare. This is an appeal against an inspector's order to repair your property. The hearing is in public and the chairman is a judge. There is on the appeal board a social worker, a minister, a person representing labour. There is somebody from the construction industry who actually will go out and look at the property and decide whether the estimate the individual has got is too high; a real estate person. This has been a tremendous forward step and, again, I think it is the first time. It may be almost the first time in North America to have this kind of committee. There have been other appeal boards.

So Toronto in this area is way out ahead and is doing an excellent job. A lot of private rehabilitation—I think last year it was up over $2 million—has been effected through this program.

The other interesting part of it is that the housing inspector is not a disliked person. Somehow they have been able to do this job in such a way—the word that the chief housing inspector has always used, which I think we should try to remember, is the simple word “humane”—our approach is a humane approach.

I think if you will bear me out, Pat has often had the housing inspector in and people in her area have been visited regularly, and I do not think there is any resentment, is there?

Mrs. Rice: No, except the landlord gets on your back and says: “What is he coming here for?”, and then it is on your shoulders, but on the whole they have been pretty good.

The Chairman: We really have an idea for that: that humane building inspector, transfer him to the Welfare Department.

Senator Sparrow: Mr. Chairman, in the brief submitted this morning the following reference was made:

Much has been written concerning the provision of an income floor through negative income tax. Surely the mechanism for this exists to a great degree by a major increase in family allowances and youth allowances.

In your presentation on your first page under “Introduction” you say:

However, it is obvious that some method must be developed to build into any such scheme sufficient incentive to encourage independence in the recipient. Also such a scheme should not be set so as to imply encouragement to families to have large numbers of children.

Are you suggesting that the family allowance program as such has encouraged or does encourage large families?

Mrs. Rowlands: I think it would be very difficult for us to make that claim. I think that what it tends to do is probably to emphasize or under-score the old idea that the more children you have the better it is for you and for society. I think everyone here in our Association agrees with me when we say that this is our position, that family allowances, to begin with, of course, benefit everybody equally. I realize, of course, that through income tax some of it goes back. We realize too that simply to increase family allowances would be a simpler way perhaps of getting at the problem. It is a simple way because legislation already exists. However, while the energy is being generated for trying to get these allowances increased, possibly it would take the focus off the need for a guaranteed annual income at a reasonable level. I think this is what we were afraid of. We are afraid that a very substantial increase in family allowances, which is what would be required and what some people are recommending, would have to be offset equally—and this is what some briefs neglect to mention maybe—by a very vigorous program of family planning, of household management, of proper nutrition of children and all this kind of thing, or our feeling is that we would run the risk of augmenting the problem.

Senator Everett: Do I understand that you are involved in this inner city children's program that was discussed?

Mrs. Rowlands: Yes, I am.

Senator Everett: Can you tell me how many children are presently enrolled?

Mrs. Rowlands: May I let Mrs. Burge answer the technical questions, if you do not mind.

Mrs. Burger: The sample of which we have the results was very small. There were only five children. We have now ten inner city children in the program, and we take them at four months old. What is interesting about this particular report is that the children who are tested at the age of five months—we allow them to spend one month with us before we test them, to get them used to our environment—show great progress; while those who are not necessarily inner-city children whom we have tested at the age of eighteen months do not show any particular change in their outlook by the age of two and a half.

In other words, what Dr. Fowler had discovered, as I hope you gentlemen will be able to see if you can get his report, is that you have to start this type of program at an extremely early age, to be at all beneficial.

Senator Everett: And it is not beneficial, say, beyond twelve months?

Mrs. Burger: In the studies which were done in the United States, I think they found that with eleven month old children you do get a beneficial program, but Dr. Fowler has found that the benefits are far greater for those between the age of four and five months.

Senator Everett: How long do you generally keep the children in the program?

Mrs. Burger: We are limited to two and a half years. Our society, the Canadian Mothercraft Society, decided that there are day care centres within the municipality and also private nurseries that accept children at the age of two and a half, so we have concentrated on the infant group. Primarily it was for working parents, and last year we succeeded in getting Metropolitan Toronto to subsidize ten underprivileged children in the program from inner city children in the program at public expense; but basically we were geared to a middle class society before that.

Senator Everett: What sort of program does this study indicate to you is necessary?

Mrs. Burger: I wish Dr. Fowler were here. I hope you will have the opportunity of speaking to him. We feel very strongly that, specifically with regard to welfare, this gives these infants the opportunity of arriving at school with, if not better, the same type of stimulation which the other children have. I think any of you ladies and gentlemen who have been into any school will pick out underprivileged children, not necessarily by their clothing but by the fact that they fidget the whole time and they cannot keep still and concentrate. Nobody has ever read to them; nobody has ever talked to them; nobody has ever showed them any pictures. There has been no mother who said: "Five toes—one, two, three, four, five; five fingers on the hand". This is the type of thing that we do with our babies in our program, which we hope to be able to teach the parents, too, which the mother in the average, hard-core poverty family, especially the family which is naturally a large family, has not the time to do. She is much too worried about the mere fact of living to be able to do anything for her children. Therefore, they arrive at school unable to concentrate. They have never been taught how.

Senator Everett: If this were a broader program, how would the children be selected?

Mrs. Burger: I think it should be a sort of head-start program. I do not like to use the word because this has been used too often, especially in the United States, but there should be this type of program for children in very under-privileged areas—a head start for them at a very young age.

Senator Everett: How does your program compare to the head-start program in the United States?

Mrs. Burger: As I say, we have these ten children from Metropolitan Toronto which we are taking in at a very small amount of what the program actually costs, and we have a training school within our centre for young girls who we hope one day will be infant care workers or good mothers. This enables us to have a ratio of maybe one adult to three babies; therefore our results are stupendous.

I think the provincial legislation calls for ten to one in the older age groups, and I think in this particular age group they advocate four to one with infants, but there are not infant nurseries yet. Ours is the first.

Mrs. Rowlands: Could I add further to that, that this is the program we hear about when we go over to Hamilton. I do not know whether the Hamilton Family Service Association are going to be before you.

The Chairman: Yes, the Hamilton people are presenting a brief. It is one of the best. The Social Planning Council is coming.

Mrs. Burger: This is not the Social Planning Council; this is the Family Service

Association in Hamilton which started a 28-week project in a certain urban renewal area, very depressed area. All they did was take a group of these children, and they also had a test group that just remained in the normal situation. They took these youngsters for a period of 28 weeks and put them in nursery school three mornings a week. The improvement in their linguistic ability, especially those who were furthest behind, was measurable to the extent that they put it on charts and graphs. This was the improvement with just three mornings a week in nursery school.

Senator Everett: This is the improvement and, as I understand it, this is in the program up to two and a half years.

Mrs. Burger: No, I am talking about another program. I am talking about something which was done with a different group in Hamilton through the Family Service Association. These youngsters were older.

Senator Everett: I understand that. I am talking about your program.

Mrs. Burger: Unfortunately there have not been funds to do a follow-up, but I know several of our children have gone to municipal day nurseries, not necessarily the underprivileged group, and we do hear they are doing extremely well at the second stage.

Senator Everett: You do not have any way of following them through over the succeeding years?

Mrs. Burger: We have not any systematic way, but we do have some mothers who are bringing their children back because they know we are interested, but there are no funds for actually testing.

Commissioner Anderson who spoke to you this morning has agreed that we could follow these infants up if there were funds available.

Senator Everett: Have you made any application for funds?

Mrs. Burger: There has been application made, and Mr. McHugh from the Ontario Institute of Studies and Education is here, and I think he could tell you that the application has not been at all successful.

Senator Fergusson: Mr. Chairman, I know it is late and we have subjected our witnesses to a very difficult session in which they have done very well, but there is one thing I would like to ask before they leave. On page 6 they refer to the Children's Aid Society of Metropolitan Toronto, and it seems to me that the preventive service the Children's Aid Society provides has not decreased but it has increased. Can you tell me what is the philosophy which caused the province to cut back the budget, as you say they did, in 1969? Are these preventive services going to be provided some other way or are you just going to do without them?

Mrs. Rowlands: I know that last year the Children's Aid Society were very, very disturbed about this situation of the cut-back in their budget. There was some suggestion that there were certain inefficiencies within their administrative set-up that had to be overcome, but the result of the cut-back was that the social worker staff was cut back by eleven workers. To me this is unbelievable, because, as you say, their volume of work is increasing tremendously, of course, with the increase in population in the Metropolitan Toronto area, in fact increased everywhere; and to meet this increasing need by cutting back a budget on so vital a service—I don't know, but I think they have presented their budget again very recently and I have not heard what the present situation is, but last year and late this fall this was the situation. They were simply not able to do the preventive work; they were merely there in a severe crisis situation to pick up the bits.

The Chairman: Any other questions? If not, let me say on behalf of the Committee to you, Mrs. Rowlands, and to all of the ladies, how much we are impressed with your delegation. We are delighted to know that you are here to do your work, trying to help the poor and trying to help the people of Toronto generally. We thank you for coming, and I can assure you that your presentation will be very seriously considered.

Mrs. Rowlands: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

The committee adjourned.

Toronto, Tuesday, March 10, 1970

The Special Senate Committee on Poverty (Sub-Committee "A"), met this day at 2.30 p.m. at the St. Lawrence Hall.

Senator David A. Croll (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Call the meeting to order. We have a brief of the Victoria Day Car Services. On my immediate right is Mrs. Barbara Chisholm, Executive Director. She is a social worker with child welfare experience. She will introduce the people with her.

Mrs. Barbara Chisholm, Executive Director, The Victoria Day Nursery: On my immediate right is Mrs. Craig Davidson, President of the Board of Directors of my agency, board member of the Family Services Association, and a very active volunteer in Metro Toronto. On her right is Mrs. Elbyra Scepe, who is one of the parents whose children are in the care of the Victoria Day Services. She is a mother who is on public assistance. First of all we are going to show you a film which my agency has just last week finished making. The title of the film is, Child of the Universe. What we are hoping to introduce in this film is a visual position statement about part of the point of view we have taken in our brief, which is that services to children and their parents, to young families in Canada must become a service of involvement and sharing on the part of those receiving and those giving if in fact we are to move our programs away from the drawbacks of the system we have now, and what in fact happens if that kind of sharing is done properly.

Mrs. Chisholm: Ladies and gentlemen, my name is Barbara Chisholm and I am the Executive Director of Victoria Day Car Services here in Toronto. I have with me my president and one of the parents whose children we share, helping the parent.

The point of view that we would like to represent in our brief is to depart from discussion of programs as such, debating the issues of how income access may be improved to the citizens of Canada who do not have access to it for whatever reasons; to acknowledge that the basic factors involved in the ideology of poverty are very complicated and interactional. There is no one single factor that causes it. Therefore, solution is no easier to come by. But we would like to concentrate instead on the point of view which we hope our film raises for you and echoes and that is that no program, however sophisticatedly it is designed, no set of income tax proposals no matter how creative, will help to move particularly the locked-in generational poverty victims out of that situation unless we do two things. One, recognize that human change is a process and that it cannot be brought about either by injunction or command or by simply designing fiscal opportunities which give people without sufficient income access, a more gracious and favourable access, to some money. Human change needs human agents to help it happen.

The second point is that just as money is not the only thing missing from the households of the poor, we believe that supportive services such as our agency represents and which we have tried to demonstrate to you, are absolutely essential if we are to enable the poor and the near poor and the low middle classes to move with us into a more functional, more viably functional set of adjustments and standards and behaviours.

We feel that one of the most critical mistakes in the past 40 years in North America in its attempt to solve the question of need and dependence, has been the absence of these two points. There has been, and we attempted to develop, reasons for this in the brief. A polarization between the public and the private sectors which we feel is regrettable and which, instead of relieving poverty, have independently and together led to not only keep it alive but in fact have actively contributed to increasing it.

On the public side there has been the pressures on defined public assistance programs brought about by all of us. I don't feel that it is fair to say it is any department of public welfare's part. They, after all, reflect the conventional wisdom and our conventional wisdom has been very conventional but hardly very wise.

We have defined a loud human need and then we have not supported it very well. We have made it increasingly impossible for public welfare staffs to recognize the human condition in which recipients exist. And the antagonism which this has set up between them has made the recipient suspicious of the programs and the programs inaccessible to the recipient.

The private voluntary field of social work turned away in the forties and fifties from its concern with the kind of environment people had to have to a present occupation with adjustment to that environment, partly as a result of case work's behind-the-barn marriage with psychiatry. And its excitement about being treaters. And we did not communicate with each other. We had very little communication. So that the skill which voluntary social work did in fact develop about how to help people change and how long it took and how much help it took was very slowly, if ever, communicated to the public sector. The use of interview as a technique, therefore, became reserved to people who could use it, who had language skills and who could conceptualize. So the middle and upper classes became the recipients of most of our private, voluntary efforts, excluding the poor and helping to alienate them and make them feel as we are now being told, and with right and justification, that we are irrelevant to the problems of actual environment.

We feel that whatever programs grow out of this committee's deliberations and recommendations, and we agree that many new ones are indicated, must involve in their implementation, regulations and recommendations, recognition for the need for proper counselling and supportive services with the recipients, not just to them or for them or on their behalf, but in fact planned with them. Unless we in fact wish to duplicate our mistakes in the past, and we will redefine our public welfare system under new titles, but we won't move poverty.

Thank you.

The Chairman: Senator Inman.

Senator Inman: On page 1 paragraph 5, you say, "We have not allowed the disadvantaged and the poor to tell us in fact 'like it is', nor have we considered including them in planning ways to solve their problems. Rather, we have tended to treat them as though they were the problem;" and this is contrary to some people's thoughts on this subject. What do you think of that, yourself?

Mrs. Chisholm: Perhaps the contradiction may come, senator, in terms of timing. I think there is now a very much more positive recognition of this. What I am talking to in this point is the pattern of what has brought us to the present dilemma in which I think both the public and the private sectors were preoccupied in doing things for clients or recipients, but we were unbelievably innocent about asking them whether this was what they wanted, in fact, in my field particularly. I am a voluntary, private social worker from the private social work field. I wish I could be paid minimum wage hours for the hours I have spent on committees with my own professional peers or with board people, the professional volunteers, working very hard to try to decide what it is our clients needed and we never had a client there to say, "Thank you very much, that is a beautiful idea, but as a matter of fact what I need is something different." And this is the point I am trying to get at. I think it has been naive. I don't think it has been malicious. I just think it has been innocent and it is very important that we have people like my Mrs. Seepe who might come in and say, "Gosh, thanks very much, Mrs. Chisholm. That is swell, but what I and the children really need this afternoon is something else."

Senator Inman: And one more question. This is pertinent to different parts, but do you say that more parental involvement should be encouraged with regard to providing playgrounds and small parks and things for children? Now, I can understand they might have to be encouraged to do this, but I have in mind people, young people that we heard in one of the cities, a group of young students gets interested in the children in the area and with minimal expense, practically nothing, they got a piece of vacant land and they made the play equipment, and I am just wondering if parents could be interested in doing this sort of thing in the places where other parties aren't accessible? What do you think of that?

Mr. Chisholm: I think we would find, senator, that parents have the same kind of preoccupation about good things, most parents for their children as you and I. And that, given the opportunity, and a sincere opportunity, not tokenism but a genuine opportunity to participate in this, that most of them would jump at it. I think there is a genuine wish on the part of both parents, particularly parents who have come out of the locked-in system and who are seeing some light at the end of that tunnel.

Senator Inman: Do you think that perhaps more suggestions of such an idea would be a help? Perhaps they mightn't think of it?

Mrs. Chisholm: I think that anything that helps us to have the three-unit, really as a triad partnership can do nothing but help, of course.

Senator Inman: Thank you.

Senator Fergusson: Mr. Chairman, I would certainly like to compliment Mrs. Chisholm and their group for this excellent brief which is one of the best we have had, I would think.

Mrs. Chisholm: Thank you, very much.

Senator Fergusson: And I am sure it is going to be very helpful to our committee in coming to decisions. I just have one or two things I would like to ask about. One is on page 8, small "h", where you refer to encouragement for youth to remain in school. This is one of the things we must have through an assistant program which allows sufficient income to the family that youths are not forced to go to work in order to support the parents and younger children. Do you think from your experience that many youths are forced to go to work to help support their family?

Mrs. Chisholm: The information I have received from a number of my social worker friends is that this is still happening to a rather surprising extent, yes.

Senator Fergusson: The reason I ask is that we have had other witnesses who have said they didn't think that going to work, dropping out of school and going back to work was the reason for very many dropouts in these days, and I just wonder what your opinion is?

Mrs. Chisholm: I think the dropout phenomenon has been so often associated in the public's mind with the youth problem as such, in terms of drugs or rebellion or violence or the disenchanting uninvolved youth, and it is easy perhaps, "easy", to overlook the less obvious, more subtle kind of problem. The youngster who is leaving school at 14 or 15 to try and get a job is not going to be as visible in his community as a youngster who is dropping out of school and is more visible because of his behaviour. So that, the more visible youth are the ones that we are paying more attention to, either happily or unhappily, but my understanding is that there is enough of this still going on that we need to be concerned about it.

Senator Fergusson: Another thing I would like to ask you about is in replying to Senator Inman's questions you said you thought the parents would be very pleased to do anything they could to assist. I don't know whether this is relevant or not, but I was wondering if you could tell us if you had any experience with this battered children syndrome?

Mrs. Chisholm: Yes, I have.

Senator Fergusson: And whether there is any connection with parents wanting to help them or neglecting them?

Mrs. Chisholm: Yes. Over the past period of about two and a half years I have been used as special consultant to the coroner's office here in Ontario in cases of inquests on the deaths of small children in which the question of battered child was a fact and cases where agencies were already involved in the situation, and yet, and still a child died. This has been a tremendous experience for me, personally. I have learned a great deal about it and it has stimulated a tremendous amount of the kind of rationale behind our brief.

I think almost without exception it is safe to say that the parent who batters his child, who beats his child up very badly, at some point before he did it or she did it or they did it gave off cries for help the way we are beginning to understand a suicide patient does. We know that there is something. I think that is what the doctors even call it, is a cry for help on the part of people who try to kill themselves. That is, there was a period in which they said to the world, "I am desperate".

I am convinced that with the exception of mentally ill parents, people who are in fact psychotic, there was a time when even the least competent, most overwhelmed and poor parent tried to let somebody know. And we didn't hear because we don't know how to hear. We haven't been geared to hearing. Almost without exception the families on whom I have been brought in as a consultant were families on public assistance programs, poor, uneducated, without internal resources for coping with problems, overwhelmed, living in appalling housing which got dirtier and dirtier, on a treadmill to absolutely nowhere. And the demand of these children was more than they could cope with. If we continue to say that this kind of poverty is to be removed by a shift in our economic kindness, we will continue to have just as many battered babies because the money is not the central issue. Someone has said recently that every parent is a potential child beater and I think this is true. Everyone can reach that point where you are so exasperated by a child you just want to take him by his head and sent him out a window without opening it. And the irony is that our least competent parents are the ones upon whom we have put the greatest burden to solve their problems alone, with the pressure of not quite enough money and then some kind of an injunction to manage it well enough. So that, yes, I think we could stop battered children. We haven't even tried to find the way into that. We need to find the way.

Senator Fergusson: How are we going to recognize this cry for help?

Mr. Chisholm: Well, could I ask Mrs. Seepe to tell you what it is like to be on public assistance and what it is like to get help. Maybe she could answer it better than I because she has been there.

Mrs. Elbyra Seepe: I don't know if I can do a good job or not.

The Chairman: You just do the best you can.

Mrs. Seepe: I was very ill last year. Prior to that I tried to get public housing. I lived in a three-room flat with the four of us. The flat was exceedingly small and we lived on the top. Well, it made me frustrated. I shouted at the children and the children became more intolerable as we went along. Well, I finally had a stroke, last year. Then, things began to happen as soon as I came out of it. I was actually very fortunate because I hadn't much of a disability left. But, all of a sudden things began to roll. Ontario Housing got me a three-bedroom apartment which is heaven on earth and mother's allowance finally came over with giving me a substantial income which allows me to live, not, you know, not normal but reasonable, which I didn't have prior to that. Is it then always that it has got to be that something serious happens before anybody can do anything?

Now, the nursery has been very good to me.

The Chairman: How many children do you have?

Mrs. Seepe: Three.

The Chairman: How old?

Mrs. Seepe: One is 14.

The Chairman: 14.

Mrs. Seepe: One is 14. One is 13, and the five-year-old which is at the nursery. Now, the nursery has been good to me in the fact that, you see, in order to pay medical bills I have to pay them first and then hand the bill in and the welfare will pay. Well, under the services I am never able to do that because the way the prices are now, I just go on the 1st of the month and do my shopping and that is pretty nearly half of the money taken care of. So, I have been going to the nursery. They have been advancing me the money and then I have paid them back when the welfare paid me the money for the bill.

Another thing is, I couldn't dress myself the way I am if it hadn't been for the nursery. You see, all the volunteer workers hand their clothes in that they find have been either outgrown or still, not bad enough to throw away. And, for a minimum amount I can buy them if I haven't got too much pride to wear them, which I lost a long time ago.

This is the unfortunate circumstance in my case, by being sick. Now, hopefully I will be able to go back to work in the fall but in the meantime I have got to manage. There is a lot of people that are much worse off than I am, really, but I think we should do something to get more services like Victoria Day Care, not the impersonal one. Where somebody still has a minute to spare and when you are really desperate. I have gone there. A cup of tea does remarkable things.

That is all I really have to say.

The Chairman: Well, you said the pride which you lost some time ago.

Mrs. Seepe: You see, people do have pride.

The Chairman: Of course. That is what we are concerned with.

Mrs. Seepe: And charity is something a lot of people consider below their dignity.

The Chairman: Yes.

Mrs. Seepe: Secondhand clothes are one thing that a lot of people consider below their dignity to wear.

The Chairman: So whatever comes to you comes to you as a matter of right.

Mrs. Seepe: Not necessarily, sir.

The Chairman: Well, the state...

Mrs. Seepe: Well, people do sometimes imply that we live off the taxpayers' money and if it wasn't for the taxpayers we wouldn't survive.

The Chairman: I am a politician. I live off the taxpayers' money too.

Mrs. Seepe: But people are shortsighted. They don't consider that the taxpayers' money.

The Chairman: You would be surprised when I try to get a raise. The point you made here today was something they did that restored you, made a different person out of you?

Mrs. Seepe: Yes, you see, more important than money is a broken spirit.

The Chairman: Then you said you had lost it sometime ago. Now, the reason I asked the question is I thought you might say that it was being restored to you by these methods that were being employed, because that is the purpose of our exercise, isn't it?

Mrs. Seepe: Precisely. That is what it is. You see, I have got my backbone back and that means that I am now willing to overcome the fact that I felt useless after I had that stroke. I felt bad because I am too young to have it. Anyhow, I got the courage back and I can face the fact that as soon as I am able to get clearance I would like to work and make my own living without being a charity case. Let's put it the way it is.

The Chairman: But you keep using "charity case" all the time and that bothers us more than it bothers you.

Mrs. Seepe: It does.

The Chairman: It is not charity. The law of the land says that we must meet your needs as a matter of right. That is the law of the land in this country.

Mrs. Seepe: Yes, but, sir, not everybody thinks like you.

The Chairman: No, that is not me. I am telling you what the law is. The fact that those people will be so affected is another matter. That is the law. You understand? That is your right and when you take it you are not taking charity.

Mrs. Seepe: Yes, but when you take it over a period of time it isn't, it is an emergency rather than have to take it over a period of time.

The Chairman: Not an emergency. It is hopeful that you won't need it over a long period of time. That depends on the person. It doesn't make any difference whether it is a day or a year. If the circumstances warrant it that is the law and that is the intention of the law and people who don't give effect to that aren't doing what is right by other people. That is one of the reasons we are here today. People don't seem to understand that.

Mrs. Seepe: But, you see, it is made very hard because not many people get the opportunity to do what I am doing.

The Chairman: That is right.

Mrs. Seepe: And not many people have the opportunity that I have had, to have a friend and to have, well, the day care services too.

The Chairman: All right. Go ahead.

Mrs. Seepe: When I was in the hospital, I have no parents, no family other than the children, but one of the nursery workers came to see me, I wasn't really alone.

The Chairman: Senator Cook.

Senator Cook: Mr. Chairman, as I read this very excellent brief it is borne out to me that there will always be a need, whatever improvement takes place in the system, as I read it there will always be a need for the Victoria Day Care. Now, with that in mind, how many children have you enrolled?

Mrs. Chisholm: In Ontario the numbers you are allowed to accept are set by the Day Nursery Branch, senator, which legislates under the Day Nurseries Act. So, our particular building is licensed to accommodate 45 children on any day, when we are full. We are not supposed to have any more than that. We run something, oh, depending upon the kind of year we have and whether we have a number of small children who start with us young and grow with us, which I think is the pattern. We may have a year with a small turnover or we may have a year in which we serve 90 or 100 children. We also have a small additional program called Family Day Care which is using the homes of families and we supervise and pay to help take care of children who have no place to go for lunch, who have no place to go after school.

Senator Fergusson: That is beyond the 45?

Mrs. Chisholm: That is beyond the 45, yes, senator. The 45 is only in our group centre program. This is, if you will, sort of extramural, outside of that. So, we are very small. We touch only a drop in the bucket of need right in this very community. But, it is very difficult to expand because of the problems of financing and, in a sense, community understanding.

Senator Cook: Do you operate throughout the whole year?

Mrs. Chisholm: Yes, we operate 13 out of the 12 sometimes, yes. We never close except on statutory holidays.

Senator Cook: And how do you finance yourself?

Mrs. Chisholm: We are subsidized through the Metropolitan Toronto Department of Public Welfare for eligible families who qualify under their public terms, their qualification terms for subsidy; parents who cannot pay the full fee but who qualify as being recognized by them as eligible for this service and they pay the fee and apparently it is the fee and then we bill Metro for the difference up to the maximum figure which we agree on each year. Then, we also receive money from the United Community Fund as a member social agency on a different basis for certain services which the public authorities do not yet recognize. For example, the Day Nurseries Act in Ontario does not recognize as a chargeable cost any of the social work services which Mrs. Seepe is saying were the things which enabled her to help rehabilitate her attitude and herself and which we are saying here is the essential ingredient which has been left out up to date.

Senator Cook: One final question. Are there many more such groups, do you know?

Mrs. Chisholm: No, there are not, sir. There are two, three other agencies in this community similar to ours, one of which is very similar and one of which has moved off in another direction, specially concentrating on the mentally ill children. We are concentrating essentially on the normal children, normally family, but family of risk, because the Mrs. Seepes of this world, if expected to raise their families alone, have a mathematical risk which is very much higher than other families that their children might not land on their feet. So, we try very much to concentrate on this type of family.

Senator Cook: Thank you, you are doing remarkable work.

Mrs. Chisholm: Thank you.

The Chairman: You do know, of course, that the day nurseries are covered under the Canada Assistance Act?

Mrs. Chisholm: Yes, sir.

The Chairman: And that as far as the federal government is concerned, it is an open end deal. You bill us and we pay for it. We don't ask any questions.

Mrs. Chisholm: Would that it was that simple, Senator Croll.

The Chairman: But from the point of view of how we see it. We realize you have difficulties in the province.

Mrs. Chisholm: Right.

The Chairman: Oh, yes. But now, what provinces do a better job in that respect than Ontario?

Mrs. Chisholm: Alberta.

The Chairman: Alberta, yes. British Columbia?

Mrs. Chisholm: No, British Columbia is not as advanced as we are.

The Chairman: Do you know why Alberta does a better job?

Mrs. Chisholm: I wish I did.

The Chairman: I will tell you. Do you remember Charlotte Whitton?

Mrs. Chisholm: Yes.

The Chairman: Do you remember when Charlotte Whitton went down there?

Mrs. Chisholm: Is she doing anything?

The Chairman: Not at the moment, but they never forgot her. Thank goodness for that.

Mrs. Chisholm: This is one of the enormous problems because the Canada Assistance Act being permissive legislation rather than mandatory put no sanctions on use and this is a real problem.

The Chairman: Go ahead.

Senator Inman: Could I ask one more question? I am particularly interested in this brief having a lot of grandchildren. But in your introduction you say, "The sole-support mothers and the working mothers comprise our major parent group, although our service is not limited to them."

What other mothers do you give your service to?

Mrs. Chisholm: We have mothers who are at home who are not away from their children by the day but who are unable to cope full day with their responsibility. Now, this may be because of a physical reason. For instance, we have two little boys in the centre whose mother is totally blind and whose father has only ten per cent vision. Now, it is impossible for that mother, no matter how devoted or loving, to help her children through that critical period when they need to begin to cruise and explore and to involve themselves with other children. She can't see them. Therefore, there is no way she can supervise. So that is a very visible, that is a pun but that is a very obvious reason for sharing the parenting responsibility.

We had another situation where two little children whose parents were both deaf mutes where the same problems of obvious inability to care and supervise, but we also have post mental breakdown mothers or pre mental breakdown mothers, mothers who are right on the edge, whose capacity to cope with the demands of young demanding pre-school children is just minimal, and these are what I call our eggshell mothers, the ones who are so brittle that it may be what you have to come to terms with is the amount of parenting they can give. It can be in this area. And in this area we, all of us, have to help provide this and this and this other part of it for them. So that there may be mothers at home not employed but who are as critically unable to parent as the one who is physically away for part of the day.

The Chairman: Senator Everett.

Senator Everett: You make a statement on page 4, I think, of your brief. You made it in verbal evidence that the private social sector has dealt mostly or assisted mostly the middle upper class. I think that is the way you phrased it?

Mrs. Chisholm: Yes.

Senator Everett: I find that very difficult to believe, that the great benefit of the work of the private sector was realized by the middle and upper middle class, and if that is true that is a terrible indictment of our private social sector and the whole concept of United Appeal and everything else that we have associated with that over the years. Do you think you really mean that?

Mrs. Chisholm: I think I really mean it, sir. I don't think it was malicious and I think this is important to understand. Programs developed, emphasize developed, there isn't an agency I know that has ever been under-worked. You know, they have always been terribly involved with what they have been doing, but I think the polarization did in fact happen and I think one of the reasons why private social work lost sight of poverty for a while was a point I made elsewhere in here, that I think the fact that we did have basic social security around tended to quell anxiety about poverty. I think there was an assumption that it didn't exist because there were basic social security programs and that it was not the prerogative of the private sector to deal with this any longer. Because, in a sense, it, quote, had been dealt with. So that it was not a malicious thing. It was an estrangement for various other reasons as well, but I do not believe that the private sector has been involved with poverty on any significant basis for the last 25 years.

Senator Everett: Would you care to name some specific agencies that you feel suffer from this?

Mrs. Chisholm: Any of the private agencies. I don't think I want to be placed in a position of appearing to criticize agencies because it is an across-the-board issue in terms of private agencies which, for example, some of which charge fees for services; agencies involving, counselling agencies with parent-child relationships, agencies involved with marital counselling, agencies involved in recreation programming. These kind of issues, all of which are in their place very valid, terribly important. I think the private sector tends to see, for example, the neglected child in terms of a state responsibility and if they become involved, if the private sector becomes involved with families which failed in their parenting, this was diverted then over to the public sector.

Senator Everett: Well, in a question of priorities what do you believe we should do with the private sector?

Mrs. Chisholm: Do with it? I think that it is not, if I may slightly rephrase that, senator. I would feel that one of the most implications for now, not the future but right now, are to define honestly the patterns of new communication with each other. We have not talked with each other. We do not co-operate well with each other.

Senator Everett: Who is each other in this case?

Mrs. Chisholm: The public sector.

Senator Everett: I see.

Mrs. Chisholm: For example, one of the things that I would very much like to see is the institution of advisory bodies involving private social work, but also citizens and the Mrs. Seepes of this world, as advisory bodies to government departments.

Senator Everett: But that is another problem. We may come to that later. I am interested in this problem of the failure of the private agencies, in your judgment, over many years, to effectively treat those who are in poverty. You say that as an indictment against the private agencies. Now, whether we agree or disagree with you, if that is your feeling what should be done with the private agencies? Should the support of, say, United Appeal be withdrawn from them?

Mrs. Chisholm: No, I think the private sector has a very vital role to play and while I am critical of the field I am a part of, I am not raising these as indictments in terms of polarization of yea or nay values, who should survive and who shouldn't survive in the future. I think that the private sector has a tremendously important function to play still. I suspect the private and public sectors will redefine who does what and maybe funding will be done differently for different things, but there is still an important role. But we do still not successfully yet sit down and try to define what public and private ought to do and who ought to be funded for what. It still is off in pockets. The fund for the private ones, the tax dollar for the public ones. And there is not very good communication.

Senator Everett: That is not really true though. Welfare councils have been doing that for some considerable time.

Mrs. Chisholm: Not effectively, though.

Senator Everett: Well, not effectively, but we have been trying to. But you go on on page 4 and say, I think the private agencies guilty, if I paraphrase you correctly, of dealing with the people in their environment rather than the environment itself. You find fault with the private agencies for that. What would you have them do then?

Mrs. Chisholm: I am not finding fault, if I may just defend my position, sir, for a moment. I am trying to illustrate here why I think we have reached the point we have reached. I think it was simply a historic development. It is easy to criticize it when you are looking back on it, the preoccupation with understanding human behaviour. The tremendous impetus that psychiatry gave to social work in the 1940's and '50's tended to a tremendous excited kind of understanding of what made Sammy run and how to facilitate this. The development of the child help movement all are echoes of this. It was not a question of who was good or who was bad and this is simply that developments were so different they polarized and now I think we need to try to find a way to synthesize those developments, to bring them into a different interactional basis so that the private know-how is built into the public service in a way that it hasn't been built in before.

Senator Everett: Well, you lost me at the last interaction there. As I understand it, you want the private agencies to deal with the environmental problems?

Mrs. Chisholm: I think the private agencies are particularly geared to provide the supportive services that I mentioned at the end, particularly geared for this. They have the skill, the know-how, the background, the volunteer groups, the board of directors, the particular expertise in counselling and for these reasons I think they should still continue to be used. We know how to give good day care. We know how to do...

Senator Everett: Well, that is just my point. That isn't then attacking the problem of environment?

Mrs. Chisholm: Oh, yes; oh, yes.

Senator Everett: Doesn't that accept the environment the way it is and say attack the people within the environment?

Mrs. Chisholm: Now you have lost me. May I have that again?

Senator Everett: Well, as I understood your critique of the private agency was that it allowed the environment in which the problem arose?

Mrs. Chisholm: I think that is what it did in the past, yes.

Senator Everett: And it dealt with the people in that environment?

Mrs. Chisholm: Right, right.

Senator Everett: But from what you say, what would follow from that is that they should be involved in changing the environment?

Mrs. Chisholm: Well, some of them certainly are.

Senator Everett: But then you go on to say that really what they should be doing is providing supportive services?

Mrs. Chisholm: Yes, because it is not either/or, is it, senator, which is really what I am trying to say in the brief. Let's not get ourselves into a simplistic kind of solution pattern that suggests either it is just money or either it is better housing. You know, this kind of thing. But it is in fact a package which may be described but cannot be separated. You can't have just bits here and bits there. It is an interactional kind of things. Yes, you need cracking good attacks on the environment. We need to do all kinds of things with housing. I didn't even attempt to go into that here. We need to take a much more effective look at income access. We need to do a better job of birth control dissemination for people who can't cope with having children. But we also need to help people find their way out, because it takes the minimum of, with our families for example at the centre, the minimum that we find we can take a relatively healthy young family and get it back on its feet is a year and a half and that has been the absolute minimum, and for many of our families it is now two, three, four years to re-establish them. And this is a long-term pull. So that it is a new kind of partnership. The private sector, I think, is particularly competent at helping people by provision of services, but also by working directly with them to share the problems and helping them learn how to get mobilized to find their way out. The public sector is particularly geared at the, if you will, at a better crack at environment and income access than the private sector has been.

Senator Everett: The Association of Women Electors referred us to a study that they are making of ten children in sort of a combination of day care and head-start. Since you are in that field and probably as expert as anybody, would you care to give us a critique of that experiment?

Mrs. Chisholm: I don't know which one you are referring to, sir. I am sorry.

Senator Everett: I don't know how to describe it.

The Chairman: Professor Crawford.

Mrs. Chisholm: Do you by any chance mean Dr. Fowler?

The Chairman: Dr. Fowler. Dr. Fowler.

Mrs. Chisholm: Yes, I know that one.

The Chairman: Yes, go ahead.

Mrs. Chisholm: This is a stimulation program for babies and infants.

Senator Everett: That is right. They get them at four months and leave them at two and a half years.

Mrs. Chisholm: I think it is probably too early. Even Dr. Fowler himself has done nothing more than his first impression findings. We would certainly think that any research would help the community to understand that learning begins at a very much earlier age than what was once thought is a useful contribution. We would hope that it would not stimulate, again, singular thinking that the thing you do for small children is you get them cognitively stimulated, period, but that we continue to have it in a larger program of what happens to the families of these children as well. For example, one of the risks in our kind of business is that if you just give a good service to the child and you spend a lot of time, really culturally stimulating him and teaching him and getting him all zapped up and he really is learning and he comes home every night to a family situation unable to grow at the same rate, you not only do him a disservice, you set up a triangle because the family gets, and rightly so, can feel you are wooing that child away from them. They can be terribly threatened and parents will make the things fail because they think you are taking their child away from them. And I have seen this happen with programs that concentrated only on the child to the exclusion of realizing he belongs to his family. We have no prior claim.

Senator Everett: That is interesting because we have been told on certain occasions that the cure to poverty is to get the children into some kind of head start program.

Mrs. Chisholm: We must learn some lessons about the preoccupation of doing it just for the children. It really suggests a kind of dismissal of the parent as a valid factor and it has been very innocently done, but some of the reasons I think head start in the United States has had some back start reactions later is the missing element with the child's own family.

The Chairman: As a matter of fact, Senator Everett, the Americans, after working with head start for a considerable time, have gone cool on it.

Senator Everett: Yes, I understand that, Mr. Chairman. One last question. Do I read you correctly when on page 4 here, item 3, subsection (b)...

Mrs. Chisholm: Right.

Senator Everett: "A second point of view which played into the conservatism of professional social work was a conviction that children, especially small children, are always better cared for by their own mothers." I recall when I first got involved in this field that the thinking was the antithesis of that, that children who are in trouble should be in foster care, in institutional care, and then all of a sudden it reversed over to keeping the family together. Do I gather from that that it has reversed back again?

Mrs. Chisholm: What you are hearing is a person who has been trying to interpret day care as a shared parenting rationale and meeting a tremendous amount of professional resistance in the child welfare field for almost the last ten years because of the misunderstanding about what parenting involves. I am being editorial there when I say that, but our feeling about misunderstanding. There has been, particularly with children under two, an almost automatic response that a child is always better off when cared for by his biological mother, and I think this has been drummed into us from many sources. I think particularly the misinterpretation of Dr. Bolby's studies in England of institutionalized babies who died and failed with drive, created a tremendous anxiety in the North American child welfare field about parenting, and we misinterpreted many of Dr. Bolby's findings because they were of babies who were not parented, but we talked about them as though they were normal babies who had been parented. And we created a tremendous 25-year pre-occupation that if you only had mother and child together somehow parenting helped. And I think we must now take the steps to take a somewhat more honest look at what parenting involves and it is not the physical presence of the mother that necessarily creates parenting. Parenting can be an experiential thing. And a little bit of parenting from a mother free to give that little bit freely and share without guilt by other sections of the community. I think we are now beginning to understand it can be tremendously rewarding and security producing for children. Out of our concern to make sure that children were parented, sometimes I think in the past we have sentenced children and parents to each other and some very unhappy things have happened as a result. Thank you.

The Chairman: Well, Mrs. Chisholm, we thought we had troubles until we heard you. Now I can assure you that we are satisfied right up to our neck. But it has been very helpful and very useful. The ladies who were here before, in talking about involving the disadvantaged, used the phrase, "Let them tell it like it is." And I find the same thing in your brief. Do you people know each other?

Mrs. Chisholm: I hope so. What other group do you mean?

The Chairman: Women Electors?

Mrs. Chisholm: Yes, I know some of the members. I would just like to ask you if my president may make some concluding statements? Mrs. Davidson.

The Chairman: Yes, by all means. Mrs. Davidson.

Mrs. J. C. Davidson, President, the Victoria Day Nursery: Well, I was listening to your concern about private agencies. I was about to leap in there because I am involved with another private agency and I can understand your thoughts and feelings. The private voluntary service, you know, covers the whole spectrum of people, but I think we have to realize that there are a segment of people who are not motivated to get to these agencies and many of these agencies, not all of them. It is a voluntary thing to come to an agency. Now, I know they are changing their pattern and when we talk about working in the environment or with people who change their environment, many agencies are now beginning to see that this is what has to be done, that you have got to move in and be there. Because, for instance, when they built some of the first housing units here in the City of Toronto, they did not have space for services to be there because they said, well, we wouldn't want to have people think they need all this. So they will go elsewhere for their services. But those people weren't particularly motivated to go elsewhere, and I can remember times, I have done a lot of work in some of these areas, where you talked about why such things happen, that children of some of these families could not afford to go and swim at the "Y", they could not afford to participate in some of these activities even though they are supported by public funds. This, in fact, is so. It is not absolutely true of all agencies. In fact, the Big Brothers, and we don't like to name agencies, but this in fact does happen. And I feel that they really have to, all of us have to get to know Mrs. Seepe. It is coming and helping them to change their environment. It is going to come and you cannot treat children in isolation or anyone in isolation. It is a large world we live in and frankly I think that I agree with Mrs. Seepe in saying, I think people who have been receiving welfare have been made to feel like second class citizens and this has got to be overcome, and no matter what we say, it is their right or anything, they have been made to feel that they are second class citizens, and I agree that as a taxpayer I feel that it is their right to have this. But not everybody does.

Senator Everett: I am not making a case for this, but isn't it a fact that if you are going to have supportive services, if you are talking about income maintenance and the supportive thing you are talking about in the public sector, then I think you can have welfare for people without any reflection on their class as citizens, but the moment you introduce supportive services, while you might do it gently and kindly, you then create the classification of citizenship. And it is pretty hard to avoid that. I am not saying you have to do it. I am not saying that you can't do it gently. But I am suggesting to you the moment you do it you create that problem.

Mrs. Davidson: But it isn't always money that people need.

Mrs. Chisholm: We are running you badly overtime.

The Chairman: Go ahead.

Mrs. Chisholm: But I think this is an enormous problem. You are right. I think you are right that as we now have it the whole question of being a client is an attitude and a problem for both sectors of society, but I don't think it needs to be. We have a spectrum in our agency that runs right from families on welfare up to professional families with parents on very excellent incomes who need our services just as desperately and cannot tell each other at a parents' meeting because nobody has a sign on their forehead and it will come only as you practise it.

The Chairman: Well, already Senator Ferguson and Senator Cook have already indicated to you what they thought of the brief, and the rest of us. It is an excellent brief, very well done, and you understand the problem and you have made it clear to us and we appreciate very much your coming to-day and talking to us. The brief will be widely read and widely appreciated. And I think you made some points to-day that are not only relevant but are important.

Mrs. Chisholm: Thank you very much.

The Chairman: We will take a seven minute break and start at 3.30 sharp.

Upon resuming at 3.30 p.m.

The Chairman: We have a brief from the Big Brothers of Metropolitan Toronto, represented by Mr. Geoffrey Brown, Executive Director, and Mrs. Laura M. Ferrier, graduate social worker from Halifax, Nova Scotia, Research Associate. Mr. Brown will speak first.

Mr. Geoffrey Brown, Executive Director, the Big Brothers of Metropolitan Toronto: Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, we were very honoured to be given the chance to speak for a particular segment of the population about whom we can claim to have some pretty special knowledge. We are thinking of those families which have been deprived of the benefit of a father and which, because they are mother-led, suffer not only psychological deprivation but very often physical deprivation as well. We are speaking for a particularly significant segment of our total population. One in ten of all our families in Canada are families that are deprived of a father.

Now, the mothers who carry these families are obviously in a position of great stress. In many cases they are unable to remarry because of our divorce laws. In many cases they are beyond remarriage for various reasons. The result is that the boys who are the offspring of these families desperately need male identification. The mothers who lead these families tend to have very few people with whom to share their burdens. This feeds into the anxiety of the youngsters who grow up in these family situations.

Now, a boy, traditionally, and we speak for boys because they constitute our service population, a boy traditionally relies on his father to introduce him into the world of business, of sports, into establishing his taste and values. When this father is absent this boy suffers not only a visible objective handicap, but he also suffers a very strongly felt subjective handicap.

Now, the women who support these families, Mr. Chairman, fall into the lowest family income group in the country, whether they work or whether they get assistance from the government. The emotional condition of these mothers has a further deleterious effect on the boys who recognize their mothers' psychological needs but find themselves unable to meet these. This also feeds into the boy's own anxieties.

Now, where money is in short supply there is always definite pressure on the boy as he approaches manhood to leave school and find a job, either as defiance or to relieve financial pressure in the home, especially as the obligation to support from the father is cut off at age 16. We have already pointed out that the mothers suffer a sense of isolation and feel deserted when their children want to leave home.

Mr. Chairman, some outside help can be appropriate and useful in assisting both the boy and his mother to accept his growing independence towards maturity. We have pointed out in our brief that while group programs which are provided in the community, although in relatively short supply, are sufficient to meet the needs of many of the boys we are talking about, many of the boys require a more personal one-to-one relationship because of their special deprivation. It is this kind of boy who is most eligible for the kind of service that Big Brother provides.

Big Brothers Service, as you are well aware and the community is well aware, makes heavy use of volunteers. Volunteers are provided in our 55-year methodology and concept and philosophy on a one-to-one basis producing in old terms a peculiar kind of case work service.

What is more significant is that this kind of program ties the community into their problems in a most appropriate way. In other words, we are calling on the strength of the community to deal with its weaknesses.

Now, Mr. Chairman, you may ask, what are we trying to do, get more and more money, asking for more and more? I think what we are really saying here is that we are asking for a small investment to be made to save more and more. We are saying that we need a redistribution, a shift in the way that our public funds are expended, so that money goes into those programs which demonstrate that prevention is better than cure, that a stitch in time saves nine.

Now, is this an impossible thing? We pointed out in our brief that there is ample precedent for the purchase of units of service which can always be costed out from an accredited voluntary agency such as Big Brothers. I won't go into any details on those programs because they are here for you, and I would be very happy to answer to this later on.

We know, Mr. Chairman, all the current welfare legislation lays heavy stress on prevention and efforts to limit the causes of dependency, but we maintain that there has been more lip service paid in our stress on prevention than actual implementation under the permissive legislation which the Canada Assistance Plan has made possible. We, from where we sit, have more than a bird's eye view of the great need in the community, the great need to move in and arrest problems before they materialize into staggering figures, both in terms of human as well as financial cost.

Take a brief look at the population we now serve. Over one-third of the families we serve are families that live in Ontario Housing which is sufficient proof of their eligibility for subsidized service. Although we serve one-third, we very well could serve one hundred per cent in our population of such families were it possible for us to derive the kind of minimal support from government, from the public sector, that would enable us to meet the need instead of simply pitching in with patchwork remedies. We pointed out in our brief that in fact our whole service is simply a demonstration of the need, not a service that meets the need in its totality, not a service that even begins to approach serving the real need.

The fact that so many of our referrals come from social agencies, from health services from provincial family benefit workers, from schools, demonstrates that the need is recognized at a very wide level in the community. The fact that we always have a waiting list which is equal again to the numbers that we are currently serving is a further demonstration of that need. The fact that although we serve some 500 boys at any given time, we happen to service something like half of one per cent of those who actually could use our services, is a further demonstration of the need. We are putting a very simple challenge to the obvious. We are asking the committee to recognize that when you spend $45 a day to pick up the pieces as against less than $5 per day to prevent disintegration of families and all the subsequent spin-offs from that, we are asking you to recognize the fact that the investment in prevention is without a doubt simple and wise one. We are asking the community to mature to the point where, as in some medical examples we pointed out in our brief, instead of spending a great deal of money in high cost services we can, by moving in early in our preventive services, not only save a great deal in human deprivation and in financial cost, in the long run we benefit the entire nation. Thank you.

The Chairman: I think you indicated on page 1 that in Ontario you have 20,000 mothers on family benefit and you assume that they are female head of families, and 51,000 dependents.

Mr. Brown: I will ask Mrs. Ferrier to speak to this.

The Chairman: Yes. My next question to you was how up to date was this?

Mrs. Laura M. Ferrier, Research Associate, The Big Brothers of Metropolitan Toronto: These figures were taken from the 1961 census.

The Chairman: Yes. Have you anything better than that?

Mr. Ferrier: No, I am afraid we don't have.

The Chairman: Have you anything better than that on the national level?

Senator Inman: Senator Croll, we can't hear the witness.

The Chairman: I am sorry, I was asking if they had any better figures than that which appears at the bottom of page 1 about the number of female heads of families and Mrs. Ferrier said that was the 1961 figure. Well, we know that. I was hoping they would have something for 1968. They haven't got it.

Mr. Brown: Mr. Chairman, by extrapolation, the figure would likely be something like ten per cent of the total population. I think it is fairly safe to state that as a projection.

Mrs. Ferrier: I think I have heard it quoted recently, about 30,000. That would be ten per cent. This would reflect the drift into the cities by mothers.

The Chairman: For all of Canada the best figure for '68 is 300,000, about 500,000 children of all ages.

Mr. Brown: We estimated about 32,000 based on the '61 figures and taking an extrapolation.

The Chairman: Yes, but we had some discussions and some presentations to us about this particular kind of a family, how we could keep them together and stop dropout at the same time. Now, what are your views specifically?

Mr. Brown: What has been demonstrated in our kind of service, Mr. Chairman, frequently the fact that no father is in the home feeds into a spiralling stress pattern within the family which means, as we pointed out earlier, that youngsters are more likely to leave home. We have wanted to keep the family together as much as possible and we supply an artificial ingredient in place of the father. This is a big brother. We have found in our experience that this tends, conservatively said, in 90 per cent of the families we serve to hold the families together. We are dealing with some intangibles here, because although we have a research program going to establish a valid statistic about what happens to families where the father is in prison, we can only assume that if we did not provide the service in most cases those families would fall apart. The families that are referred to us for help.

The Chairman: Senator Inman.

Senator Inman: I am interested in this brief. I brought up a family of four sons so it of course interests me. On page 5 you mentioned families of limited income. We all know it is better, if possible, to keep the children with their mother or parents if feasible, if they are suitable parents, and I would like to know what, in your opinion, would the cost be very much more to keep those children at home than in institutional care or supervision, a family we will say in perhaps just below the poverty level but still, the parents would be suitable if they could provide for them. What do you think the cost would be, the extra cost would be in keeping them at home?

Mr. Brown: I wouldn't make the assumption that it would cost more to keep them at home than in an institution. Is this your question?

Senator Inman: Well, it is to a certain extent. Why wouldn't they be kept at home if possible? Would you suggest a supplement to the income? Supposing they were on welfare. Would you think that the welfare should be upped to make it possible for them to stay home?

Mr. Brown: I think it has been established that wherever the family is getting good parenting the most desirable thing is for the children to stay home. I think it has also been established, without my being able to provide you any figures, that it is substantially cheaper in the long run to keep children at home than keep them in institutions. We pointed out in this brief that where a youngster is, let's say, disturbed, the cost can run up to $16,000 a year per child, sometimes more. By no stretch of the imagination could it cost as much to keep a child, to prevent him from becoming disturbed in his own home with good parenting. I hope that answers your question.

Senator Inman: Yes, thank you.

Senator Fergusson: Mr. Chairman, I found this a very interesting brief but I don't know too much about the Big Brother Association and I wonder if Mr. Brown would tell us a little bit more. Where do you get your financial support for your organization? Do the Big Brothers themselves give that service to the boys voluntarily or are any of them paid? You say there is a long waiting list. Is it a waiting list of children or of people who would like to act as Big Brothers?

Mr. Brown: I can give you a very brief historical background. Big Brothers is 60 years old and in our own case in Toronto the Big Brother agency is 55 years old. Big Brothers was founded to deal with fatherless boys who were adjudged delinquent before the Court and the volunteers who came forward then as now are unpaid. To-day we serve at any given time over 500 boys in our own agency which means that we have over 500 active men serving. These volunteers, as I say, are unpaid. The only money that goes into maintenance of Big Brother Services goes to pay for the salaries of those professional workers who have to screen the men who come forward, assess the boy's need for the service, match the man and the boy suitably, and then supervise the relationship to ensure that it works for the youngster, the goals that are established. We receive our funding from the private sector. The United Fund provides nearly 80 per cent of our budget and the rest of the money we raise either privately or we receive in Metro grants and also from membership donations. I hope that answers most of your questions.

The waiting list, by the way, that you refer to is a waiting list of boys who need our services. Now, that is boys who are immediately eligible for help. This waiting list does not reflect the number of boys whom we are forced to turn away because of their, in terms of our priority, relatively low eligibility requirements. What our waiting list really says is that these are the boys that are in desperate need of help. We always need more volunteers, but one of the reasons we have to be careful in a city of two million people about going aggressively to the community for more volunteers is that if they surged forward we would not be able to use them for the simple reason we don't have enough money to set it up, although the community resources are there in terms of available volunteers.

The Chairman: May I just ask you, how does a boy come to your attention?

Mr. Brown: We provide in our first appendix a breakdown of our referral sources and, as you will notice, most of the boys come to us from schools, social agencies in the community, from boards of education, special services, from family benefits whether provincial or Metro welfare sources. In a very few cases the mother herself brings the boy forward. I just want to point out that the mother necessarily identifies the problem in the first place. She feels the need for help. The fact that so many of our resources come from secondary sources, if you like, psychiatric schools and so on, indicates that there is another level at which this need is also recognized. And we have had, in terms of our priorities, to slant our service mainly to the recipients who have been recognized by some other source as needing our help.

Senator Fergusson: How young are the boys that you take on and how long do you keep them?

Mr. Brown: Our boys come to us at age six to sixteen. That is up until they are seventeen at the starting point, and the termination point is usually around age sixteen. There is some flexibility there. Sometimes they go on to eighteen or longer if the treatment program, I use the term loosely, indicates that it is necessary to keep the Big Brother in the picture in order to help a youngster over a difficult period.

Senator Inman: Could I ask a supplementary question? On page 8, "There are alternatives to taking children into care; there are alternatives to sending children to training schools; there are measures that can be taken to prevent boys and girls from becoming alienated and discouraged." What measures have you in mind? What alternatives?

Mr. Brown: I am sorry, I didn't get your question?

The Chairman: What page, senator?

Senator Inman: Page 8, near the bottom.

The Chairman: Yes, go ahead, senator Inman, please.

Senator Inman: You say there are alternatives to taking children into care. There are alternatives to sending children to training schools. There are measures that can be taken to prevent boys and girls from becoming alienated and discouraged and we can assist the parents in their roles. What alternatives do you suggest?

Mr. Brown: The alternatives are all the range of preventive services now available in the community but which are so poorly supported that they provide services on the basis of expediency rather than need. We have suggested some of these in our brief. The services provided by camps or by Y's, by Boy Scouts, group programs of that kind and also day care services as well. But, also, our kind of service which we strongly encourage as the kind of counselling service which costs less per capita than any other counselling service which picks up at a further stage of disintegration of the family.

Senator Inman: Thank you.

Mr. Brown: Mrs. Ferrier would like to add a comment.

Mrs. Ferrier: I thought an example might illustrate what we meant. For instance, in regard to training schools. We get many referrals directly from the court, the Juvenile Court Judge. He sees a boy who is edging towards serious delinquency or even his first offence, possibly. The home lacks a father. He has some reluctance about sending the boy back where the mother obviously is not able to control him but if he could be sure that we would give service. As a matter of fact, the cases are very often adjourned sine die in the hope that he will be able to serve in this situation because they think the supportive help of our service with the Big Brother taking a permanent interest in this boy will support the mother sufficiently so it won't be necessary to remove him from his home.

The Chairman: Thank you. Senator Everett.

Senator Everett: I was interested in this purchase, Mr. Brown, of services, and you say, I think, here, that the services you provide can be costed by the unit, and I think in your verbal brief you said that you had some figures on that. I wonder if you could enlarge on it?

Mr. Brown: Yes, in our case we have costed our services on a per capita basis as $300 per year per boy. We provided some comparative figures for services where boys are taken out of their own homes and provided institutional services or other kinds of care and varied the cost on the latest estimate from a minimum of $2,000 per year per boy or per child to as high as $16,000 per child per year.

Senator Everett: This cost of $300 would presumably involve volunteer help?

Mr. Brown: It involves to the unpaid volunteer help. What this $300 really represents is the cost of the facilities of the service and the salaries of the professional people who are paid to mobilize the volunteers and put them into service.

Senator Everett: I understand from your brief you say there are some 350,000 boys in your judgment in this position?

Mrs. Ferrier: We are saying there are approximately 332,000 boys in our judgment who need this service in Canada. That is a potential figure but I don't think it is suggested that is the number of boys in Canada.

Senator Everett: Let's reduce it, if you can, to Toronto.

Mr. Brown: Okay.

Senator Everett: What do you think that figure is for Toronto?

Mr. Brown: Conservatively I would say 10,000 would need such a service.

Senator Everett: But how much is the figure, the comparative figure, to the 350,000?

Mr. Brown: 350,000 is ten per cent of the boys under sixteen in the country as a whole. We don't know. Roughly 30,000 appear on the same basis.

Senator Everett: I see.

Mr. Brown: In Toronto. And then, conservatively estimated, one-third of those would be in a position to need our service.

Senator Everett: And how many volunteers do you have now?

Mr. Brown: We have nearly 600 volunteers now. At any given time we have volunteers who are in the process of being assigned to new little brothers, as we call them, or re-assigned. We are servicing perhaps 550, 540 or so youngsters now.

Senator Everett: And you think if the government got involved under the Canada Assistance Plan that need might go as high as 10,000?

Mr. Brown: It conceivably could, but it is unlikely.

Senator Everett: How many would you estimate then?

Mr. Brown: I would estimate not more than 5,000.

Senator Everett: 5,000. What is the low that in your judgment would start to solve the problem?

Mr. Brown: It has been estimated that less than two per cent of a service like ours is impacting on the fatherless population. It puts us in the position of not really beginning to meet the need, which means that we should be serving not less than 2,000 boys.

Senator Everett: 2,000. Do you think you could get that kind of voluntary help, assuming you had the $300 per boy?

Mr. Brown: Yes, we are convinced that we could get that kind of voluntary help.

The Chairman: Where do you get them?

Mr. Brown: Where do the Big Brothers come from? Well, first of all, a Big Brother may be anyone, a man who presents an occupation, cross-section. We get them both by our advertising, which is free to use from the community, billboards, radio spots, subway cards and so on, as well as from word of mouth, Big Brothers who are active speaking to others who are not. We add up now to about two-thirds of our Big Brothers coming in monthly hear the word through the public media, and the other one-third from the Brothers actively in service. We know methods by which we could go out into the community and get more volunteers, reach out directly to people who are latently willing to serve.

As I say, we have to put a realistic kind of feeling on our efforts to recruit volunteers at this time because of lack of money and staff.

Senator Everett: Mr. Brown, you make a very good case for the preventive services concept. I would think the one thing that would bother government would be that while in the initial stages the cost is $300 per boy, once they get into it and involved themselves in the two to five thousand or even ten thousand boys, what guarantee have they got that the costs are not going to escalate? I mean, you have every reason in the world now to keep your costs down and you are doing an excellent job. The 600 boys you are handling, you are doing an excellent job, and I don't mean this as any personal reflection or any reflection on the Big Brother movement. I think it would be a government concern of any agency that was selling its service, what guarantee or what way would you suggest that the government can be protected from that cost not escalating to, say, $600 a year and then on up ad infinitum.

Mr. Brown: First of all, our per capita cost of service will, from this point on, tend to go down, not go up. What it reflects, for one thing, is the fact that there is a certain level of physical time and a certain level of staff and, in a sense, under-productivity, in terms of what the need is. We are, on a per capita basis, spending more than at present we need to spend. We get to an optimum point at which the costs begin to diminish. The old economic phenomenon, diminishing costs, where you simply don't keep on escalating your physical plant beyond a certain level even though at that point you may be able to serve twice the number of boys you served before. You don't keep escalating your staff in proportion to the number of boys you serve. You find that as you serve more boys the ratio of staff to boys tends to favour the boys rather than the number of staff. So I cannot, without going into much greater detail, validate this for you, but I am saying that we could improve our service considerably in numbers and reduce the per capita costs, and Mrs. Ferrier would like to make a point.

Mrs. Ferrier: Oh, yes, I wanted to say that safeguards can be built in as far as the Canada Assistance Plan is concerned, and would be built in by the province which usually puts a ceiling on its cost-sharing formulae. The General Welfare Assistance Act would be a case in point. There is a maximum figure that the province agrees to share with the municipalities.

Another example of this is the Visiting Homemakers and Nurses Act. It is written in that the province will pick up 80 per cent of the cost of this service up to a maximum figure of, I think it is $12 a day. Every now and then some representations, of course, have to be made. For instance, when legislation was enacted in 1958 I believe the ceiling was $8. Well, then, by 1965 it had been unrealistic. You couldn't get a woman to come in for that. So, it had to be raised to $12, but the province has a right to put this in, which automatically protects the federal government.

Senator Everett: Well, I am not thinking of the protection for the federal government, I am thinking of the legislative costs. If there is a demand for the service, the costs go up and up, and the government has to pay that in a broad sense, has to pay that cost. One of the suggestions that has been made to us is to make the services competitive. In other words, have two Big Brother organizations and have the government or even the client make the choice as to which is doing the better job for the better cost. What do you think of that?

Mr. Brown: I subscribe to it in principle.

Senator Everett: You say you have a competitor now?

Mr. Brown: Well, we have several Big Brother organizations in Canada and in the province.

Senator Everett: But not competitive?

Mr. Brown: I don't know if that makes us competitive. I think we could become competitive with other forms of service if they were all strongly subsidized.

Senator Everett: But, you do subscribe to competitiveness?

Mr. Brown: I do.

Senator Everett: Do you think the client should have a part in the decision-making process?

Mr. Brown: Absolutely.

The Chairman: I had the impression that service clubs were very, very helpful, to you people in obtaining Big Brothers?

Mr. Brown: Service clubs have helped us, Mr. Chairman, and I don't want to say anything that would detract from all the good they have done for us, simply in terms of the help which from their end is tremendous, at the receiving end turns out to be proportionately less than we could use.

Mrs. Ferrier: I think the senator is talking about recruitment of volunteers.

The Chairman: Yes, I was talking about recruitment of volunteers.

Mr. Brown: Yes, they have been helpful to us in recruiting volunteers. It is not, in statistical terms, the most significant kind of help.

The Chairman: Yes. What is it?

Mr. Dennis Colbey, Toronto: Mr. Chairman, through you is it permissible to ask a question?

The Chairman: Yes, go ahead.

Mr. Colbey: I wanted to ask through you, Mr. Brown, whether or not he thought that the established organizations such as the Boy Scouts, Y.M.C.A., Social Planning Councils especially the great emphasis or, let's say, political parties and organizations, social welfare organizations, democratization of structured organizations, do you foresee a useful function in your kind of an organization and, let's say, within the present structure now among your young people?

The Chairman: What is your question?

Mr. Colbey: Well, I am asking whether or not, let's say in the future, I am more or less asking whether or not Mr. Brown foresees the more or less structure of working young people communicating and working forward, whether his kind of organization will help the majority of young people, your kind of structured organization, within our society.

Mr. Brown: Well, one of the things that certainly won't disappear is fatherlessness in our society at any time that you can foresee. Now, I am not sure what you mean by structured organizations. By that you mean that we don't run a more fluid kind of program like a drop-in centre, for instance. If this is what you mean, then let me say right away that I subscribe to drop-in centres as well as to other kinds of services that are relevant to the style of to-day's youth. However, these kind of services which are relatively more fluid in their structures do not preclude our kind of service. A Big Brother under our methodology would be free to introduce a youngster to a drop-in centre, for instance, if that were so indicated. So it might well be that some kind of structures, services, are becoming anachronistic, but I don't foresee a time when our kind of service would not be appropriate.

Mrs. Ferrier: I would like to add a comment to the young man such as the one who asked the question. I have been dying to do it for some time. One of the most useful things an agency like ours can do for young people and young men is to point out the very important role the father plays in the family and urge them that when they assume the responsibility of marriage and parenthood that they remember this and think twice before they opt out of situations they find uncomfortable. And I am not saying this is our role but normally and from a moral point of view we should be trying to prevent fatherlessness and these are some of the preventive programs I think we have in mind; supplementary incomes for fathers that aren't able to sell their services on the marketplace for sufficient funds to support their families and meet their responsibilities. This is one preventive measure. Housing that doesn't eat up a disproportionate proportion of the family income and put strain on families. And, of course, anything that keeps the family together and keeps the father in the home. This is the ideal for which we are striving, but where this unfortunate circumstance develops, that the father has to leave the home, then our services moves in. But also social services are working towards eliminating the need for themselves, trying to put themselves out of business really.

The Chairman: Let's take the case of female heads of families with two or three children. They are young enough so that she is needed at home. She could go out in the world and earn a fair sum as a secretary, and then she has to make up her mind. What do we do for her?

Mr. Brown: There are a number of things that can be done to assist the working mother.

The Chairman: Well, I haven't got her working. I just have her three children with a profession and they are young enough to need her attention at home. Now, you take it from there.

Mr. Brown: Well, sir, as you know, our province here has already provided family benefits which would enable a mother like that to live on mother's allowance in order to stay at home and give her children parenting. Unfortunately, and I don't mean that as an overly informed criticism, but I think that the facts suggest that what mothers presently on mother's allowance receive in order to maintain themselves at a good subsistence level is a little less than desirable.

The Chairman: You are being honest. Go ahead.

Mr. Brown: What I am saying is that the family benefit structure ought to be considerably strengthened so that, for instance, where mothers need help with medical needs, dental needs and so on that where provisions now are extremely poor, that the family benefit structure which is already there should be considerably strengthened in the form of increasing the allowances available to make it possible for that mother to provide a decent subsistence for herself and her family.

Mrs. Ferrier: Plus the other kinds of services which will fill a need. No mother, no matter how good a mother she is, can be a father. It is as simple as that.

The Chairman: What you are saying in effect is that she needs enough money to come in and she needs it at a level that allows her to live decently and keep the children in school?

Mr. Brown: Yes, and to allow the children access to those opportunities that might have been available for her if the father had been present. A father who is income-producing.

The Chairman: Well, of course, we can't replace the father.

Mr. Brown: That we can't.

The Chairman: But do you know any other way of meeting that than by giving her a decent subsistence level or guaranteed income based on family salaries?

Mr. Brown: I cannot think of any substitute in our kind of society for money, to make services available to a family, Mr. Chairman. There simply is no other way. If you don't have the money you can't purchase the necessary services. We would take ourselves back considerably in time to the days of foraging, to provide a decent subsistence level, without provision of additional income, whatever the scheme might be for those mothers who cannot get it by virtue of having been deprived of their chief income.

Mrs. Ferrier: Just as an example of what we have proposed to the B.C. government for those families that have met this eligibility requirement and are receiving family benefits. It would be a simple matter if there is, let's say a 12-year-old boy who has developed a phase or alarmed his mother, at school. It is a very simple matter for a province to allocate to that mother, just pick a figure out of the air, $300, with which she herself could purchase. She has the final word. The worker doesn't say, "You have to get a big brother for your son", but it makes it possible for her, and we accept the fact that governments have to have eligibility requirements. So we said, "Could this be tried out on an experimental basis for mothers who are already in receipt of public assistance?"

The Chairman: Senator Fergusson.

Senator Fergusson: I would just like to ask if you have any idea of what proportion of the Big Brothers work with families that are on welfare or children from families that are on welfare?

Mr. Brown: We have said that about 40 per cent of our Big Brothers are currently working with families that are on some kind of welfare.

Senator Fergusson: I am sorry, I didn't hear that.

The Chairman: Was there someone there? Yes, come on up.

Mrs. D. S. Kent, Toronto: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask Mr. Brown whether the Big Brother Association provides any counselling for the mothers, either through their staff or through the father? Is this something that comes into the programs?

Mr. Brown: Yes. We do provide some very limited counselling at present for the mother and it is a great deal less than we would like to provide, and I am very glad you asked that question because up until a year or so ago we had a counselling program for mothers which was a group program subsidized by a special grant from the Atkinson Charitable Foundation. We were forced to discontinue that program because we were unable to get any funding support either from the United Fund, and not from their not supporting it but from their inability to provide us more funds or from the provincial sources at which level we had sought to purchase services. So that, certainly in principle, is a most important ingredient of the service we provide, because very often the mother expresses a need for very strong counselling support.

The Chairman: Mrs. Ferrier has a question she wants to ask me. I don't know what it is.

Mrs. Ferrier: I wanted to ask if you had any comments, Senator Croll, on our observations about diminishing interest that politicians have on legislation after it has passed the House? In other words, their interest in passing legislation doesn't seem to match their interest in seeing it is implemented, even in their own community.

The Chairman: When a politician gets behind a measure, he thinks it is in the interest of people, particularly in his community. Then he sees that it is implemented in his community. Now, I will agree that he doesn't continue constantly, unless it is brought to his attention, to have it improved. That is a normal thing because there are many other matters that he has to attend to at the same time. There are pressures. It is left to those people in the community to see that that interest is continued.

The evidence that we have had before us here today, which is a repetition of what we have had in other places, is that there is now coming forward an interest by people who are involved, who are not waiting for anyone. The people who are receiving public assistance are starting to organize to discuss, to communicate and to do something about it themselves. That is one of the most helpful things that has come from our hearings. Once it gets into the mill it is then out of their hands because it then becomes an administrative matter. Unless there is special pressure put on him he is no more than a person who makes representation. Does that answer the question?

Mrs. Ferrier: I think if politicians would take just a bit more interest in permissive legislation and see that it reaches down to his constituents, I think they could be leaders in this.

The Chairman: Would you tell me, what is permissive legislation? You are now talking about the Canada Assistance Act which is a perfectly good Act although it has some permissive aspects?

Mrs. Ferrier: Frankly, Senator Croll, I wasn't talking, the Canada Assistance Act is pretty well inoperative unless it is bound up at the municipal and provincial level.

The Chairman: Yes, that is the part that is permissive. Well, as I say, it is very difficult for the federal government to say, "You shall do this or else I will not contribute." Let me just tell you, if you have been reading the papers at all, in the Province of Quebec we can't even get the provincial government there to say that the federal government has contributed to this or not building. We have probably given them the most amount of money. They won't even admit it. They refused in the last couple of cases. What we wanted in the Canada Assistance Act was a standard to the standard to say this is the basic minimum that four will receive, five will receive, six will receive. But there were problems. It wasn't a question so much of what is basic minimum, because you could apply it to the whole country. But you had poor provinces and you had rich provinces, and what you lay down as a standard fitted for the poor provinces they couldn't quite afford. So you had to make some other alterations and adjustments and those were the things that troubled us. What the Canada Assistance Act needs to-day is a standard of assistance and some of the permissiveness drawn out of it and say, "We will pay if you do such and such a thing", but that takes a little time. You have got to realize another thing. We operated the welfare system for almost 40 years on a means test basis, as you know. We didn't like it but it was hard to get rid of. In 1966 we just turned completely around, forgot about the means test and introduced a needs test. That wasn't easy to do because there were a great number of people in this country who still think it should be on a means test basis. The great trouble was in putting it on a need basis we didn't change the mentality of the administrators who were still operating on a means test basis and using the words, "needs test". That is the trouble today. So it will take us a little while before we bring it to the fore. That is one of the things coming out of the hearings.

Miss Ann Sedchell, Toronto: Mr. Chairman, could I ask Mr. Brown, through you, on page 6 he urges the committee to investigate ways and means...

The Chairman: Just a minute until he locates page 6. Go ahead.

Miss Sedchell: "We urge the committee to investigate ways and means whereby financial support can be given to non-government preventive agencies which have demonstrated the validity of their programs."

I would like to ask Mr. Brown who would make a decision about the validity of the programs?

Mrs. Ferrier: Mr. Brown has asked me if I would comment on that. I think if you know anything about the United Community Fund you could pretty well accept their decision. When they approve an agency for funding it is a very rigid scrutiny. It is three years before an agency is admitted at all for funding and there is a yearly assessment by a group of citizens. There are even more intensive evaluations made from time to time. Any complaint is investigated. It soon gets back. So, I think as a matter of fact I have heard so much lip service and praise shot around private agencies by government officials that I think there would be very few they would question. They say, "They are wonderful things." They are very quiet about whether or not they are meeting the needs. That is a rather hard remark. They seem content to see them operate, as I said before, as demonstration projects.

Mr. Brown: Does that answer your question?

Miss Sedchell: Yes.

The Chairman: Yes. I think I have failed to indicate to you that Mr. Brown has quite a distinguished record in the field of social work. He has a good academic background and Mrs. Ferrier has a great deal of experience and this is a well-turned-out brief, a well-thought-out brief, and very nicely presented, too. You can appreciate that it is a problem not too knowledgeable to many of us. I have lived here many, many years, and I am not too well acquainted with it, although I think I know the social scene pretty well. That reflects the same thing with the other senators. What interests us in this problem more than anything else, and it is one of the growing problems in this country and it is growing out of all proportions to the other problems, is the female head of the family, whose size for some reason or other is growing in importance and size. We have got to find some solution for her. Being on an inadequate mother's allowance isn't the answer at all. If there is anything she needs, as you put it, she has got to have money to go to work or run the house. And that is what is causing us a great deal of concern.

On behalf of the committee I thank you very much for preparing the material that is before us, and for appearing here and answering questions. Thank you very much.

Mr. Brown: Thank you very much.

The Chairman: That terminates our meeting for today.

The committee adjourned.

Toronto, Tuesday, March 10, 1970.

The Special Senate Committee on Poverty, (Subcommittee "A"), met this day at 8.00 p.m., at Warden Avenue Public School.

Senator David A. Croll (Chairman) in the Chair.

Mr. R. J. Murrell, Principal, Warden Avenue Public School: Ladies and gentlemen, welcome to Warden Avenue Public School. I am especially happy to welcome our distinguished guests of the evening. I recognize many of you as parents of our school children. You know me and I hope to know you and to the visitors, particularly those among our audience, I would particularly like to say that this school was designated a community school by Scarborough Board of Education beginning this last September and, as a community school, we feel we have a special job to operate our school not only in the daytime but to the best advantage of the community during the evening hours as well.

As you came in the door, no doubt you noticed children in the hall out here and they are here three nights a week under the auspices of our Scarborough Board of Education employees. One night a week we have the Scarborough Parks and Recreation and another night is devoted to community organizations and our own Warden Woods Association, for their benefit.

We would like to think we are growing. As a community school we are learning better ways to serve our community not only in terms of education but in the broader sense and in our session this evening we are happy to welcome the special senate committee on poverty.

Not only can we serve our community but perhaps we will have a hand in serving our country. Without any more words from me, I would like to turn the meeting over to Senator Croll.

The Chairman: Thank you very much for making the facilities available. We like the community aspect, but a little quieter for us, if you do not mind, so we can be sure to hear.

I declare the meeting open and I have on my immediate right, Mr. Greene, who is the Executive Director of the Ontario Federation of Citizens' Associations and Mr. Don Davis, who is the Chairman. Both are known to you.

Mr. Green will have a statement to make and Mr. Davis will have a short statement to make and then we will ask that the meeting be open for questioning by the senators. Go ahead Mr. Green or Mr. Davis?

Mr. Don Davis, Chairman, Ontario Federation of Citizens' Associations: Honourable senators, ladies and gentlemen. The Ontario Federation of Citizens' Associations was started in November, 1968, as an informal meeting ground for people freely giving time and effort to the betterment of the community in which they live. In February, 1969, it became formalized under the name of the Metro Federation of Citizens' Associations, a constitution was adopted in which the prime purpose is the encouragement of citizen participation in community affairs. A forum was created for the sharing of ideas, concerns and problems facing those involved in community life.

In this city it is our contention that much of the effect of community activity is occurring by necessity in public housing areas. Although we welcome any kind of community group, it is hardly surprising that the bulk of our membership comes from public housing citizens' organizations, this is where the action currently is.

Our membership is deliberately there left wide open and not restricted to public housing exclusively since we believe enough walls and fences are built around public housing tenants already and we would not want to be guilty of creating more.

The people represented in our various organizations, since we have no accurate figures, break down into the following; recipients of some sort of public assistance, about 30 per cent; blue or white collar working people in the $4,000.00 to $8,000.00 income range annually, about 65 per cent; those earning in excess of $8,000., about 5 per cent. We believe these figures support our desire to make some comment in the field of public assistance in its various forms and to speak also for many in the lower income wage earning bracket.

We do not contend that our members are living in poverty. Those active among us are not. Since we believe the word "poverty" does not apply only to questions of money but to a way of life. Few of us have surplus funds to call on. A sudden emergency can rapidly cause a financial crisis and we would like to believe it is such people to whom the Economic Council of Canada refers when it speaks of Canada's lower income population. Our own experience is that community involvement, though frustrating and difficult at times, is richly rewarding in many ways. In the year and a quarter we have been in existence we have had some worthwhile accomplishments and made our presence felt in this city. While not a pressure group we have been ready and able to speak up on diverse subjects that affect us collectively or our members individually.

We have challenged the Department of Family and Social Services on some issues and our very insistence has caused obvious concern to the Ontario Housing Corporation. We are willing to admit we are always learning, willing to ask searching questions in order to act with knowledge and wisdom.

As chairman, I would be remiss, however, if I did not express the positive approach most of us take. We try to do our share in our own local communities and the wider community around us. We have many members who sit regularly on councils, committees and other bodies. I am confident our people do this in an effort to promote better communication and a better way of life, not to seek a place in some elusive, ill refined middle class society.

We believe we have something worth while and just last month arranged for expansion to a province-wide organization. Our future plans hope that a way will be found to take on full time help since most of us are working to capacity in our own time and must continue earning a living while not neglecting our families.

At this point I would like to ask our Executive Director, Mr. Green, to quote some extracts from the conclusions to our brief since we feel this sums up many of the reasons why we are here today.

Mr. P. Green, President, Metro Federation of Citizens' Associations: Thank you, Mr. Davis.

Honourable senators, ladies and gentlemen, may I first mention, although it is not included in the copies of the brief, the Warden Woods Community Council did not support recommendations 2 or 3.

Whether governments or big business realize it or not, we are moving slowly but surely into an era when the needs of people demand attention, where the value placed on people must transcend the value placed on the dollar. Many of this country's young people have already reached this conclusion and need only the experience, maturity and expertise to discover how to put their ideas into effect.

The influence of the churches has, unfortunately, decreased. Poorer people see some church leaders as outdated while many congregations are regarded as living in the past, hypocritical and unable to even see, let alone face up to, the social ills that plague our society.

Some social workers are seen to be dedicated to the improvement of society, while others are merely content to maintain the status quo. We have nothing but contempt for those who laugh at suggestions put forward by the "un-educated" as happened on one recent television programme. However, we see the role of the social workers as an enabler, not as a leader.

Governments are traditionally slow to react and therefore we see the gradual emergence of indigenous leaders from among the people themselves. If we do not listen to them now, Canada loses its last hope of eliminating poverty.

There is an ultra conservative segment of society who refuses to acknowledge the inevitable and will not accept the possibility that re-assessment and re-evaluation of government spending can be a valid alternative to increased taxation. Improved social conditions do not have to mean higher taxes and efforts spent in this direction may well be infinitely more rewarding than trying to keep "these people" in their place.

It has often been said that a part of our society needs the element of poverty for its own increasing wealth and survival. We contend it would have even more to lose if poverty is not eliminated.

Some of us have expressed doubts regarding the effectiveness of briefs to this Committee; indeed would be an untruth. Others say, perhaps rightly, that they have sat on committees, written briefs, participated in discussions, held meetings and confronted authorities to the point where they are sick of talks, studies and surveys and they want action.

You have undoubtedly heard such sentiments, and we ask you to convey a sense of urgency to those who will create change.

Finally, these hearings are providing an opportunity to publicly air proposals, however radical they may seem, that can lead to change or reform as needed, and stimulate public discussion and education. This, in itself, is a worthwhile purpose. Thank you.

The Chairman: Mr. Green, I think you said that recommendations 2 and 3, that appears on page 5?

Mr. Green: Yes, also in the summary of the recommendations on pages 21—

The Chairman: But they are repeated?

Mr. Green: Right.

The Chairman: Yes. Now, can you be a little more specific on recommendation number 3 because we have been hearing that every place and it has been highly recommended.

Mr. Alfred Carswell, Pensioner: Could I ask a question? Will there be any opportunities to-night to allow us to exercise our democratic rights from the audience and say a few words, because I would like the privilege, if I could.

The Chairman: I get the first word and you will have to wait a little while.

Mr. Carswell: I can't hear what you are saying, if you could oblige me with speaking a little louder?

The Chairman: Well, I don't know if this will do any good, I will try.

Recommendation number 3 has been repeated to us many times and in each case it has been endorsed with the request that we do something as indicated in recommendation number 3. Now, do you know why it was opposed?

Mr. Green: Not specifically. I do know on the other one a very valid point was raised that this relates particularly to the recipients of public assistance whereas it doesn't bring any particular equivalent for the low wage earner who may actually be receiving less.

Number 3 is regarding the use of home economists, I am not really sure.

The Chairman: That is not home economists, have I got the wrong one, page 5?

Mr. Green: Page 5 is endorsed by all our member organizations.

The Chairman: That is the one I was talking about, which one is not endorsed?

From the Floor: What is recommendation 3?

The Chairman: Wait until I get it.

Mr. Green: Page 21.

The Chairman: We were mistaken on it.

Are there any questions? By the way, is there any particular emphasis you have arising out of the brief?

Mr. Green: I think it would be fairly safe to say the majority of opinion would center around citizen participation as being a very major part of it.

The Chairman: How do you envisage that?

Mr. Green: We feel that it would be quite important that effective community groups that are representing an area or people who are working in an area, should be brought into planning before the event rather than being presented with something that has been planned behind closed doors and then it is presented as a fact, because then they are forced into a protest kind of operation whereas it is much better for a community organization to be involved in the planning process and not to be presented with something where they feel they have to object to it strongly.

The Chairman: Well, did I understand you to say that 30 per cent of the group that you represent were on public assistance?

Mr. Green: Very approximately.

The Chairman: Yes, 30 per cent are on—or approximately 28 per cent it does not make any difference, there is a considerable interest in that, how do you envisage—and that is very personal—that is immediate, planning is maybe some time away, how do you envisage their representation?

Mr. Green: Particularly in terms of the Welfare Review Board. For example we feel that they should have an opportunity to have a more broadly based review board rather than the one that is made up only of administrative past or present people who have been involved in formulating legislation under which they are operating. This does not have to be just the recipients. It could be somebody who has been receiving and no longer is. It could be just the ordinary citizen in the street as opposed to a formal administrator. The same thing might apply in the area of public housing. We feel quite strongly that tenants representation on even the municipal housing authorities or the Ontario Housing Corporation would be a very worth while, meaningful place where there could be participation.

The Chairman: One other point that you were very emphatic about, I think you mentioned community organization.

Mr. Green: Community organization which, I guess, is our thing as much as anything else and certainly many of our member communities see the results and what is achieved from day to day by having an organization. I think we should make it clear these are not protest groups. These groups are created as community groups and they are very broadly based in operation working on everything from adult education to kids' recreation, just about anything that comes up. They are formally willing to get involved with or assist people who live in their area and you can really see some value from this. Generally, you will see this also yourselves, possibly tomorrow night. You will be at the O'Connor Community, which is one of our member organizations, the other part of your committee is tonight at Lawrence Heights. They will see the co-operation between community and schools in particular.

The Chairman: And many other people. From our experience, in what we have seen up to the present time, we rather think that protest groups have a real role to play. The constructive element is good but what is lacking among these people, who are in this, is they find themselves in this position, a lack of organized protest within the realm of what is possible but an organized protest, we have not seen too much of that.

Mr. Green: There may be times, sir, when organized protest is the only thing that can be done and it is because groups are not involved in the planning or creative process. They are then likely to, in some cases, organize themselves around a protest or an issue.

In other cases the issue is simply the fact that a lot of kids in a small area have no where to play.

The Chairman: That is a very important issue. Do you think these organizations speak loudly enough?

Mr. Green: I think, yes, they do. I think it is something that as somebody gets involved with they learn, as they go along, it is not something necessarily that they can do immediately and I think that we have to accept that the majority, in fact all of them, are responsible organizations that would prefer to make a reasonable approach to whatever the authority is before getting into some kind of protest.

The Chairman: Well, protests can be reasonable too, you know.

Mr. Green: Sure, a written protest.

The Chairman: But do you think, well I suppose you are the executive director, do you feel there has been some achievement that brings satisfaction to the members of the various groups or a series of achievements?

Mr. Green: I think each member group has it's own achievement that brings a great deal of satisfaction to those who have been involved with it, yes.

The Chairman: You are talking about the Lawrence Heights Group and the Greenholme Neighbourhood Association...

Mr. Green: The Warden Woods Council yes.

The Chairman: How many groups have you? I have only seen two or three from the brief.

Mr. Green: There are two that have presented separate parts of the brief which they attached; one from Lawrence Heights and one from Greenholme.

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Green: In addition to that, we have the Willow Tree Neighbourhood Association who are present tonight; Regent Park Community Improvement Association and two inactive members we have not seen too much with us lately, six highly active groups and we have recently had inquiries from around the province. People have seen what is happening and have expressed interest in becoming either part of it or maintaining contact and this was the reason for changing to a provincial organization.

Senator Everett: Mr. Green, in recommendation number 1, page 21, you talk about people receiving assistance and then people receiving public assistance; that is a fairly wide term, "public assistance", I wonder what you mean by it?

Mr. Green: We mean here assistance in rental and financial assistance, whether it means municipal welfare, family benefits or whatever the case may be. Mainly in the terms of public education is the reason behind this.

Senator Everett: What I am saying is that anybody who receives a baby bonus is theoretically on public assistance. Obviously your definition would be useless to you if that were used. As I understand it, you want to indicate the number of people who are actually receiving almost a form of income assistance.

Mr. Green: General welfare. Perhaps I could qualify it by saying it refers to people totally dependent on public assistance rather than family allowances which are paid generally.

Senator Everett: Now, on recommendation number 4, you say that you recommend that a Review Board...

The Chairman: Page?

Senator Everett: Page 22. You recommend that Review Boards be instructed to hear and make rulings on complaints relating to the attitude or activities of departmental social workers and that review boards must be comprised of ordinary citizens not in any way connected with welfare administration and/or recipients or former recipients of service by a ratio of 2 to 1 to past or present administrators.

Could you tell me what, in your judgment, is wrong with the present review board in Ontario?

Mr. Green: First of all, I think there is one very major point that it does not have the confidence of the people it is supposed to serve in that there is a very great amount of doubt expressed on the part of the individuals. If they were going to this body it is just really an extension of what they have already been through? The same group of people they have already been speaking to rather than an independent body?

Senator Everett: Is that because of the make-up of the board?

Mr. Green: I suspect so, yes.

Senator Everett: Not because of its rulings?

Mr. Green: There was no publicity of any amount given to its rulings, to the best of my knowledge, so I doubt very much if the rulings would really have a bearing.

Senator Everett: Can you tell me what the make-up of the board is?

Mr. Green: Not specifically and reliably, no. I do know that a fair percentage of it is made up of past administrators or people in similar capacities.

Senator Everett: Are there any client representatives on the board?

Mr. Green: No, sir.

Senator Everett: None at all?

Mr. Green: Not to our knowledge, I should say.

Senator Everett: Do you feel that the situation would be rectified if there were client representation?

Mr. Green: Yes.

Senator Everett: In other words, can it be rectified by a certain amount of client representation or do you have to go to this 2 to 1 ratio to make it effective?

Mr. Green: This was really a figure pulled out of a hat, in a sense, certainly there should be more than token representation, not necessarily clients, just ordinary people, members of the ordinary public.

Senator Everett: Excuse me, I gather people out there are having trouble hearing. One of the things that we understand today from the Metro Welfare Council, I think it was the committee?

The Chairman: Yes, the Metro Toronto Welfare Council.

Senator Everett: Where you have client representation on the board or as you say just general public representation, they say that if you are talking about client representation you generally get the more intelligent client representation and they do not really understand either the problem of people who are living in the stream of poverty. In other words to somebody who is at one level of poverty somebody at a lower level is as difficult to understand as it is difficult for a multi millionaire to understand. So now you are saying it does not really matter to us whether we have representatives on this board from all the different levels of welfare, if we just have the citizen representation, that is sufficient? Well, they seem to say that is not sufficient. You are making a mistake. Would you comment on that?

Mr. Green: My first comment would be to ask if they had ever tried it. Really I do think that people who are closer to a situation are more aware of it even though they may not have necessarily experienced it. I would also question if a person in on a minimum income it doesn't really matter whether he is employed or receiving public assistance, regardless of what his educational qualifications are, he is still living and managing on the same amount of money.

Senator Everett: Was there a board recently formed in Ontario that did have client representation?

The Chairman: That was the voluntary agencies, the voluntary agency that had a board with some client representation, it was not a government agency.

Senator Everett: Now, coming down to your recommendations on interest rates. You recommend a maximum interest rate of 12% per annum calculated on a reducing balance on loans and then the limit be set on interest rates payable by lending institutions and in the body of your brief you point out that where we are importing funds, dealing with general world interest conditions, this might create some sort of a problem. Do you think that the recommendations would be satisfactory if there were a maximum differential between the amount paid for the depositor's funds and the amount at which they were loaned. In other words, I make this point; I passed the National Trust today and I notice they are advertising for funds at 9%. Now, by the time they have the acquisition cost, the cost of gaining the loan, obviously—maybe not obviously—but I am given to understand that 3% would not permit—in other words, a 3% spread, they just could not do business. If you reduce, force them to reduce, they tried this in the United States with the savings and loan associations, they forced them to reduce the amount they could pay to a depositor to six or six and a half percent. That is fine, but the depositor goes and puts his money somewhere else. In other words, they just don't get the funds. How do you answer that dilemma?

Mr. Green: First of all, I don't think a fixed spread between deposit rates and interest rates would be the answer for the low income person because, as you say in this example of 9 per cent, we have no way of knowing if the rates paid for deposits may go higher. Consequently you are not really receiving the interest, the low income part of the population, if the interest goes up.

Senator Everett: I gather your recommendation albeit to save money for the low income, nobody can disagree, but I gather the heart of your recommendation is to make the profit to the lending institution low enough so that it is not worth its while to go and make these risky loans? I read that in.

Mr. Green: Yes, this would particularly apply say to the finance company or to the retail store, say the furniture store that is anxious to make a sale and sometimes will get somebody in beyond their ability to pay. Our main concern in the section regarding the interest rates here was to avoid a situation where the lending institutions are caught in a squeeze between the very high amounts they are presently having to pay for customers' deposits yet if there was a pegged lending rate above that it could be squeezed right out.

Senator Everett: How would you overcome the problem?

Mr. Green: If there was a total restriction on the amount that could be paid by any institution to avoid the situation of a person going from one to another and also a limit set on the amount of interest that could be charged, whether it be in terms of a mortgage or loans or whatever it is, at least keeping these figures within the realm of possibility for the low income person and possibly the purchase of a house will be within the realm of possibility.

Senator Everett: You go on in recommendation number 9 to recommend that the United Community Funds should be placed under the direct jurisdiction of regional county or metropolitan government, financed by direct taxation. In effect, this would create really just another government board.

Let us assume if we did that or if that was done and the United Community Fund was financed by direct taxation and all the agencies that draw their funds from the United Appeal did so from direct taxation. Would there be a volunteer area left?

Mr. Green: Well, as things presently stand there are not a great many organizations that are not receiving funds from the United Appeal so, gentlemen, there definitely would.

Senator Everett: But then the United Appeal, the new United Appeal, would grow and you really would not have solved any problem at all, would you. You see a new role in your judgment, a new role for United Appeal?

Mr. Green: Yes, we are not suggesting disbanding the United Appeal or rather the United Community Fund. It would still act in a similar capacity as far as administration is concerned, but being responsible to government and ultimately to the people.

Senator Everett: You say it would be financed by direct taxation?

Mr. Green: Right.

Senator Everett: Now, let us assume that there is still a tendency for people in the community, who have the resources, to give part of those resources to the community in the form of some sort of development fund. What you are saying here is the area covered by the United Appeal is so structured today that it might as well be handed over to government and financed by direct taxation?

Mr. Green: Provided there is no loss of autonomy to the various agencies.

The Chairman: Provided what?

Mr. Green: There is no loss of autonomy to the various agencies.

The Chairman: Sub-agencies.

Mr. Green: They need not become civil servants.

The Chairman: Is it bad to be a civil servant? All right.

Senator Everett: The financing of the United Appeal or the United Community Fund has to be through direct taxation?

Mr. Green: Yes.

Senator Everett: But I am saying, even if you do that there is still an area of giving which I suspect there is.

Mr. Green: Through churches and other organizations.

The Chairman: They cannot hear you out there at all, go ahead.

Mr. Green: Yes, there would still be the area of giving for people who wished to give either through churches or through small, localized community activities or endeavours and various groups that for whatever reason did not want to participate or presently do not participate in the United Community Fund. I think perhaps one of the things that we are getting at, one of the underlying things perhaps two, if I might explain; one is the fact that since the funds are collected in the form of charitable giving, are we giving enough consideration to the person at the other end of the line who is therefore receiving charity rather than receiving something that perhaps should be a grant and also since a fair amount of the donations that are paid say to the United Appeal are tax deductible expenses to business, it is, in effect, coming out of your tax dollar anyway or the price of it. So is there a great deal of difference ensuring it is a fair share?

Senator Everett: I am not arguing the point as to whether you are right or wrong in the recommendation. I am glad to have the explanation. It just seems to me if you decide by some taxation you still leave open an area that voluntary funds would be given by people who had the means to give them and I am just wondering whether you say that aspect of our society should be done away with excepting if you are referring to churches or small local community undertakings, or is there not an area where there are considerable millions of dollars which could be channelled in your mind?

Mr. Green: I suspect there would be many new areas that would open up that presently have not been available. I would hesitate to try, off the cuff, to state exactly what they would be.

Senator Everett: One of the submissions that has been made to us, along this line, has been to the effect that really what these voluntary agencies should be doing is that they should give up what should be available to the client as a matter of right and get more into the experimental field. In other words, public donations should be used to experiment with new methods of attacking the general problems. What do you think of that?

Mr. Green: Yes, I think experimentation is a very valid thing and I think too, we have to keep in mind that not all the United Community Fund Agencies are working solely with the aspect of poverty. In fact, very few of them are concentrating there. There is a much broader scope. Whether you throw your additional funds that you are mentioning into research or experiment either in terms of community activities or in terms of medical research or some of the other things that might become available, it is open to question. I think a great many activities are in terms of medical research or some of the other things that might become available, it is open to question. I think a great many of these things would happen.

Senator Everett: Now, do you think the community at large would support the undertakings of the United Appeal?

Mr. Green: I don't know. Are they supporting it now?

Senator Everett: Now, you make the point in your brief that as a matter of fact the community at large is not supporting, that really the support comes probably from a particular segment of the economy.

Mr. Green: Yes.

Senator Everett: I just wondered whether, on the basis of direct taxation, the community at large—how far would they be prepared to go with the Y.M.C.A., for example?

Mr. Green: I think one result would be the community at large would probably take a far greater interest in what various agencies were doing and possibly they would want to have more citizen participation in the various agencies because this is rather more indirectly the spending of their funds and also, I think too then, that you do bring in the aspect of accountability. In other words, if a group of citizens, a group of people in the area, had some question it could be raised say through their alderman either for or against.

Senator Everett: How important do you think the minimum wage is?

Mr. Green: I think it is vitally important.

Senator Everett: In solving this problem?

The Chairman: Vitally important in solving what problem?

Mr. Greene: In the overall problem of poverty.

The Chairman: In what respect?

Mr. Green: Because I think a large amount of the emphasis, particularly the emphasis we see in the press, has been given to various aspects of welfare and not enough emphasis has really been given to the working poor who are in many cases less well off.

Senator Everett: Have you any particular ideas of what the minimum wage should be in Ontario?

Mr. Green: I would like to see it substantially increased, perhaps even by 25—50 per cent. I think perhaps people—I have not experienced being on a minimum wage and I hesitate to answer for people that are. I feel they should be answering this for themselves.

Senator Everett: I hoped that it would be answered as we go along.

Dealing with your own experience, that is in your own group, which would more likely solve the problem, if you had two, which is not the case in point, but let us assume you did, which would more likely solve the problem, an increase in the minimum wage or a negative income tax, a form of guaranteed annual wage?

Mr. Green: I think this is almost a loaded question.

Senator Everett: Oh no, it was not a loaded question.

Mr. Green: Neither one, I think, is enough on its own. Whichever way it goes, it is something more than that because I would ask a question is that enough money at this point anyway? You know, there is a great deal to be said for and against both ways. You know we hear continually of the guaranteed annual income. This is the thing to talk about right now. I think we would have to recognize it is not quite as simple as that and where is the minimum going to be set and is it going to be a differential depending on whether a person lives. For example, you know, you might say, is the base amount that a family of four could exist on in a small village in Nova Scotia? Is it the same basis upon which a person could live in Montreal, Toronto or Vancouver. If not, where is this leveling going to be set out and I do not think you can really get into a comparison of one against the other unless you give specific figures of how much against how much.

Mr. Davis: I think too, you have to consider people in public housing. For example, if you give them a guaranteed income, a raise, what benefit would they get if they lose part of that back to the Ontario Housing again?

Senator Everett: In increased rents?

Mr. Davis: A lot of things have to be running around in circles, taking away with one hand and putting back with another.

Senator Everett: You do the same thing in increasing the minimum wage.

Mr. Davis: A lot of things have to be considered in regard to wages especially in the line we are thinking of, the majority of our people are public housing tenants, any increase affects their rent.

Mr. Green: And also there will be very many protests from people on the minimum wage if you raise them to the point where they pay more income tax.

Senator Everett: In this brief, at the end of the main brief, that is one of the points that is made here, that there is a definite objection. We come across this objection in other cities we have visited. On page 22 of the brief from the Lawrence Heights Neighbourhood Association you give an example of a man who increased his earning power by $1500.00 a year and assuming that is all taxable income you say his income tax takes a $300.00 increase, the rent will be increased by $500.00 and the job pension will take $100.00, really a total of $900.00 so that does not counter your point?

Mr. Green: Perhaps Mr. Davis, being a member of the Lawrence Heights Neighbourhood Association, would explain that. I suspect there would be much more concern at the increased amount of rent being paid than at the fact that out of this $1500.00 slightly more income tax.

Senator Everett: Yes.

Mr. Davis: I can give you a good example in regard to the facts quoted here that in a raise of $1225.00 per year, the time you take away your rents and your increased job deductions it leaves you with $515.00 and by the time you take your increase in pension plan, increase in income tax, increase in your rent, you are taking $700.00 away from it.

The Chairman: What is wrong with having $500.00 extra?

Mr. Davis: I am just using this as a sample.

The Chairman: If you earn some money you have to pay income tax, but are you going to take the view that it is bad to pay tax on the point where you are not prepared to earn more?

Mr. Davis: No, the point is that a person in this position is not able to go out, buy a home, he cannot save money, not the amount of money in any reasonable amount of time, in fact a person in this position cannot even go out and get a N. H. A. mortgage.

The Chairman: Mr. Davis, we started out by talking about the guaranteed income.

Mr. Davis: I was trying...

The Chairman: Let us just pause for a moment. We talked about the guaranteed income for people and you showed some—I think Mr. Green showed some hesitancy about it. He wanted it specified. Well, I think it is well for us to know the history of our own country. You know a great deal about it from the brief but a guaranteed income would be what we call a demogrant, do you understand that term? Do you agree with that, Mr. Green?

Mr. Green: No.

The Chairman: Well, a guaranteed income is payment across the board to those people who require it. The history of our social legislation in this country has been that our pensions are paid all over the country at the same rate. The family allowances are paid at the same rate. The old age security is paid at the same rate. Unemployment insurance is paid at the same rate in every part of the country no matter rich or poor or whatever. Now, is that any indication of the trend of the legislation or the thinking? Does that make any impression on you at all?

Mr. Green: Yes, I think there is a trend this way and it is not necessarily a bad trend because presumably if it is extra funds by being universal that are getting into the hands of people who do not have need of them, it is going to be taxed back at the top of the scale anyway.

The Chairman: An income, guaranteed income and negative income tax, does not provide for universality, you know, of course they way the old age security works at the present time is an allowance and supplement. One signs an income tax form to indicate he has so much income before he qualifies for the whole supplement or part of the supplement. So that, of course, is the best example of the guaranteed income. Now, does that find approval?

Mr. Green: Yes, I think the theory of the guaranteed income would find fairly general approval with the poorer people provided that the amount that is guaranteed is going to be enough to live on.

The Chairman: Well, we are not going through the exercise for the purpose of just coming up with an amount that does not mean anything. It has to, of course, be a meaningful amount or the whole thing does not work. What I am trying to find out is this. I have a feeling here that when you talk about the guaranteed income that there are some people who feel they will have to pay somewhat more taxes. They are reluctant to do it. Do you have that attitude in your organization?

Mr. Green: Yes, I think this is noticed even among ourselves that there is all this thought in the back of our minds. I questioned though, whether it is entirely valid if complete consideration were given to re-evaluation of government spending. In other words, is money going right now in areas where it doesn't really have to go and could be put to better use without increasing taxes.

Senator Inman: Your representations are interesting. On page 22, recommendation number 8, I would ask if you consider that easy credit contributes to poverty in many cases? I mean the ads, so many ads say, "take it now and pay to-morrow, pay so much a month, low payments down", this sort of thing that invites people to use credit buying. Do you consider that that is attributable?

Mr. Green: Yes, I think it does in many cases because people can be induced into buying something much more expensive than they really set out to buy by a smooth talking salesman and laid down with payments that they might be able to manage for a certain amount of time and always get behind.

Senator Inman: Furniture and everything has to be repossessed?

Mr. Green: And they still have to pay for it.

Senator Inman: Then on page 3, the main part of your brief, the last paragraph, do you think that things such as services and training and skills, education, especially among women on budgeting, housekeeping and so forth is as important as money in many cases of poverty as we know it?

Mr. Green: It is very important. I personally would not want to say whether one is more important than the other, certainly you cannot eliminate poverty without the money. I am not sure how far you would go without many of the other services that go with this other qualification on the guaranteed income. It is not enough on its own.

Senator Inman: I didn't mean just money, along with money?

Mr. Green: Yes, in that case.

Senator Inman: In a lot of cases, people getting a certain amount of welfare do not have the proper knowledge of how to spend that money usefully. Do you think education along these lines would be a big help?

Mr. Green: I think it would be a big help in two ways; to some people it would help, we have also heard the other way that some of the social welfare workers will claim that the people they are dealing with really are the experts in budgeting but just manage to get by. If there were people employed by various departments in this capacity, I think it would not take very long before they realized just how hard it was and actually started feeding back this information within the system as well as having it come from outside.

The Chairman: I was trying to get your point there. Give it to me again, what point were you making?

Mr. Green: Let us say that the various welfare departments and social services departments had people who's sole purpose was to assist budgeting, they themselves would go out in the field and very rapidly see just how difficult it is to manage on the amount that a family is given. So not only would there be pressure and talk from the outside but also they would feed back within the system, "look at this, it isn't enough".

The Chairman: Well, on the evidence that we have heard we come to the very easy conclusion that those people who are on public assistance and have been for any length of time are the world's greatest experts on shopping and budgeting and on how to live. They don't need any teaching. All we have ever done for them is to tell them how to do things and how to tighten their belts. There is something else I wanted to ask you. You got me off base for a minute. I have got another question, oh yes; I think I should make it very clear to you, if you follow the proceedings of the Senate, we have said not once, not twice but a thousand times we do not believe that money alone will solve this problem but on the other hand we have also said that money is the beginning and you go no place without it. So let us not have a bogymen. This we believe.

I will tell you what, just for a change of pace, sir, have you something in mind? Let's hear it.

Mr. Carswell: I came here with a few general observations in my mind. I have not been able to catch the discussion that is going on because I am a little hard of hearing and being a pensioner, of course, I am concerned because I have been attending groups of pensioners to try and pressure the government to bring us a little extra relief to what we have been given, a little more above the 2 per cent they generously give us. First of all, in view of the fate that previous commissions have had, and I mean Hall-Dennis and Carter Commission, I wonder if this commission is an exercise in futility. I am wondering if it is not going to be the same, going to be put in some cubby-hole down in Ottawa the same as the others or could it be you are trying to justify your $15,000.00 a year?

I mean, after all, you fellows have got to save your consciences and do something. I know for hundreds of years it has been the time honoured custom of governments and I have read history back and back, I am an old age pensioner, I am an old country first war pensioner, suffered blood in the first world war with hardship in the trenches, I have followed the history of governments back and I know, it has been stated time and again, a time honoured custom of governments if they want to shelve legislation. I have a feeling it is not good and today, this to me, this is a reflection of the distant attitude of government. The world itself has got this same problem or at least these countries of the world we are acquainted with such as England, United States, Dominion of Canada have got this problem of poverty. Of course, you fellows are delving in, more or less, to the effects of poverty, not the causes. You are delving in just like knocking the man down with the car, the poor man, taking him to hospital, taking him back and putting him on the street to be knocked down again.

The cause of poverty is the distance between the ever growing rich and the ever growing poor. The fact we have the word, "poverty" presupposes on the other end of the scale the word, "rich". While we have multimillionaires there have to be, at the other end of the social scale, "poverty". That is a gulf that has existed for perhaps centuries and has been accelerated into the 1960's. It has been accelerated to the extent we find there are people owing three or four hundred million dollars on the one hand.

It is surprising the government itself is out of touch with the people else why should they need to have a commission like this. We are, in allowing the government today to create these problems, we have got this prosperity today.

Now, I would like "poverty" itself to be defined. Does it stop at people on welfare? Does it stop at people like me who are on a pension, getting old age pensions and perhaps have a few dollars in the bank sufficient enough to have to pay taxes or does it stop at the $18,000.00 a year men in Ottawa who are telling the press stories and getting their pictures in the paper of hardships on the equivalent of around $21,000.00 or $22,000.00. Where does poverty start?

I think the only problem that will solve this is to delve into the causes of poverty and I hope sincerely that this report of your commission, Mr. Chairman and all you ladies and gentlemen, will not go into the cubby files in Ottawa and I hope it will be a report that the government will have to tackle the causes of poverty.

In the first place, if we had, or if we did not have, a valid distribution of taxation we would level-up the incomes of people. Why should big corporations get their discounts and their privileges? We hear people talking about private enterprise, where is there any private enterprise today in this country? Everybody, except the working man, is subsidized. Business is subsidized, giant corporations are given free loans in order to settle in places and they would probably settle there anyway if it satisfies them and if it doesn't satisfy them they won't settle there anyway.

People, because of the income tax suggestions today, are talking about picking up their businesses and going elsewhere. This has been the custom over many, many years when people, certain elements, have thought they weren't going to get a square deal in taxation. In particular the capitalist class suggested they would pick up their capital and go elsewhere but I don't know that they have ever done so.

Well, I thank you for exercising tolerance for my remarks. I am much obliged.

The Chairman: All I can tell you is that we have been at this for some months and working as hard as we possibly can doing it because we want to do it. We do not have to do it but we want to do it. We want to make some contribution to deal with this question of poverty. The only question that we are asking the people, as we come around, is, "How do you cure it?", "What is the remedy?". You would be surprised, Mr. Speaker, that we have not got very many answers yet and we have been around for a considerable length of time. That is the main purpose of the exercise.

If anybody has any suggestions the floor is your's. Go ahead.

Mr. John Fletcher, Pensioner: I was at the committee and I have studied most of the reports given out in the local papers and I am a veteran pensioner.

As I see it, we are confronted with the same problem all the time. People say, "Well, where is the money coming from?"; "Who is going to pay for it?". Why the delay at this point in history? Now, just trying to straighten out the poverty level...

The Chairman: I cannot hear you very well up here. A little louder please?

Mr. Fletcher: The country is in a position moneywise, resourcewise and brainwise to get rid of this situation and I think the only thing that we can do is start right from the bottom as Joey Smallwood said, the minimum wage has got to be raised to $2.00 and $2.50. Once this is done the cash flow can grease the wheels of industry and economics in the country. Without this there is no way. We have got over 60 per cent of the population on the lower bracket of $250.00 or less per year. The balance is subsidized.

There are a few other things involved. The Canadian public are working for 15 per cent of the net profits of the country. The other 85 per cent is going across the border. I am talking about the profits, dividends. This is our main problem. People say, "Why worry about Americans?". I am not against Americans. My brother, my sister, my father, my mother, they are Americans. I say this; we have got to own this country. We have subsidized the bushes, we pay subsidies on our mineral resources, exports to get it out of the ground, but what have we ploughed into industry? Nothing.

Our kids don't own the damn building that they are in. You say, "Why not increase the working wage?". The minimum wage is too low. I will give you an example. Triangle used to be up here, $1.25 an hour. I worked for them myself. Just after I had a stroke. I talked to the Minister of Labour in Ontario, no way, it cannot be. You show me why they are paying such low wages. He wouldn't take the time, and at that time, I didn't bother but I will put it to you this way, you men have got the responsibility. You are sitting in the chair. You have it in your hands to do something. I know you have got a large problem. I say this; first of all, like Gordon says and I know there is a lot of pitfalls in it, we have to own what we are working in. What are the kids going to own in the future if we don't get this under control within a short time. We may have problems with second and third generations.

This gentleman here brought up the Red Feather and the proposition whether they should have voluntary contributions after probably the government tax deal. To do that I say sure, let them have contributions, voluntarily to the government, if they do it.

The 12 per cent interest on money that this gentleman raised, as far as banking is concerned for the low income group. If I understand this correctly, I think it is a good idea, a good percentage of the people in the country have and do belong to the credit unions of the country, over two hundred million in assets or at least monies loaned out. These people used it. Why have they used it? Because they cannot get the same deal from a bank. Even the government workers are using the credit unions themselves and it belongs to the people and they have been using it.

Just lastly here, in the credit union, the government has suggested they should further be chartered like a bank. No doubt it would open the market for more money. The Ontario government suggested they put forward a plan to have a saving programme where they use money for N. H. A. and other housing purposes. This is the route.

Now, as far as the labour board, compensation board, the old age pensioner, the veteran pensioner, since the increase in food costs and general living standards have gone up there has been no really appreciable interest on any of these things.

The welfare recipient and everybody else is concerned with food costs. The cost has gone up and there has not been the same rise in their benefits.

The gentleman brought up the point whether there should be education along with a change and I think this is a good idea. Somebody brought up the point that maybe the welfare workers should go into the home and study the situation of how they make out on $68.00 a week with six kids. In the States some senators have done this and tried to live on their income. It is pretty rough and it takes a mastermind to do it where there is no clothing allowances, no insurance allowances, no other additives to the basic monies received from the crown or from the municipalities. Those people are having a tough time to get along as it is. There is not too much left over, that's for sure.

The Red Feather evidently has had trouble and this man brought the point up that on some of these committees there should be people from the community who are recipients or nonrecipients on the board. I agree with this that there should be some community representation on the new council and the Red Feather took exception to it. Now, I will get away from this business. I think that on any board representing the public there must be a good cross section on the board. If there's not, there is no way it is going to help or change in the future.

Now, one thing that I have studied, and talked to a few people about at the university is the baby bonus. The baby bonus is sort of a cash credit given to most people that have children and could be credited something similar to a plan they have in Australia or New Zealand. We say that we have not got money for housing. In Australia or New Zealand they are using this baby bonus. A citizen can get a pre-cash credit for a number of years ahead so people in the young or middle age group may buy housing from N.H.A. or the equivalent in that country with this as a down payment.

They Windsor television station and radio station, about a year ago, took a survey on this and there were quite a few answers on the pros and cons of it. I don't see anything in this brief about it. The N.H.A. or the Ontario Housing have done a fair job. The architecture, the location and structure of the buildings is fine. The only thing that gets me about it is that I live in one and I have gone in other areas of the country, from one end of the country to the other, areas of the city, the thing that astounds me is that when, as it was brought out in public a while back, these housing units cost roughly $40,000.00 a unit. Now, this is with everything; services, land, large type places or apartment buildings and smaller units. Now the thing is for $40,000.00 I say why are we trying to keep the poor in a poor area. Now, some of the senators in the United States came up with this; remove the ghetto from the ghetto and let the people move, if they want to move into some of the areas of the country. Even now I understand most of the recipients on assistance, it is not transferable. This goes for welfare. The result is we have a poor area in the east of Canada. I am not running down any provinces, but I say this, they are moving here at the rate of 60,000 a year which is developing problems for us right in Toronto let alone our housing in other centres. Let us have a plan where they can move to other areas and get the assistance they would here. Make it a national, transferable plan so that areas of the country that under developed they can move out to.

The man talks about 12% interest rates. Let money be available like the V.L.A. so that the people who can go out to lay even a few bricks, the people who have still got enough in them to do it, can get that money to do something for themselves. There is no point in building a complex putting 500 people in a $2,000,000.00 building on a 100 years mortgage and have those kids be paying for years and years after. It is cheaper to let them have the money and let them move out to areas where it is less congested and you are not grouping all of the one type or all of the recipients all in the same areas because you are just creating over and over the same problem. They found this in New York, Chicago and other major cities in the United States and now they have decided to do something about it.

The compensation board is really a problem in the sense that compensation rates have not been adjusted for quite a while. They take too long. Now I will put it this way; a man gets hurt in an accident and may wait three weeks for a cheque or longer. Now if you are paying insurance, you get hit with a car, you want the insurance company to settle up for your car damages. I think it is only fair that either the compensation board changes the regulations and pay the man from the start of the accident or the employer continue his pay until the compensation board settles up so that he has no loss of time and no inconvenience. This is a serious question for most men in industry because once the man has had an accident very few bosses or industries want to take a second chance with the man. As a matter of fact in a lot of cases they want to get rid of him as soon as possible. There are changes between the employer and the employee. I think it is in the interest of the public to get that changed as soon as possible.

The mention of taxes, increase of taxes, paying for the services or changes in the social structure. We could take the Germans in the war. It is not a five minute deal, we really have got to sit down and I think Mr. Trudeau has got the right idea that something has to get in here and get the thing moving. There is money that has got to be spent and it has got to be spent at the base of the problem because if we eliminate poverty in this country the country is going to tick over twice as fast. If we own the industry in the country it is going to tick over twice as fast and after all who—if a man is going to invest in our country he wants to invest in something that we have got a good equity in ourselves, not just 15 per cent, and also where the poverty problem has been licked. I think we have got a good country and we have got all the time and money to work with it. All we have got to do is rearrange the bookkeeping such as this baby bonus and a few others to eliminate.

Now here we have got the welfare on one hand, old age pensions on the other hand, Ontario payments on the other hand, five different sets of bookkeepers looking after five different sets of computers. What happens is that it has got us doing three or four times as much so maybe we can eliminate that. The cost of doing this, naturally, it is going to hit the tax-payer. It is going to hit everybody, but the point is we are doing something for the future generation coming up because we are still going to have problems even when I am dead and gone.

I take it pretty seriously in this sense that if we do not do something and do it in a reasonable time, I think it is going to drastically affect us.

That is all, Mr. Chairman, thank you.

The Chairman: Madam, I think you wanted to say something?

Mrs. Virginia Forgie, Recording Secretary, Metro Federation of Citizens' Associations: There was a point brought up about baby bonuses. I thought, seeing you were asking for suggestions, I would give you my general opinion. I am not in favour of baby bonuses. I have six children. The main reason everybody gets it. Millions of dollars spent every year. Doctors get it, lawyers get it, everybody gets this $6.00 every month regardless whether they need it or not. Now, if this was turned back into some type of a wage taxation, not exactly a rebate, but just a recovery for the low wage earner, if they could get I mean $300.00, it is just not any type of a tax deduction for you, you know, for a child. There is no way you can raise one on $300.00 so therefore if it was put back that way so that they would not have to pay someone making four or five thousand would not have to pay income tax I think it would be much more to their benefit giving them this $6.00 every month.

That is all.

Mrs. Pat Colley: I heard a few references tonight to raising the minimum wage. I don't really feel that would cure poverty. I think our government in Ottawa and the one here in Toronto must first do something about the unemployment because $5.00 an hour if you are in the work force is all right but if you are unemployed it is not going to help poverty. We have government in Ottawa that lets Dunlop and lets DeHavilland lay off and they import strike breakers whenever there is a legal strike and all this leads to poverty. I think something should be done about that. That is just a suggestion.

The Chairman: I assure you that this committee does not have any differences with you. The first and most positive step in the eradication of poverty is jobs. There is no substitute for jobs. The unfortunate part is that we have to realize that at the height of our prosperity in the last eight or nine years when there were many, many jobs in this country and paying well we had 15 to 20 per cent of the people in poverty. That is a problem in this country and everyone of you knows that we had eight, nine years of unprecedented prosperity yet at the same time while we had this great prosperity we had 15 per cent and now 20 per cent in poverty. That is the dilemma. That is the problem. That is what we have got to try and solve in some way.

Mrs. Dawson Fuller: I am glad you brought this point up, so many people earning so much money but along with this you have common inflation. As I understand it inflation starts with a little blessing from the government, usually following wars. They are faced with a heavy war debt, as long as they have inflation it in turn reduces the debt that they owe. Unfortunately, like most things, the monster they create eventually masters them. One thing they don't keep in view is the fact that income tax exemptions never keep abreast of the inflation. It only stands to reason that this cuts into people. It is proven now up into the $8,000.00 bracket. It is not all inflation but almost every dollar they earn is taxed.

The Chairman: Madam, I cannot say anything to you except I have been in politics for many, many years. Most of the senators, with the exception of Senator Everett, have all been in politics for many years. All I can tell you is I have yet to meet someone who knows the answer to inflation or who knows what the remedy is.

Mrs. Fuller: They don't want to know the answer to any of these things as long as it suits them. They are not the ones worrying where to-morrow's bread and butter is coming from. I am old enough to have lived through the depression and I remember.

The Chairman: Madam, you do not remember it any better than I do.

Mrs. Fuller: It is an exercise in futility and I couldn't have worded it better and an excuse from the Senate to stay in Ottawa.

The Chairman: What is that?

Mrs. Fuller: An excuse from the Senate to stay in Ottawa. I congratulate you. This is the first thing the Senate has ever done.

The Chairman: When I hear you people talk about it—it is hard to hear up here, the "stooges of the Senate who stay in Ottawa" I think I will just take a minute and tell you a few things that you do not seem to know or do not recall.

It was a committee of the Senate, and I speak with knowledge on these things, that first brought on an investigation and sat as a committee to deal with the question of unemployment and from that came the creation of the Department of Manpower. It was a committee of the Senate that dealt with land use and from that came ARDA which was of great help to the rural people. Some of you may recall that it was a committee of the Senate that dealt with the price of food. I think we were very prominent in it and as a result of that came the Department of Consumer Affairs. Perhaps some of you will recall that it was a committee of the Senate that dealt with the question of aging and brought in the guaranteed income which was the first of its kind in any part of the world and the government supplemented it.

Mrs. Fuller: You still can't live on it.

The Chairman: In addition to all that, perhaps you will recall, it was a committee of the Senate that dealt with the matter of truth in lending, to tell you how much interest you pay on your money—before you didn't know.

These are some of the accomplishments of the Senate. I would think, as Canadian citizens, you would be knowledgeable of these and so when we come here to you with proven results on other occasions we are attempting to do a job and the lack in confidence in us is not warranted from what little I tell you now of our accomplishments.

Mrs. June Egoroff: You mentioned Manpower?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mrs. Egoroff: Well, I find that Manpower isn't very much good.

The Chairman: Isn't very much good?

Mrs. Egoroff: No, it is very little use. For instance I have four children to support. Now, I went to Manpower to try and better myself, offered to go to school free so that I could earn a living for myself and my children and not accept charity but they wouldn't let me take training, not even for free.

The Chairman: No, but you see, I am not trying...

Mrs. Egoroff: It is better to live on welfare you are getting more money by the time you finish paying taxes.

The Chairman: I don't want to hurt your feelings. I may be wrong, you correct me if I am; they have got a regulation in Manpower that is causing us a lot of trouble and that regulation states that unless you have so much schooling that they cannot take you. Now that is what they probably did to you.

Mrs. Egoroff: I was booked as a filing clerk and they wrote on my card a "senior general clerk" which I am not and said that I could not take another job because I was a file clerk and there is no money in being a file clerk, maybe $240 a month, well I am making more than that sitting at home, looking after my own kids.

The Chairman: As I say, we are finding as we go across the country that the general complaint has a lot of merit to it. We have been able to straighten some of it out, not completely. What you are saying is eminently so.

Mrs. Egoroff: This is training from the taxpayer's money, people like me that are going to prefer to sit home on welfare.

The Chairman: I must tell you something else that will interest you. You say you could earn $240 as a file clerk, what would you earn?

Mrs. Egoroff: About $240.

The Chairman: $240, what would you get on relief?

Mrs. Egoroff: On welfare?

The Chairman: Yes, approximately?

Mrs. Egoroff: More than that, about $30 more than that.

The Chairman: Instead of $240 you have got $300?

Mrs. Egoroff: Right.

The Chairman: In the Province of Ontario, you are either on relief or off relief, right?

Mrs. Egoroff: Right.

The Chairman: And you have people who know that is so. Now, in several of the provinces of Canada you know how they would deal with you? They would say you go on and work and we will supplement and give the difference between what you would get on welfare and what you earn and in addition to that if you earn more than that they would take 50 cents out of every dollar and you keep 50 cents of every dollar up to an amount.

Mrs. Egoroff: Not if you are in housing.

The Chairman: What?

Mrs. Egoroff: Not if you are in Ontario Housing.

The Chairman: It has nothing to do with Ontario Housing.

Mrs. Egoroff: Because you rent those.

The Chairman: I am talking about the welfare generally. You understand what I am saying?

Mrs. Egoroff: Yes, I do.

The Chairman: Let me repeat it; if you were to get $300 in welfare that would be $60 difference, just a rough sum, right?

Mrs. Egoroff: Right.

The Chairman: In seven provinces in Canada which are poorer than Ontario, they would give you that $60 and keep you working rather than say you must take relief and then figure that they save a great number of dollars and more important than that they save your dignity as a person. Now, a few people want some job to do and I have just given you another very good job to do. We will be going on to something else but there is one of the difficulties that you have to face and that is you ought to do something about it. All I did was suggest that you perhaps should raise your voice a little louder, Mr. Green.

Is there anybody else? I cannot see, I don't see anyone else. Look, it is your show, you do not often get a chance to take a wack at senators. Come on let's have it.

Mr. Wilfred Mountain: The only question I want to ask is why are the draft dodgers paid; why are the tax payers paying the draft dodgers from the United States in this country? The deserters come from the United States to this country and the taxpayers are keeping them.

The Chairman: My friend, I am an old soldier too.

Mr. Mountain: That's all right, all my family are old soldiers.

The Chairman: I share your views.

Mr. Mountain: Why are the taxpayers paying for them?

The Chairman: Is there someone over there?

Mr. Ken Radford: I have just one comment. There was a lady over here who was speaking about the universal baby bonus which I think is a valid point inasmuch as a lot of money is not required but it might be suggested if we did have a guaranteed annual income, and of course assuming this would be based on the number of people in the family, this would eliminate altogether the necessity of any baby bonus. I think the question would be rather redundant if we had the other type of guaranteed income.

Mrs. Forgie: Would the baby bonus be cut out if we had the guaranteed annual income? Would they eliminate that?

The Chairman: Well, I don't know what they would do and I cannot tell you what this committee will finally report but it seems to me that if we deal with a family on guaranteed income, it would be most inclusive. The gentleman has a point.

Senator Everett: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if we could hear some comment on public housing.

Mr. Fletcher: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take too much of your time. I think you brought to question up, I would like to refer to it. I think public housing, the way we are now thinking of it, we are going to Malvern and spending millions of dollars there with a new type of unit and if you doubt my words, just ask the principal of the school, ask the teachers, you will find that in general it is not on the surface. It looks nice when you drive down the street but I don't think it is really worth it. I think there is enough evidence from the community council, from the representatives of the Children's Aid, the rest of them right in here, a good example, a good cross section that it costs too much money and basically that the single home unit and possibly faster transportation to rural areas, out a little further or transferable to other cities that need the population, need the skilled jobs or whatever is involved, it is a lot cheaper. The cost is tremendous per unit and the assessment is higher, quite a bit higher and the fact that we are paying the interest funds that we are paying, if you try to duplicate the same system say five to ten years from now you are going to pay three times the cost of the project, the cost of the architecture, layout, fast transportation, roads and sewers, in the highly congested areas like Regent Park or downtown as the city gets larger. It has got to the point now where the basic engineers are teaching this type of construction or planning for the future and I say forget about it.

We are past that stage in large centres like Toronto to be building any more congested units too close to the city because the taxpayer here is going to be taxed right out of this shirt. It is happening in Oakville. When the new assessment of rates comes in next year it will possibly be the same thing in Scarborough so you can imagine what taxes on these units would be. The taxes are roughly on an assessment on a four bedroom unit, about $650.00 or $1,000.00 so in five to ten years what are the taxes going to be? What is the assessment going to be? This is what you have to consider and the construction of the units, especially the housing, the noise rate is pretty high, no plaster on the walls, no sound-proofing, the rest of the services are adequate but I think the cost is say roughly $40,000.00 per unit for the whole project. You can do better for $25,000.00 out in Cooksville or someplace else. I think if you really look into this you will find other countries doing better at this type of thing and Australia and New Zealand, I think, may have the answer especially where they have a transferring fund from one set of books to be credited on the baby bonus to use for down payments on housing. This alleviates the problems for the future too.

The Chairman: Mr. Weatherhead, would you like to say a few words?

Mr. David Weatherhead, M.P., Scarborough West: No, Mr. Chairman, I just came in to listen to my people. This is my riding, as you know. I have close contact with people in Warden Woods particularly. I would just like to listen to their comments and not make a speech myself, thank you, very much.

The Chairman: I am sorry that you have not been here before. It has been very interesting, I am afraid we have run our course pretty well.

I am sure you will get a copy of Hansard and you will be able to read it because it will appear there. That is the best I can do for you.

Mrs. Beatrice Roden: Senator Croll, I understand this committee has been good enough to want to know the causes of poverty.

The Chairman: Yes?

Mrs. Roden: There is a sector which I believe you have not heard from and that is the crippled adult civilian and what happens after a person who is a crippled child, who has everything possible done in childhood gets an education, the best they can and does the best they can and suddenly are struck with an accident. By an accident I don't mean a car, just some accident, they are deprived of a means of livelihood by that accident and they are thrown immediately into poverty. They cannot apply to a compensation board. They are not injured on any job. It may be a fall on the sidewalk, any little fall in their own home, any little insignificant thing that eventually disqualifies them for earning a living. A healthy normal person would be able to recover from it but when they have spent their life as more or less a weakling, a handicapped person, how do they pull out of it? They are thrown immediately into hopeless destitution. That is an area I have not heard mentioned.

The Chairman: Well, madam, may I tell you on behalf of the committee that that sort of a case is foremost in our minds and it is foremost in our minds for this reason that those people are no longer in the labour market.

Mrs. Roden: Right.

The Chairman: They cannot help themselves and when you people ask questions you give me an opportunity to tell you a few things that are interesting. One of the things we did in this committee, and for the first time, was to identify the poor, the poverty stricken. We know who they are. We know where they are. We think we know they got there. Our trouble is to find a way to get them out.

One of the first group that we have are what we call, and you will understand the term, the disadvantaged. The blind, the crippled, the maimed, the aged, who are no longer in the labour market and who must be looked after decently and immediately. There is not a labour problem there. They are all in the same position as the person on old age security for whom we are making some provision but we have to make an adequate provision. That is our number 1 category. Our number 2 category is the female head of families. There are about 300,000 of them in Canada with 500,000 children of various ages. This woman is pretty helpless. There is not much she can do. She may be in the labour market. She may be out of the labour market, but there she is. Then we have the welfare poor, the people who are on welfare. That is the third category. The others, the first category, are about 50 per cent of the 4,000,000, then we have 2,000,000 people in this country who are working for minimum wages or less who are the working poor and who could almost do better on welfare. They are just hard working people. Not all of them could work but a great many of them could. We know there is an obligation for us to do whatever has to be done but it is a difficult situation. Some people say to give them a higher minimum wage. We have studied that and, sure, we want a higher minimum wage. I wanted to indicate to you that we are aware of what the problem is and how we view it.

Mrs. G. "Smith": I would just like to make a comment. Anyone who is disabled can qualify in the family benefits for a disability pension. These people can be rehabilitated. They are assessed by the medical advisory board and by the field worker and they can receive the disability pension. If necessary, they can receive a supplement from the general welfare plus the other benefits. They are not just out in the cold the way some people think they are. Certainly a lot should be done for them but there is a lot being done.

The Chairman: There is no suggestion that they are "out in the cold". The suggestion is what they are getting is inadequate. That is the suggestion that is being made and the difficulty of coming within that category and from our point of view they are poverty stricken since they cannot get into the labour market to help themselves. That is all I was saying to you.

Mrs. J. Tremblett: I would like to know why it takes years and years of study to recognize these people need extra assistance.

The Chairman: Why it takes years of study is because it is not as easily recognizable as making the statement here to you after many many months of studying the situation. We really did not know where these people were, and we studied it in bits and pieces.

Mrs. Tremblett: Here I am.

The Chairman: Senator Everett was right on the job this morning. He is very sharp tonight. He suggested I quote your brief to you which says on the first page:

One of the major problems faced by Canada's low income people is the complete lack of knowledge and understanding displayed by the general, more affluent, public.

This is the thing, a lack of understanding of the plight by the public extends to almost everyone.

Please do not forget that this discussion that we hold here today, I express views and some others express views and we only have the power to recommend in this committee, as every committee has, only the power to recommend and there are other people who's obligation it is to act on those recommendations. Naturally I have indicated to you that on other times and other occasions we have made recommendations that have been very fruitful. This undertaking we have at the present time is the hardest work this committee or any other committee has ever done in any parliament under any circumstances. We are at it constantly and the kind of problems that we have to face up to, as we have heard today, are the kind that touch you every minute. You are living with that sort of thing and you realize that it is a human problem. It is the biggest problem in the world to solve. It is not a money problem, it is a human problem.

Mr. Carswell: Could I say another word? What you have just said, the power to recommend, that touches me because I remember Mr. Trudeau saying on the inflation question when he was questioned in parliament about enforcing restraint and he said that the constitution did not allow him to take any enforcement. Then, practically at the same time, Mr. Young of the Prices and Income Commission was asked a similar question and he said his terms of reference were only to investigate, that he could not go any further than that. So one wonders what power the politicians do have in Ottawa, what power or is there a power beyond the scene? A power from the various chambers of commerce, big industry, big finance, that says you cannot do this, big advertising concerns such as Eatons and Simpsons and these people who pay—the reporters are here—who pay the Star and the Telegram, not my ten cents every night of the week and my twenty cents on Saturday. The Star and Telegram are not concerned with those. I have tried for many, many times to get letters into the Star in particular about these people who go down to Ottawa with their nice words about democracy and the rights of the people and I have seen in page 7 that they are making such a great play that it is a democratic right of the people and I have written letters of protest against M.P.'s getting increased salaries back in 1963 when they went from $10,000.00 to $18,000.00 a year and in 1954 when they went from about $6,000.00 to $10,000.00 a year. I sent in letters of protest because I have all my life tried to find out what an M.P. does to justify his salary and I can never find out. I can never find if he does any more than the mere ombudsman could do. We have three levels of government: municipal politicians, provincial politicians and we have federal politicians.

In the Globe and Mail, one member justified the preference of old age pensioners because he said he was rendering service. I would like to remind this person that I rendered a service and gave bloodshed in two world wars in order that he might enjoy those comforts that he has now in his office.

The Chairman: I can tell you, my friend, that whether the Star or the Telegram refused to print your letters, Hansard will have every word of it in.

Well now, we have had an evening. We have had a discussion. I have in mind terminating it unless something special...

Mr. Bill Belfontaine, Alderman, Ward 1, Borough of Scarborough: I don't know whether I have any priority to speak, I am just an alderman in Scarborough.

The Chairman: What is your name?

Mr. Belfontaine: Belfontaine is my name.

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Belfontaine: Also a provincial candidate in '67. I have one or two votes in this room. I would like to, if I may, I have been thinking a great deal about poverty as applies to the spirit and to the pocketbook and to the community. I am a businessman and I thought that it was time business supplied its great pressures and possibilities to poverty. I don't mean by lowering prices in the supermarket although this would certainly help. I would like to see the business executives who are washed up on the beach at 65 and still have five, ten, fifteen or twenty years of tremendous drive, intelligence, experience, that they could lend in a task force basis and work directly in the community. I am thinking even at the ward level, with people who are on a kind of poverty of the spirit and they can't recover themselves. They could either retrain themselves or be inspired to go out and perhaps get back in the labour force again. I have tried to do this in my own simple way and, of course, my facilities are rather limited. I cannot share my alderman's salary. I understand it is just above the poverty level. I do not know whether anybody knew that or not.

Mr. Carswell: What is poverty?

Mr. Belfontaine: I might place the suggestion before your committee. There are these tremendous people available and there must be at least 100 or 150,000 business executives frittering away their time on the golf courses or perhaps at the Granite Club, perhaps at the Primrose Club, if you can make it there. If they would apply themselves to this particular problem I would think that poverty could be solved at least a little bit.

The Chairman: Thank you very much. The chairman being more than 65 and some of the others may be close to it is not frittering his time away as he might in working on this committee nor are my colleagues. Thank you very much for rising and coming to this meeting and giving us your point of view.

From the Floor: I consider this a special question. I guess everyone else considers what they have to say as special. I was not going to speak. I am among the affluent society. I have been very poor, very hungry, terribly hungry because I was hungry in 1924 when we came from England and they just said, "No Englishmen may apply" at all the factories in Toronto. Here again then we hit the depression. I would oppose Mr. Belfontaine's suggestion because I think that anyone who is one day over 65 is redundant and I would strongly urge that we look to the youth for the tomorrows that we won't be living in.

The Chairman: Well, you are not suggesting that they shoot all of us over 65, are you?

From the Floor: Well, no, I wouldn't suggest that. I have a mother and a father too, all alive.

Mr. Green: If I may comment on the first aspect sir, I think the lady is being sarcastic or cynical. I hope, sir, it was not intended to be on the retired executives, I am not sure just how much they would understand what the problems are. It would have to be people that are experienced in the problems.

Mr. Belfontaine: I learn more from that than forty year's in business.

The Chairman: Take it easy now, ladies and gentlemen, we have had a good evening. Thank you very much for coming. Thank you Mr. Green and Mr. Davis for presenting the brief. We hope to be able to satisfy some of your wishes. Thank you all.

The committee adjourned.

Toronto, Tuesday, March 10, 1970.

The Special Senate Committee on Poverty (Subcommittee "B") met this day at 2.25 p.m. at Duke of York Public School, Toronto.

Senator Edgar E. Fournier in the Chair.

The Chairman: We will call the meeting to order because time is passing quickly. We are greatly privileged to be with you this afternoon for a few hours. We have just visited your school and have been very impressed with what we have seen. This is a new type of school and it is indeed a novelty for us who come from smaller centres.

Mr. Sinclair, we regret very much that we could not accept your invitation to dinner. As you know, we are tied up with other meetings and our time is rather limited. We are grateful for your kind invitation, as we are also grateful for your brief, which all the members of the committee have read more than once. We believe it is a fine presentation and you have a lot to tell us.

I should point out that in addition to the Principal of Duke of York Public School, Mr. Sinclair, there are also present the following Mr. William J. Quinn, Inspector of Schools District #7, Toronto; Mr. James E. Laughlin, Inspector of Schools, District #8, Toronto; Mrs. Zelda Feldbrill, School Social Worker Duke of York School; Miss Tanis Sigurjonsen, a teacher at Duke of York School; Mr. Bernice Laski, also a teacher at the school and Miss Rosemary Draper, a teacher at Duke of York School.

As a rule, we do not ask the person presenting the brief to make a resumé of it and already read it, as I have previously mentioned. We usually just ask the person presenting the brief to make a resumé of it and then we ask questions. With time permitting we will also ask the audience to participate. I regret that at this time I am unable to say whether there will be sufficient time to permit that. However, if there is the time, we would like to have questions from the audience. So, Mr. Sinclair, the floor is yours.

Mr. Walter Sinclair, Principal, Duke of York Public School, Toronto: Thank you, Senator Fournier. Mr. Chairman, senators, ladies and gentlemen, this committee has heard many briefs about what poverty is. I think that today, from the school's point of view, we should talk about the effect of poverty on children and parents. I should say at the beginning that we are not talking about all of the people who live in this particular district; we are talking about some of them. However, their numbers throughout the City of Toronto have been so large that it has caused great concern to our Board of Education and its members.

In 1965, this school, after some study, was set up as a point project to find out what could be done, as far as education is concerned, to reduce the effect of poverty on children. As I mention in the brief, a number of criteria were set up to decide which schools should participate in this program, and over the years up until the early 1970's there will be about 60 schools involved.

Senator Pearson: All in the centre of town?

Mr. Sinclair: All in the centre of town, as far as Toronto is concerned.

The Chairman: When did you say, Mr. Sinclair?

Mr. Sinclair: The early '70s, The criteria for choosing these schools include seven: income, public housing, juvenile delinquency, socio-economic rank, economic achievement, household characteristics, and social welfare.

We have set particular purposes for the inner city schools and these are purposes in addition to what you would expect in any other school. To go through these briefly, we hope that we can do something to make school a happy place, a place where children really want to be and to learn; in other words, we want them to remain in school as long as they can. We want to help them improve their communications skills and perhaps most fundamentally we want parents to be involved in the school. We realize that if we do not involve parents the school suffers to that extent.

We feel also that we need to involve the other community agencies that exist in this particular school area. We feel that the most basic relationships include the school, the teacher and the child, and it is from this that we work. I repeat that when I talk about deprived children I am not talking about all children. I emphasize this point because sometimes we use various general terms and people misunderstand. But in the school we have children who seem not to be benefitting from our educational program, have not in the past and are not now.

What this school has tried to do is to meet the child at his level by accepting him where he is and providing some sort of program that will facilitate his development. It is as if we have individual programs whereas in fact we have group programs.

We try to help the teacher to keep her job easier in the sense that she has support from people other than teachers. In this group I include our resource personnel, such as the social work department, the library people, guidance teachers, physical education teachers, and a number of others.

In this school we have also developed a number of programs which we think in the future will come to be included under the term "community school" and these things include such activities as occur in many schools; that is before-school programs, physical education, games and so on, noon hour, after-school, and some evening programs, and this year we have developed some programs on Saturdays. Last year saw the development of a summer program for children. There were some 150 in that particular program. And so we look forward to the extension of the school day and the school year.

When I read the criteria that are used to identify inner city schools, the implication is that it is not just the task of the school to meet the problems of poverty; it involves all levels of government, the public and private industry. In other words, the solutions for the inner city school problems are not to be found within the schools themselves. If we ever put ourselves forward as an institution that can cure poverty, I think to that extent we will be in error.

In working at the problems of poverty, we think that the way we work at them is of great significance. By this I mean that we must involve all of the people who are affected, all of the people who have responsibilities for working at the problems.

In conclusion I would say that the school has attempted to adapt itself in new ways to the needs of the community and to the children in particular. We recognize many problems within the school, and outside of the school. The problems within the school are ones of inadequate experience on our part and inadequate training, but we feel that we are approaching the problem by involving as many people as we can.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Sinclair. Would any of your panel like to make any comments? Perhaps the school inspectors have something to add?

Mr. W. J. Quinn (Inspector of Schools, District # 7, Toronto): I might say a word, Mr. Chairman. As you probably would guess from the brief, the problem of the approach to the children who are forced to live under what has been described as deprived circumstances becomes the concern of the whole Toronto Board of Education. This is, I think, recognized by the fact we are setting up a great number of schools in the inner city trying to reach the children who must live in this kind of environment.

I think Mr. Sinclair has done a very excellent job in outlining our kind of unique purposes in these schools, but I would just like to add one dimension to it in the sense that if poverty in fact does immobilize people, and I think it does, from being full participants in our society, then we see the role of the school as one of enabling people, especially children and their parents, to become more effective participants in our society.

I think by that we mean that we would enable all people, but especially our children, to be able to participate in the decisions that affect them, in the decision-making process. There are skills involved in making decisions. We are assuming that if we do this that we are all going to be able to be more effective in arriving at what it is we have to do about poverty, in enabling us to help ourselves because many of us came from backgrounds of poverty ourselves.

I think the other dimension that I would like to add to what Mr. Sinclair has said is this, and this is based on some years of experience in working in the inner city of Toronto as a teacher, as a consultant, as a principal, and now as an inspector. The school cannot do this job alone. I would hope that no one would think that we can do it. I would hope that we do not give anyone the impression that we can do it alone because, while we have a very vital role and because we are the one institution in society where we have them all, in spite of this, in spite of this great advantage, this great opportunity, we cannot do the job ourselves.

You might say then: "Who is going to do the job?" We have indicated our role in this process of helping the poor. However, I think there are others. There are, first, the people as we have indicated here. We have implied that the people themselves who are concerned have to have a part in this. However, I am also thinking of other jurisdictions. I think ways and means must be found which will enable us to get these various jurisdictions together to concentrate, to cooperate, to focus on this great problem in our very rich country.

I think it is in that area that we are least competent. We have got all kinds of problems in terms of our communications between various jurisdictions. Consider the federal-provincial kind of problem that we realize we see every day of the week, and especially as it applies to education in the country of Canada. Or let us consider the number of jurisdictions in our own city, the matter of the responsibility of the board of education and the matter of the responsibility of the city council. I do not think you can really isolate these two jurisdictions when you attack a problem like poverty. Somehow we have to find ways of working together.

I think my third point would be that there is great hope because I think there are skills that are being made available to all of us especially in the field of the social sciences where we have learned how to communicate and how to work together. If we can share these skills, learn these skills, and this goes for the parents, the children, the teachers, the counsellors, the members of parliament, all of us, if we can use these skills to come to bear on a problem like poverty, I think that there is great hope for the future.

The Chairman: Thank you, sir. I do not wish to open the debate now, but I would like to ask you at this moment, since the school have been in operation, do you actually see some progress?

Mr. Quinn: Yes, definitely. It is mainly in the area of the attitudes at this point.

The Chairman: Would anybody else like to comment?

Senator McGrand: Attitudes of the parents or the pupils?

Mr. Quinn: Both.

Senator McGrand: How is that attitude evidenced?

Mr. Quinn: Let us take the attitude of the child. One thing we know is that we see children who are in the Duke of York school feeling good about coming to school. I think at this point in time about all we can really do is, if they want to come to school, then we would hope, and I think this is true, that it is not an unreasonable hope, that they would then want to learn, that there is an opportunity here for them to discover and explore and develop. I think we can read their attitudes. I think the attitude is a symptom of something else that is going on, which is probably deeper and which we have not been able to measure.

The Chairman: Inspector Laughlin?

Mr. J. E. Laughlin, Inspector of Schools, District # 8, Toronto: Mr. Chairman, I would like to congratulate Mr. Sinclair and Mr. Quinn on their presentations so far. It seems to me basically what we are trying to do in the inner city schools, or what we are aiming at doing, is to give the child in the classrooms of the inner city schools the same opportunities for success as a child would have who comes from a higher socio-economic area, say in a North Toronto school.

We have to come to grips with this problem. It may be that it will involve more people concerned with, say, a Grade I class. Generally, we have no lay assistants in our primary classes except in one school in this district, and that is in this Duke of York school. A lay assistant is a person who comes in and who helps the teacher. She is not a teacher but serves to assist with the children, and she talks to the children, which is a very important thing.

We have a lay assistant in each of our kindergartens. It may be that we should have two, even three lay assistants assisting in a Grade I classroom in an inner city school because the children need language, they need people to talk to. Generally, when these children come to school their language background is not as rich as it should be. This is a basic thing. There is not the richness of language background for the learning of reading and the learning of writing and the ability to express themselves.

It may be that we should have more help in our Grade I class—probably first on an experimental basis. It could be three; maybe two in a Grade II class, and one in Grade III might do. Basically we have to say: How are we going to create for this child the same opportunities to succeed as exist for the child in a Grade I class in North Toronto?

Community involvement has been stressed. I think this is important, that the school and the community be involved together. Personally I have said that I would like to see the school open in some way until probably nine o'clock in the evening, when perhaps we might have a vice-principal on duty for part of the day and a second vice-principal in charge for the late afternoon and the evening, so that the community could be involved more closely with the school.

I do think we need to set up screening for teachers for their work in inner city schools. There are some very good materials on the market today for this. However, it should be organized so that all teachers in inner city schools are trained more effectively to deal with the problems which they will be finding in our classes.

Again, I would like to stress that when we are talking about inner city schools we must be careful not to generalize. When we talk about poverty, remember we are talking about only some; we are not talking about all the people of any school district or area.

Another point that Mr. Quinn has stressed is the need for a coordination of effort on the part of all our community organizations. I remember a couple of years ago when he was principal of this school he invited me down and said that there were over 50 community organizations that he had to work with, to endeavour to bring together to unite their forces to focus attention on the problems that were to be found in a school like Duke of York.

Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to make a long speech. Those are a few points I wished to make at this time.

The Chairman: Thank you, sir. Anybody else? We have a social worker here, Mrs. Feldbrill. We would like to hear from her.

Mrs. Z. Feldbrill, School Social Worker, Duke of York School: Mr. Chairman, I would like to stress the importance of this co-ordinated, concerted effort on the part of various agencies, including various government departments, and also the community itself, in looking into the problem of poverty. I would hate to see this as an endeavour on the part of the ones that have just paternalistically making decisions for those who have not.

I think the people who are poor or are deprived should help solve their own problems. I think sometimes we underestimate their wisdom in this whole field. The work I have done with the people struggling with it has convinced me that they are well aware of some of the points involved and have made very wise decisions in many instances. I think traditionally our process has been that agencies do things on behalf of them, and very often this fails. I would like to see this approach change and have them involved in the whole process of finding solutions.

The Chairman: Thank you. Anybody else who would like to add a few words?

Miss T. Sigurjonsson, Teacher, Duke of York School: Yes, Mr. Chairman. As a person who is not a trained psychologist, I would like to put in a plea for easier access to trained help in connection with psychological disturbances. I think we have in this school the greatest need in Toronto for this type of service. I think we will not have enough help until every teacher has some training in psychology. We need more help in that direction to work with these children who need this help but do not receive it.

The Chairman: Thank you. Miss Draper?

Miss R. Draper, Teacher, Duke of York School: It seems obvious to me, Mr. Chairman, with the number of schools in the inner city, 60 very shortly, there cannot be the same amount of attention given throughout the whole system. I think it ought to be recognized that probably a core of about 6 schools needs very special help with their very special problems. It is in the centre of the city where the greatest poverty lies.

The Chairman: Thank you. Anybody else?

Mr. Laughlin: Mr. Chairman, I think really when you begin to look at the inner city schools you can see two groups, a core of inner city schools such as here, and then the other group, which is a rather different thing from some of the schools which are now being classed as inner city schools, with far fewer problems because of the socio-economic level of the districts involved. However, the core inner city school, the school in the centre of the downtown area, is where there exist the serious problems.

The Chairman: How about Mrs. Laski?

Mrs. B. Laski, Teacher, Duke of York School: Mr. Chairman, I have been sitting here listening and I have been quite impressed. I think there is one very positive aspect to all this, and that is that the children themselves in this school, which is the one I am more familiar with, where we have instances where everybody around them is concerned with poverty, the kids are not involved because they are not aware. They are not aware of poverty.

We have very many children in this school who can be, with the proper training, guidance, love and understanding, leaders of this country and who may be in 30 or 40 years from now sitting on a Senate committee investigating something else because the whole poverty problem will have been solved by then. The positive thing we have is the children themselves in the school. I just don't like to overlook the kids. I am concerned about the parents and I am concerned about many other things, but I think in the case of the teachers in this school their personal concern has to be the children.

The Chairman: Thank you. Now we have Senator Carter, Senator McGrand, and Senator Sparrow. Senator Carter, first.

Senator Carter: Mr. Chairman, I gather from the brief, and from what we saw as we made the tour of the school, that the entrance age is about 4 years. Do you take in children under 4 years of age?

Mr. Sinclair: At this point the youngest age is 4.

Senator Carter: Do you take in all children of age 4 or do you have criteria for selecting them?

Mr. Sinclair: It is voluntary as far as the parents are concerned, as to whether or not they bring their 3-year-olds.

Senator Carter: It is up to the parents themselves?

Mr. Sinclair: Yes.

Senator Carter: You do not refuse any children if they come?

Mr. Sinclair: If there is space we do not refuse any.

Mrs. Feldbrill: May I add something, Mr. Chairman?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mrs. Feldbrill: There are two nursery schools in the area that we direct parents to when there are children younger than 4 and when the parents want them to go to school. So in some ways we do encourage them to go to nursery school before the junior kindergarten.

Senator Sparrow: Are there retarded children's schools in this area or a retarded children's school?

Mrs. Feldbrill: Beverley Street School is the closest one. We have children at the school who are, you know, in the in-between range. However, for the children who are more retarded than that, we do send them to the Beverley Street school.

The Chairman: I might inform you that Senator Carter is a former teacher and school inspector.

Senator Carter: You should not let the cat out of the bag, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: I was just putting these people on their guard.

Senator Carter: On page 8 of the brief you list a number of criteria for setting up this type of school. One of the criteria is juvenile delinquency. Do you have any follow-up after the children pass through this school as to whether the incidence of juvenile delinquency is lowered?

Mr. Sinclair: We have a very tentative report from the juvenile court which states that the rate of juvenile delinquency in this area has declined from the point of view of his particular person who is a teacher in the court. Other than that, I think I have no more information.

Senator Carter: You take these children to what level?

Mr. Sinclair: To Grade VI.

Senator Carter: To the Grade VI level. When they go to another school that is more formalized than this one? They fit into a regular grade system when they leave here?

Mr. Sinclair: It is somewhat more formalized but becoming less so as time goes on.

Senator Carter: Have you done any follow-up as to how these children make out in the other schools?

Mr. Sinclair: Nothing as far as research or statistics are concerned. It is just word of mouth between the staff of this school and the staff of the two senior schools.

Senator Carter: On page 14 of the brief you list the characteristics of this group of people. Mr. Quinn, I think, mentioned one characteristic that changed, a change in basic attitudes of parents and children. Are there other characteristics that have changed?

The Chairman: The answer to that is open to anyone who has an answer.

Mr. Laughlin: I think that attitudes do change. As you change your type of curriculum to the sort of thing that is provided in this school and where it is a freer type of curriculum than formerly, where there is an attempt to meet the needs of each child, where the curriculum is related more to experience, and where we are providing, as we are now with an increasing budget, the amount of service and the amount of supplies that enables the teacher to do things she could not do before for the children, I think we find there is a lessening of distrust of institutions and certainly a lessening in general resentment of authority because this school, the Duke of York, is a child-centred school.

For instance, Mr. Sinclair does not use the strap in this school. The relationship between the teacher and the child is such that it results in an acceptance of the authority of the teacher, which is exercised in a benevolent way towards the child. So those are a few things that do change.

As far as the parents are concerned, as you bring the parents in, there tends to be a change in their attitude towards the school as an institution. At home the parents can talk about happenings in the school. And where we have the people brought in to act as volunteers in the school, they see what is going on and they become sold on what the school is trying to do for the child. And so their attitudes change.

Would you agree with that, Mr. Quinn?

Mr. Quinn: I would like to comment on this attitude of trust because I think this is very vital in this school and in all inner city schools, that if you really believe that you can teach a child something as a result of a human relationship, then I think you have to believe that you can accept him, that you must accept him, before you can develop any trust on his part. And I think you must have trust if in fact you are going to make any difference to a child or an individual.

So I think I see acceptance, as this teacher has mentioned, of children, and out of this acceptance will grow trust. I see trust in the institution of the school. Whatever carry-over this might have in society I am not sure.

I know that you have real evidence in terms of looking at our attendance and truancy figures. I cannot speak for Duke of York school right now, but I could a few years ago. Truancy was not a problem in this school. Attendance really was not a problem. The children come to school often when they would be better off if they stayed home because they are ill. However, they want to come. I look upon this as a child trusting this institution.

I would like to say a word about authority. Authority can be misused as well as used. I think Mr. Sinclair would support me when I say that we believe, in the inner city schools, that authority derives from the child and that we only keep this authority as the leaders in the school as long as we continue to take the child on in a real and meaningful way to him.

I think another thing I would like to say too is that our real, overriding purpose is this business of building a sense of being able to do things, a sense of self-worth. I see children in these schools, and I am talking to your question of changing attitudes, I see children in situations in these schools as doing things, as them seeing themselves able to do things in the environment we have provided and are trying to provide in our inner city schools.

Mrs. Feldbrill: Could I add something to that? I think very much related to what Mr. Quinn has said, we do see evidence of children working closer to their capacity, closer to their potential, and this is quite evident in many instances where children have been disturbed and unable to use themselves effectively but now are eventually accomplishing at their potential.

Senator Carter: In the day's program, in any fixed day, to what extent are the children involved? You have a whole section here about involvement of parents. To what extent do you try to involve the children themselves in the activities in a day's program? Do they have any say in it?

Mrs. Laski: Well, I have a Grade V class, and it is certainly easier with children 10, 11 and 12 to give them some decisions. It is not a complete and true democracy, there is a boss in that class, but it is one who is quite willing to listen to the children. There is one gorgeous thing about our children; you cannot "con" them. There is just no way. Maybe their reading and writing is not up to snuff but you cannot "con" the children.

If you do not care for these children they know that, and if you do care for them they know that too. It is very easy to really level with the kids and say: "Look, here is an area where I think you can decide what you want to do," and in this other area I can decide it is something I must reserve to myself. That is fairly easy. I direct the kids, but they choose how they want to approach the problem themselves.

I think you have to try to get the children to do as much as possible themselves. If they learn something themselves they will remember it. If I teach something to them they are not going to necessarily remember it. So it is a case of straining to get the kids to be as independent as possible first in a classroom situation, then in the hall, then in the yard, and, hopefully, outside.

The Chairman: You attempt to do that?

Mrs. Feldbrill: Yes.

Senator Carter: In a school of this type is there any special activity that emerges as a particular favourite, any particular subject that emerges as a particular favourite?

Mrs. Laski: Phys. Ed. is a very popular subject with the kids.

Senator Carter: On page 6, recommendation #2 is: "Improved training for educators, teachers, consultants and administrators".

Now, for educators and teachers in what area is improvement required?

Mr. Sinclair: Generally I would say in all areas. Our teacher training is only a one-year period. I feel it should be a minimum of three. However, the particular areas that I would stress would be knowledge of child development as being very fundamental; secondly, how to adapt what the educator feels is necessary, as far as education is concerned, to what the child can do; and how to promote development from there.

Senator Carter: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Senator McGrand, please.

Senator McGrand: I have a few questions. Someone, I believe, mentioned that more confidence should be placed in the welfare recipients ability to manage his own affairs. That is what I gathered, anyway. It may have been you that made that statement, Mrs. Feldbrill.

Mrs. Feldbrill: Yes.

Senator McGrand: I wonder if anyone has ever made a clinical study of an individual, starting with his youth and going up to the present time, of an individual with a family and who is on relief, so you could assess his capability for managing his own affairs?

You just cannot say to a person of 45 who is on relief, "You are not capable of managing your affairs" or "You are capable of managing them" until you have made, I would say, a clinical study of that person over a number of years. Has that been done; do you know?

In order to try to understand the magnitude of this thing called poverty and what can be done about it in the future, it seems to me that a lot of clinical examination must be done to assess these people's potential for looking after themselves and managing their own affairs. Does anyone know of any such type of study ever having been done?

Mrs. Feldbrill: I would go along with you on the necessity of that. I think that it is wrong for someone from the outside to make all the decisions on behalf of the person who is going to be affected by those decisions, so it is unrealistic suddenly, without something taking place beforehand, to thrust the total decision on this person who has not really had a chance to realize what it all means.

You see, so many of them have reached such a state of despondency, despair and hopelessness that in a sense they have given up. That does not mean that they have not the potential to do something about it if they felt there was a chance for them to do it.

I think what helps them to feel there is a chance is if you approach them and say, "Look, this is how I understand it; how do you understand it? Maybe we can get together on this. Maybe between my sharing my feelings with you and you sharing your feelings with me we can come up with something so that I am satisfied and you are satisfied", he "me" being society at large and the "you" being the person who is affected by it.

So often we say, "Well, look, you are kind of really not just as smart as all that," or "You really don't know what it is all about, and I will tell you what you want." The end result is that they say, "You don't know what I want and I am not going to let you tell me".

Senator McGrand: The way we have treated the Indians, for example.

Mrs. Feldbrill: Exactly. I think time and time again, with the best of intentions, communities have put a lot of money into a project that has fizzled because it did not really answer what the people were looking for.

Senator McGrand: Do you know of any case though, going back to what I asked, do you know of any people who have had their histories clinically examined? You know, if a person is mentally ill or goes to a mental health clinic his whole clinical and personal history from childhood on is gone into. They look at his whole past. Do you know of anyone who has ever had his past analyzed clinically in order that you could assist him in some way? If it has not been done I hope somebody does it.

Mrs. Felbrill: No, I do not think there has been any such study made, none that I am aware of anyway. However, I do know of many upper and middle-class people who have been unable to manage their affairs but, because they have money, it has just been covered up. I know of many, many welfare recipients who are very able to manage their affairs, very able indeed.

Another point is that many of these poor people are not aware of their rights. I know of a family, and I do not want to refer to the details, who do not know their rights, and they are sometimes taken, if I may use that expression.

What I am trying to say is that, sure, there are people among the welfare recipients who may not be able to manage their affairs but I do not think that that is peculiar to this particular group. I think that is true of the whole of society. On the other hand, I know of many, many welfare recipients who are very able to manage their affairs and make very wise decisions and yet are not given a chance to do so.

Senator McGrand: If a group of those people were placed together, say 40 or 50 of them, and had assistance from outside, were given a certain amount of money and let find out the best way of spending it, do you think that would work? Has that been done?

Mr. Quinn: Could I just say a word about this, if I may, Mr. Chairman?

The Chairman: Certainly.

Mr. Quinn: Two things. One of the problems that I see is the concept, which is rather a pioneer concept, of Canadians—maybe Americans have it too, but certainly Canadians have it—and it is this image of the self-made man. Now, I came from a very modest part of this country and had very modest means. I guess in looking at it from some other people's point of view I was a poor boy.

The things that enabled me to get to this table today were people, people who helped me, people who helped me when I needed help. So I think this idea of the self-made man often hinders us in our society from giving what I would call appropriate help. And I think most of us need help at some point in our lives.

The second aspect of this thing is that you may have heard about the NBC—I think it was the NBC—doing quite an intensive study of what was happening about poverty in the United States. Very briefly, I got this message out of it. It was a documentary that ran about two hours. They showed the scene across the United States. The story went something like this, that really all of the major measures, the so called welfare measures, that the United States had used had failed—not were failing, but had failed.

The only hopeful signs that they saw seemed to be in areas where they were enabling people to go to work, where such people were assured of an income, and, along with this income, a right to work. As it was assumed they could not do this on their own they were given all kinds of support. I hesitate to mention the companies, but Chrysler was one of the companies involved that participated in it. Ford Motor Company was another. There probably were others that I have forgotten. Here were cases that they cited that had been second and third generation welfare cases where suddenly they were becoming participants, they were becoming responsible citizens, and they were able to manage their own affairs with certain help.

Mrs. Feldbrill: That is why I would suggest that they be included in the decision-making process and the decisions not be made on their behalf. I don't think either extreme at this point would be appropriate.

Senator McGrand: That is why I mentioned having 40 or 50 in a group with a little advice from the outside and helping them to make their own decisions.

Now, I have one question as to something you mentioned earlier in your brief on page 15. You say:

These children come to school sorely equipped to benefit from what could be called a standard educational programme. They tend not to trust adults. They fear new experiences. They are not motivated towards academic learnings. They settle differences by physical rather than verbal means. They are explosive in behaviour. They are not adequately rested or fed. Their language and intellectual development is retarded. Their experiences have been narrow and few.

Is it just the unknown they are afraid of? Everybody is a little bit afraid of the unknown. Is it the fear that everyone has or do they have something built in from a knowledge of their own families' poverty?

Mr. Sinclair: I would agree with that, yes. There is a fear of failure. And this has come through their own experience. I think part of our job is to produce a kind of secure environment where the child feels safe enough to take a chance.

Senator McGrand: There is only one other question I want to ask you. You mention at page 17:

Although 60 to 70 per cent of the school population may stay during a school year, the other 30 to 40 per cent are in constant motion.

I wonder, in a place like Toronto, where people have lived in an area for a good deal of their lives, who have become almost part of their environment, why do they move? They are not like working people who move from job to job, leave a job in Toronto because they have a job in Vancouver. Do they move from this area to another rundown area on their own? Why do they move?

There are about 450 transfers each year referred to here in the brief. Does the move from one part of the city to another help those children or does it make them worse? You have mentioned that here, so I thought I would pursue it. You mention that it is a nagging problem.

Mr. Sinclair: Could I speak to the last part of your question? I think the fact that the children move so often has a very negative effect on their education and on our ability to help the children. Quite often you will have a group of children where we have just set up a situation for them to be helped by various agencies as well as by the school, and the next day they will be gone.

Senator McGrand: Would the change of environment do them no good, the fact that they move out of a static environment here to another part of the city where the environment be a little different?

Mr. Sinclair: I am thinking of the number of times they move rather than a particular move.

Senator McGrand: Why is it that they move?

Mrs. Feldbrill: In most instances they move, and I am quoting something that somebody said to me, "I move from one dump to another."

Senator McGrand: But why do they move?

Mrs. Feldbrill: Well, sometimes their house is demolished and they have to move. Sometimes they may live in a house where the doors don't hang properly, and they move out to something that is a little bit better. They find after a few months of living in a particular place there is something wrong with it and so they move on to another spot. And so it goes. Or they get moved out into the Ontario housing complexes. Some of them are away out, a hundred miles from nowhere. There they feel lost. They are not aware of the community around them. The familiar spots are gone and they are unhappy and they move again. And so the story goes.

There is no feeling of belonging anywhere because there are so few of their needs that are met. They feel their existence in that community is temporary. They feel, "Why should I stay here forever? I am just suffering." So they look for greener fields. However, these greener fields are not available to them.

The Chairman: They have nothing to escape to.

Mrs. Feldbrill: That's right, Mr. Chairman. It is unbelievable, some of the housing conditions, simply unbelievable.

The Chairman: Do you think that our society has the technology but we fail along the way, and we are therefore as a result in the state we find ourselves today?

Mr. Quinn: Right.

Mrs. Feldbrill: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Not only in Canada but around the world.

Mr. Quinn: Yes.

Mrs. Feldbrill: Sometimes where there is running water it runs so that they cannot control it. Often there is no hot water. And there is really no cooking stove often. It is unbelievable sometimes the conditions in which people live and this is why they move.

Mr. Quinn: I was just going to add one little point about this business of mobility, that we made a study here. The one bit of firm evidence that we were able to establish was that there was a direct relationship between the number of moves that a child makes in the course of a year and his achievement in school.

Senator McGrand: It drops with the more moves?

Mr. Quinn: Right. The more moves they make the poorer they do in school.

Senator McGrand: You see businessmen making good moves or poor moves, depending on their ability to make a good judgment I imagine these people, for the most part, are weak on business decisions. Perhaps they are always searching for something better. You know the story of the dog that dropped the bone to grab at the one that looked better. Is that the sort of thing it is?

Mr. Quinn: That is possible.

Senator McGrand: That is why I would like to see a study of some of these people. Although I am not too strong on some of these textbook definitions, at the same time I would like to see a clinical examination made of a number of people who have been on welfare for a number of years and find out what they were like when they were in their teens and what they are like now in their middle age.

Mr. Quinn: We know by history, don't we, since the beginning of man, that poverty promotes poverty, perpetuates poverty. We know this. We also know that mankind up until now, any place in the world that I know of anyway, has not cured poverty. So we do know some things about it. I think that in our society you have to say that the dollar bill is one of the most significant things. Money is what enables us to do things.

Now, of course, to get money you have to have talent, you have to have ability, you have to have skills. But if you have that money you have power. And so I am saying really that—and I am thinking of older people here—if in fact you can put them in a situation where they can participate in this kind of society, our money society, and where you can make some kind of contribution to get it, how you get this person that we are talking about involved.

The Chairman: Isn't it a fact also that the lack of money remains with certain poverty-level families generation after generation?

Mr. Quinn: That's right. You see, my father saw education as the means whereby his children would be able to make it because he had to go to work when he was, what, ten years old. You know, he was an Irish immigrant. And so he really wanted to see his children have a chance at this thing that made it possible to participate.

Senator McGrand: I think the philosophy was that, "I want my children to earn their living easier than I am earning mine". They told me that so often.

Mr. Quinn: There was a lot of that. And richly, not just easier, but richly. As it turns out, I think I work harder than my father did.

The Chairman: Senator Pearson, please.

Senator Pearson: First I want to say that the tour of this school was an eye-opener to me. I have never seen anything like it. The children are in cheerful surroundings. There is all sorts of colour to draw their attention and to entertain them, which is something different than the ordinary little academic schools they go to where they sit in rows and the teacher thumps them on the head if they move around or talk too much. This has certainly been an eye-opener to me.

The first question I would like to put is: At what stage do they go into or advance to regular academic education? That is, do they stay in Grade VII or Grade VIII? Or when do they arrive at the stage of going into straight academic studying?

Miss Sigurjonsson: That is what they are doing as they are moving around the classroom; they are reading, spelling, learning all the time. The process of learning is taking place.

Mr. Quinn: I brought along a model, and I am sorry it is not finished, but this is a conceptual model to enable a child to develop, to enable him to mature and to grow.

You see, what we are really saying, I think, is, and you correct me if I am wrong, Miss Sigurjonson, what we are saying is that the child is the curriculum, and all of these other things that we have been talking about all these years, like reading, writing, arithmetic and so on, are merely vehicles to enable him to become a participant in society. And society is people. We have to learn how to deal with people. So the child is at the centre of this model that we have. And we use the community's skills, reading, writing, numbers, and so on, really as vehicles for him to get so he can deal with other people in groups and singly.

That is why you get this feeling of warmth, and I am delighted to hear you say that you got that feeling coming in from outside because this is what we are striving for. We think we have it. If we have that we think these other things will happen.

As Miss Sigurjonsson says, we are doing these things right now. We hope we will do it much more easily with this type of environment.

The Chairman: How about when they go home, what happens there?

Miss Sigurjonsson: They go home and play mathematics games and measuring games. That is fun; that is great.

The Chairman: It is much better than the old system certainly.

Senator Pearson: You start to involve the parents in this. You have no report cards at the end of the month, so you involve the parents and get them here to talk over with them the individual pupils. This is quite an effort on your part, isn't it, to have a talk every month—or is it twice a year or something like that?

Mr. Sinclair: Twice a year.

Senator Pearson: Twice a year you have to talk to the parents about the children. How do you promote these children? Individually, or by classes or groups or how?

Mr. Sinclair: In a very general way the children are placed in classrooms by age rather than achievement.

Senator Pearson: And they move along?

Mr. Sinclair: Yes.

Senator Pearson: What about those who are a little slower in learning than others, who are not up to the qualifications of the others in the group?

Mr. Sinclair: I think one of the teachers could answer that more adequately than I.

Miss Draper: Each child is taken on with the idea that it is not a matter of most of the children moving on and one or two or three not keeping up. Each child is either grouped with others approximately at his level or, if that is not possible, they are taught individually in order to bring them along at their own age. So in Grade III you might have some reading at Grade I level, some at Grade II, some at Grade III and even some at Grade IV. It is no easy job. That is why we need small classrooms in order to do it.

The Chairman: You teach at their own ability?

Miss Draper: Yes.

Senator Pearson: You improve the children here in school. They are learning a little all the time. Do they take this home to their own parents? You say they come here with very poor vocabularies. You say they just do not know how to talk English or French or whatever it is. Do the children take this home, and do the parents become involved with the children and learn a little themselves from the children?

Miss Draper: Sir, there are many parents here. I wonder if we could ask a question like that of them?

The Chairman: We will do that in a few minutes. We will have an open discussion.

Senator Pearson: Another thing I would like to know, you say you involve the parents and also industry. How do you involve industry in the community? In your brief you state that as one of the recommendations here.

Mr. Quinn: How do you do it?

Senator Pearson: Yes.

Mr. Quinn: Well, I guess we do not really know how to do it, but I think there are some signs. For instance we have an advisory vocational committee that sits on the board of education whose concern it is really to involve industry, especially in relation to the technical and vocational schools. But it could be that we could work through this avenue. It is there. Nobody has done it as yet.

I am thinking in terms of a work study kind of thing for older boys and girls where money is a pretty pressing problem and where maybe you have just got to have some money to continue at school. I can see it as making industry a partner of the school for part of the time, for part of the day or part of the year, from a fairly early age on.

How do you do it I don't know but I think you just have to start working at it. You have to start, I think, interesting industry. I think lots of times industry would be interested. I think we could work it out.

Senator Pearson: You could work it out possibly with certain pupils that industry might be interested in as future employees.

Mr. Quinn: That's right.

Senator Pearson: And they might become interested in that way.

Mr. Quinn: And where they would learn also about the world of work.

Senator Pearson: Yes.

Mr. Quinn: And all of the great possibilities that are out there. With my own children, and I think I know quite a bit about the world of work, when they ask me, "What am I going to take, what course am I going to take in university?" I then find out how little I really know about the world of work. It is expanding at such a rapid rate I find it very difficult to keep track of it. If I am not reading and communicating and talking, looking, I am going to have a pretty narrow view of what is out there.

Senator Pearson: Some of these service clubs that the young business executives are in could do the job very nicely, coming down here to the school and giving you a little help with that sort of thing.

Mr. Quinn: Yes.

Senator Pearson: Thank you.

Mr. Quinn: And they do.

Mrs. Laski: That is with the older children, the junior high anyway.

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow, please.

Senator Sparrow: You mention in the brief, and I do not know the page now, the matter of 30 students to a teacher. Were you talking about a teacher-student ratio?

Mr. Sinclair: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: How does that compare with the regular school system?

Mr. Quinn: In the City of Toronto I think it is 32.5.

Senator Sparrow: 32.5?

Mr. Laughlin: That is in a regular school as opposed to 30 in an inner city school. This is really not a student-teacher ratio. There are a couple of concepts in connection with this term. If you are thinking of the number of children to one teacher in one class, it is 30 in the inner city and 32.5 in other schools.

Senator Sparrow: This is per class per teacher?

Mr. Laughlin: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: What does that break down into as a ratio of the total?

Mr. Laughlin: Well, it is much lower than that. That is, the ratio takes into consideration the other people in the building.

Senator Sparrow: Yes, the library and so on?

Mr. Laughlin: The library, guidance and such. We haven't an exact figure on that, have we?

Mr. Quinn: No. I don't know it anyway.

Mr. Laughlin: In the senior public school we take it as 19.5 but there are certain additions, so I could not give you an exact figure. It would be much lower than that 30 however. In the senior public schools it would probably be in the lower 20s, maybe about 21. In the junior school it could be 25, when we take into consideration the guidance personnel and so on.

I was noticing that Mrs. Laski said the children were interested in physical education as one of their chief interests. The reason that we have a full-time physical education instructor in this school, I think, is to give top leadership to boys and girls in that respect, and it is very successful. Do you agree?

Mrs. Laski: I think that is a subject that most kids like, so overall that is the most popular one. Of course, some other kids might particularly like mathematics rather than physical education.

The Chairman: I'm sorry, would you make your answers short because I find that time is fleeing.

Senator Sparrow: Could I then ask these couple of quick questions? Mr. Sinclair, what physical area do these children come from, what districts? Do some come farther than they would normally when going to a school?

Mr. Sinclair: No, it is just this immediate area.

Senator Sparrow: How do you actually determine which children will come to this school and which ones will not?

Mr. Sinclair: The school board sets boundaries for each school.

Senator Sparrow: Are the students in this school then all from the lower socio-economic level, or are there some from affluent families?

Mr. Sinclair: I would say that there are very, very few affluent families in this area.

Mr. Quinn: It is a neighbourhood school, the concept of the neighbourhood school being that there are boundaries, say, at Yonge Street, that run east to, well, whatever it is, and go to the north and south as well. In other words, all the children in this area come to this school.

Senator Sparrow: They all have to come to this school?

Mr. Sinclair: Yes, supporters of the public school system.

Mrs. Feldbrill: Unless they go to the separate school system.

Senator Sparrow: In other words, the parents have no choice unless they are in the separate school system?

Mrs. Feldbrill: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: Is there a stigma attached to a school such as this, as to the children and as to the parents?

Mr. Quinn: Well, we would hope not. On the contrary, we would hope that the kind of feedback that I am getting is general. I am getting this mainly from the north end of the city: "Why can't we have what the downtown schools have?" This is one way of assessing the feeling. It may not be a very good one. However, it does give you some kind of feedback.

Really, from our point of view, we think that all children are entitled to it since there are probably varying needs, but in terms of providing priorities we have to put our money here first where the needs are greater, more pressing.

Now, as to the matter of stigma, this is a problem. We have to be very careful how we talk about this.

Senator Sparrow: Yes.

Mr. Quinn: We cannot defeat ourselves. If we believe that this concept of having an individual is the most important thing, then we cannot destroy the concept of the people who have to live here by talking about it in such a way that it does destroy them. So, as I say, we have to be very careful. We are talking about "compensating", but then we also assume that all human beings to some extent must have some compensatory kinds of procedures available to them. It is greater here. Does that answer you?

Senator Sparrow: Yes, I think that answers it very well.

Mr. Sinclair: In your remarks, did you suggest that you were not familiar or there had been no studies done on the causes of poverty in the school area? You really cannot tell us today the causes of this poverty in your area, can you?

Mr. Sinclair: This area, which is in the Don planning area, which is a larger area, has been studied intensively and there is a report out this week from our Metropolitan Toronto Planning Board, but I don't know if that studies the causes so much as what it looks like.

Senator Sparrow: Mr. Chairman, could we get a copy of that report then? Could we make a note to have a copy of that report for our files?

The Chairman: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: And I would like personally to have a copy of it, if I could.

The Chairman: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: Might I ask one further question: Is there a breakdown of the parents in the school, and you must have done this, like the number that are one-parent families, a breakdown as to whether the family head is a man or woman? Is there a higher proportion of one-parent families?

Mr. Sinclair: I could not answer that with any degree of accuracy.

The Chairman: Mrs. Feldbrill?

Mr. Feldbrill: No, I don't think we have made a study of that. Also there are common-law relationships too, so that we are not too clear, you know, as to whether they are single-parent families or two-parent families. And situations change.

Senator Sparrow: You don't then how many of the working poor would constitute your parents?

Mrs. Feldbrill: The question of whether a family is on welfare or not, when the child comes to register, never gets raised, so this is not something that we are specifically looking for when a child comes to the school. I mean, this kind of information is not something we specifically look for.

Senator Sparrow: The question was asked as to backgrounds by Senator McGrand, as to the background of the parent as such. I think in the education system it is rather important to know what the problems in the family itself are, and I would think you could be much more helpful to a student if you knew it was a one-parent family. Is that correct?

Mrs. Feldbrill: Well, we do know it if there are problems that present themselves at school and we start exploring some of the reasons for the problems. These things become evident. And we know about the total school population in very general terms. We don't know it in any very specific sense. Do you know what I mean?

Senator Sparrow: Yes.

Mrs. Feldbrill: When a child has problems in school we do go into this because we feel they are factors that could contribute to the disturbance but we do not seek it out at the point of the admission of the child to the school.

Senator Sparrow: Thank you, Mrs. Feldbrill. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Well, ladies and gentlemen of the panel, our time has gone over by almost 15 minutes. We have to be out of here at 15 minutes to four. We have only a few minutes left. We would like to hear from at least one parent. Does any parent have any questions he or she wishes to ask? We do not usually allow that, but in this case we will.

Does any parent wish to make any suggestion?

Mrs. W. Silman, Central Neighbourhood House, Toronto: Would you like to hear from me, Mr. Chairman?

The Chairman: Well, perhaps not a long speech, but certainly any questions you may have.

Mrs. Silman: I am from Central Neighbourhood House, and I am the director of the nursing school. In the nursing school we take children from $2\frac{1}{2}$ to 6 years of age. We will try to have an assessment made of them but we do not call them retarded until after they are assessed, so that any child is welcome.

Most of the families involved are on mother's allowance and welfare. They are subsidized by the city and so there is no fee. However, when the working poor ask what the fee is, it is on a sliding scale. And if they have to pay 25c. or more, it is almost out of their reach.

We find there is the problem of the provision of services, that there is no place for them to go after we get them evaluated.

We also prepare them to come to this school, Duke of York, and we co-operate with Duke of York. The exodus that went out of here a short time ago was not because the meeting was boring; it was because the staff was needed in respect of a certain program.

As to the other question of this chap who was asking about the ratio of working parents and single parents, in the nursery school we find 50 per cent single parents and 50 per cent parents who are common law, married or have various living situations.

There was another question that another gentleman to his left, Senator McGrand, asked about enabling programs. We would like to have "day care" for parents so they could learn home-making or housekeeping before you give them increased money to spend because when they get the increased money to spend it is going to be taken off them by the landlords who are giving them poor housing to start with. Immediately their rents would go up. That would be the first thing. If they could learn to keep house and get moved into something nice and enjoy the amenities of better housing, better homes, it is possible that they will move out to another district.

By homemaking I also mean their social relationships with their neighbours. They have to learn these things. And if we could have such programs it would take care of a great deal of the problem. The thing we find in the Neighbourhood House is that we are poor, we are in poverty too, and we are working in poverty; we need more assistance in this area to help from the infants' level up to school age, in order to help the school.

Senator Sparrow: Is there a parent-teacher association here?

Mr. Sinclair: As such, no.

Senator Sparrow: Have the parents or teachers tried to form one and could not do it?

Mr. Sinclair: We tried one. It was successful for a short period of time and then deteriorated over a two-year period and now it has been disbanded. It seems an inappropriate kind of organization for this school. We are looking for other types, though.

The Chairman: Mr. Sinclair, members of the group, we are most grateful for the way you have answered the questions. We know you are a highly skilled group of people who deal with education in a most dedicated fashion.

I would like to say too, like my colleague Senator Pearson, that, having visited your school, we are still somewhat shocked by what we have seen. We are taking away with us a good memory and we are going to talk about it as we travel around.

Thank you very kindly, Mr. Sinclair, for your courtesy. We certainly believe that you have built a foundation on which there can be built up something that will be a great asset to future generations. We have the new generation coming along now, and we are trying to solve its problems. The committee does not feel the problems will be solved overnight, of course. It is a big undertaking. We realize that there are an awful lot of people involved in it now, more than we ever thought we would find. We are finding a lot of things are lacking, as was mentioned, such as trying to unify everybody in the various groups. I think we have found in Toronto here you have about 40 groups that are trying to do something to help, and everybody is working on their own without knowing what the neighbour is doing.

We have found out long ago that there was varying cooperation between the municipal, provincial and federal levels of government, but much more is needed. A great deal of pioneering is going to be required with people sitting around tables and trying to find out what they can do. We would like to find out of course as much as we can in order to alleviate the problems in this field.

Without saying anything more, we certainly appreciate your brief. I might say that I was a teacher for 15 years, so I have some interest in this field of education. And, of course, we have the old school inspector over here, Senator Carter.

Now, members of the panel, our next brief is one presented by Mr. Jim Steele, Advisory Chairman of the Neighbourhood Youth Corps. You have all had a chance to read Mr. Steele's brief, which is not very long, although very interesting. We are not going to ask Mr. Steele to read it again to us, but only to comment upon it and then we will have a question period after.

I see that we are a little behind time but I think we can still make it up. We will be having another brief after this.

So, Mr. Steele, the floor is yours.

Mr. J. Steele, Advisory Chairman, Neighbourhood Youth Corps: Mr. Chairman, senators, ladies and gentlemen, I would like to talk basically about why we are in existence, what we are, and what we try to do. As suggested, the Neighbourhood Youth Corps is a group of young people from the downtown area and all across Metro who are involved in community service, in making the community a better place in which to live and to grow up.

We have no fancy philosophies. We just go out and do what we can, what we feel should be done for and with people. Over the years we have provided places to study for youngsters, tutorial assistance, mainly on a one to two or three or four basis, where the youngster becomes a friend of the volunteer rather than the volunteer becoming an authoritarian figure, dealing mainly with school work.

The youngster and the volunteer are free, with parental permission, to leave the premises to do things together. I think this is very important with a youngster coming from a large family grouping, the opportunity to get his personal type of attention is just not there. A mother or father can only spread their love so far.

The only thing we ask of a volunteer is that they do not come along with the lady bountiful approach, "Here I am; you are lucky I am here". It must be on a personal friendship basis. Respect of the dignity of the youngsters and the finding of common interests must occur.

Our other programs for the youngsters include writing in the summer to many weeklies and dailies throughout Ontario, getting the children out of the city onto farms and with families in small towns. It includes weekly happenings for children, we say on a personal basis, but last Saturday, through the co-operation of Famous Players, we took 3,000 children to see Hansel and Gretel at the Imperial Theatre, which is an experience for youngsters, and in these days and times experiences such as that are not all that prevalent.

We have a corner lot program in the summer where we go out into the community. You might compare it to detached worker's type of approach where we go onto streets, help clear vacant lots, set up programs with the children, and the parents participate in these programs.

We are concerned with starting to work with the youngsters at age 6 or 7 and continuing to work with them until they are in senior high school and then we say to these young persons, "We would like you to become involved in your own community". Otherwise, if it is just a case of coming in, whether we are using local people or out-of-the-community people, doing something and then dropping the youngster at any time during the year, I think we're doing more harm than good.

Our programs operate 52 weeks of the year for the needs of people, particularly youngsters, are just as crucial in the summer when schools are closed and many programs such as ours cease to operate as during any other period of the year, and in some instances are more crucial.

We feel that in working with youngsters at an early age and continuing to work with them and building their self-esteem, motivating them, respecting their dignity, that something does happen to the youngsters. And there is an increase—I don't think it is attributable to us, but we are part of it—there is a small increase in youngsters continuing further in high school. X number are going on to university. This is not as important really as the fact the youngster feels important and does become a person able to cope with the problems he is going to meet every day.

In turn we also are involved with old people, senior citizens. In this area I would like to say that the rapport that goes on between the TEE (Toronto Educational Encouragement) and the older person is something we had missed the boat on previously. It is marvellous; it is fantastic. My generation sitting in the middle says that the old are senile and the young do not know what they are doing. We are sort of like God; we know all he answers. However, we find that the old, in coming in contact with the young, are very understanding, and the young certainly bring into the lives of the old people a release.

If you are in an old persons' home, or in rooms, there is a sense of loneliness. In an old persons' home you can only hear repeated the same stories over and over again so many times before those stories almost drive you up the wall, and this is one of the reasons that we bring the young and old together.

The young will have social evenings for the old. They will give up Christmas Day at home and have a dinner for the old. They will have sessions where they will go in and clean walls, stoves, etc., with the old, and do things that an older person cannot do when he is all crippled up with arthritis and things of that nature.

It might be compared, anything we do, probably with the old-fashioned type of barn-raising, where the community joined in to help one another. There is none of this fancy business of "If we do not have the funds we don't do it". There is none of this, "If we don't have the wonderful facility, nothing is going to happen." You can make things happen in a barn if you have the right type of people. And it is my feeling that we have too much of the studying of problems of people, that we are involved in sophisticated answers, giving sophisticated answers to questions, but we cannot do anything because the funds are not available.

Each five to ten years sees a group of youngsters not necessarily go down the drain but become harder to reach if we do not start to work with them when they are younger and continue to work with them. Whether it is youngsters in the community, or our own families, if we have a gap, if our youngsters are cute as kittens and we play with them and do things with them when they are young and then at the awkward age of 11 to 15, when you cannot give them little kiddy things to do and you cannot give them all the liberties you give the 17s and 18s, we forget the youngsters in this age bracket, and all of a sudden, whether it is our own families or others in the community, we try to rectify this at 17 or 18. But that gap of 11 to 15 has destroyed many youngsters, whether in affluent areas or in low income areas.

You must have a continuity of belonging, awareness of the fact that you are capable of doing something, with no gaps along the line. You must not be pushed aside. When you push somebody aside, whether it is an adult or a child, there is a sense of not belonging and this sometimes does damage that just cannot be repaired in latter years.

I respect what is happening in the Duke of York school, but I do wish that more schools had this type of program. I also believe that there are people in our downtown community and all across Metro who do want to become involved in making the community this better place, but my generation again, the middle one, whether it be a principal of a school or a clergyman, they do not seem to want to give the younger persons a chance to become involved.

As I have mentioned in the brief, for a summer program we recruited 55 young people at a dance to carry on that summer program. And yet if you write a letter sometimes you will get a reply back from a person my age saying, "Our young people are so busy carrying food for the poor, their energy is expended. We cannot ask them to do any more." All they are doing is going to the cupboard and dragging a few tins out or mother gives them $3 and they whip down to the Dominion Store and buy a few goodies and give it all out at Christmas and the rest of the year things can go to the devil.

But if you give these young people an opportunity and talk to them, they do become involved. And we would have far less problems, I believe, with drugs and things of this nature if people felt that they could contribute something to the community and they were able to do this without road blocks being put in their way.

I do feel that government programs will not be a reality for a great number of years. I feel quite strongly, and the committee may not agree with me, that a guaranteed income is not the answer to everybody's problems. Most certainly all of the Eatons or E. P. Taylors, etc., are not coping, although they have oodles of money. I know instances where additional money would represent the difference between just existing and living. I know other cases where it is a little bit deeper than that.

I think we have to become very personal in any dealings we have with people. I think while we are waiting for the government to take action the private sector must become concerned, must do something—people for themselves and people for other people.

If we do not do this I don't know what will happen. You would have to be a mystic to say whether we would have the same problems as the United States has. I really do not know. However, I do feel that the private sector, be it churches, service clubs, individuals, must take a stand and must go out into the community and become involved because I have lived in a downtown area for eight years and I look upon the kids and the old people and parents as my friends, and when you see them being destroyed by inaction, when you see really lovable youngsters that you have started to work with in Grade II or Grade III and who have drifted away for some reason or another from a program and you meet the same youngster at age 12 or 13 and they really have problems, you just feel that if something had been done, if there were enough people—let's forget the money, which is nice, let's forget the wonderful buildings—but if there were enough people to create this sense of belonging I think their problems would be a lot less.

I do not like the use of the word "class", and I only heard it once today—middle class, lower class and upper class. I would rather use the word "income" as it applies to upper, middle or lower incomes, because people I consider first class people often have the most meagre of incomes. They are concerned with their neighbours, they are active in the community, and to me they are first-class people.

In addition, I think we have to get away from terms such as this lovely one, "culture deprivation", which I think is for the birds because some of the more interested children of 6, 7 or 8 come from the lower income groups. They are interested in things. They do a lot of things for themselves. In some instances they have even assumed what might be considered almost adult responsibilities. However, as time goes on this is destroyed because we do not do enough for and with them.

There is a lot to be done and time is not on the side of our communities. It just isn't. We just cannot say that we will get a study done and wait for it to be implemented. If you will remember, six or seven years ago we spent hundreds of thousands of dollars on the Committee on Youth, Syl Apps' Committee on Youth, and there was a lovely big book made up, and nothing has happened since that time. Maybe the odd thing was implemented, but nothing really substantial.

Let us get away from the studies. The studies are for the birds. You can study what you are doing, evaluate what you are doing, but you have to do something. I think this is the important factor, to be doing something.

I spent two summers in Harlem in New York City doing volunteer work for short periods, and the one thing those people hated was to be studied by the Carnegie Foundation, the Ford Foundation, the John F. Kennedy Foundation, any foundation that would hand out the dollars. People—and I don't like the expression "go down the drain"—but this is what happens while we are doing studies.

If somebody gets fat and I use the word "fat cat", if somebody gets a lovely amount of money for doing a study and knows darn well there isn't much change of implementing it, I would rather see somebody spend a lot of money implementing something and a smaller amount of dollars evaluating or studying it. I think that is the more practical way of approaching problems in this field.

I do hope, Senator Fournier, that, as a result of your committee's deliberations and your travels, one of your recommendations will be for pilot projects—I don't like the expression "pilot projects"—for things to happen immediately. Let us not make a lot of recommendations that are nice and should be done but that will take time, and which austerity and all the rest will be used as an excuse to delay. My friends, the children, are being destroyed. I don't like it. I don't assume their parents like it. We have to act now.

The Chairman: Well, isn't it a pilot project that we have in this school here? Would you call it a pilot project?

Mr. Steele: I would say a pilot project that has been going on for four to five years and there not, to my knowledge, having been the full implementing of everything that is here in another school is carrying on a pilot project just too long. I am not knocking the board. We do not give them the money to do it. But how long is a pilot project? I mean, I can multiply the number of kids in this school 20 or 30 times by kids who need the same thing but are not getting it.

As to a pilot project, is there a limitation to it? Or should the word be "showplace" rather than "pilot project"? I mean, the board wants to start other programs but the money is not there.

Senator McGrand: The pilot project has served its purpose as a demonstration though, hasn't it?

Mr. Steele: But if nothing comes out of it, if the money is not there at the municipal level, then I would bypass the constitution and all the rest of it and say it should come from the provincial, federal or private sources for a project such as this.

Meanwhile if a pilot project such as this goes on for six years we have lost a group of kids on the other side of Parliament Street. In all fairness to the board, we should give them the money for the same thing here to be done in other schools.

The Chairman: We talk about pilot project here, and it had been going on for 6 or 7 kind you are not exactly sure of what you are doing. This is why you are calling it a pilot project. You do this today because if it does not work you find something else tomorrow, and you build it up because if you have the knowledge and the know-how to start tomorrow morning on a course which you knew was right, you know, as we all do, that there are not too many people in that category. I think we build these things up on a trial and error basis, which I might agree with you sometimes takes too long.

Mr. Steele: The point that has not been brought out today is that the Duke of York project is based on the Higher Horizon school in New York City, which I visited at the same time as Bill Quinn, who originated this project here, and it had been going on for 6 or 7 years before that.

The Chairman: Is that in the Harlem section?

Mr. Steele: That is in the Harlem section in the Bronx. Therefore the pilot project, if you want to take the American version of it, which has been transplanted here to a degree, has been round ten years, not four.

The Chairman: Thank you. I am satisfied. Before we start with questions we have another gentleman, a Mr. Samuel Rotenberg who had had something to do with this area from whom we would like to hear.

Mr. Samuel Rotenberg: There were a number of things mentioned there by the senator. There is the question of why do people move? That was a question that was asked by Senator McGrand. I am in an area where the area is being rebuilt. I would like to take the senator privately into a few of these homes to show him just how these people live and why they move.

In some cases there are four or five families living in one house and using the same kitchen with a two-burner plug-in stove, and they have four or five kids. Or, in other cases, you will have a couple living in one room. They will have their fridge, their stove, everything in that one room.

And, you know, when two or three people get drunk on the weekends there is a brawl and the next morning either you get out or you have no place to live. So again you have to move many a time.

Then there are other things. I had a problem myself last month where a couple with five kids were in a house which they had paid rent for and they called the owner, saying the furnace had broken down. The fire department said it was a fire hazard and the building inspector said they could not stay there unless the furnace was repaired. When they called the owner, the owner said, "I don't own this house, I have sold it to somebody else." That somebody else said, "No, I haven't bought that house". So these people were jammed in between. The end result was that nobody wanted to fix the furnace.

Senator McGrand: Who collected the rent?

Mr. Rotenberg: Well, one person did collect the rent. They had already paid the rent to this person. And these people were left in the middle. And, in addition to all that trouble, two of the kids had the mumps. These kids had to get out and go with two friends of the family. And there were three kids left at home with the family. The final result was that they ended up in a basement with five kids.

Now, the last thing that happened to this family was that one of the aldermen said I was going to try to get the money back from the original person that got it. However, they had to get out of there and they are now living in three rooms and paying $200 month rent. Remember, that is $200 for a family that is on welfare. They do not get $200 on welfare. Where they are going to get the money to pay the balance of their living expenses I don't know.

I can show you another example where the people are paying $110 for rent. She and her son, who is a 12-year-old, get $33 for two weeks to live on.

I saw the headline today where you are better off living on welfare than to work in some jobs. I suppose it depends on what the job is and where you work and what you do.

I also see kids, and I showed this to Mr. Steele, and he has seen it at the store, where some of the children for six months or maybe some even all year long, have no shoes but wear running shoes to school or high boots and take them off when they get into school, which was very shocking to me that the teachers or the principal did not take an interest in seeing that there was a kid like that who appeared day after day, week after week, in high boots or running shoes and did not have proper shoes, that they did not report it to the school board or some sort of authority that could give these kids shoes so they were equal to all the other kids.

You were asking what happens, how come these people are in this position, and the senator wanted to know about what happens when these families become unemployed. If you get out of a job and you stay six months on welfare, it is a very tough proposition to go back to work—if you are not working all that time. In my mind I thought many times it would be better and cheaper and in the best interests of the people if we kept them working rather than keep giving them welfare.

These people do not really want welfare because it just destroys them. Their independence and respect go down. They are on welfare so long that even their children come so used to it that every two weeks they just get their money, they live that way, and while the first week they live after a fashion, the second week they have nothing. The first week they live, the second week they starve.

Now, is that what we want for ourselves in this generation? Is this what we expect? I don't think we need an investigation of it. I can show you hundreds of them. I see them every day. I talk to them. I live with them. I deal with them. The first week they are happy; the second week they are sorry. They have to buy from day to day. Every day they have to come in and say, "Well, this is a little too much. This just makes up enough for the meal." That is basically the problem.

I was really surprised to hear the senator asking, "How come that these people are that way? Did we ever have a study to find out why they are that way?"

Senator McGrand: You need not be surprised that I asked the question because I want to know more about where they are seeking jobs, where they move to try to find the promised land. There are hundreds of reasons, and I suppose you have only mentioned about half a dozen of them yet. If you stayed on another hour, you might elaborate on perhaps another seven or eight.

Mr. Rotenberg: Yes. I will say this, that in reality certain times you just don't get a job and certain times you might get one. If you have a family of five or six children and you get from welfare $90-odd for two weeks, say, $180 a month, plus maybe rent and doctors' care, and other things, and you are offered a job which is going to pay less than you are getting on welfare, you cannot afford to take that job.

It would be better for the government to give this family an additional amount of money and say, "Okay, you take this job. We will supply the balance of your needs and keep you on welfare for the rest of your life."

The Chairman: I might say that you are not the first to mention that. You have mentioned it now also.

Mr. Rotenberg: Yes, that was in my mind. And we also have to take a look at why these kids go on sniffing glue and travelling on the streets and stealing and robbing and snatching purses from women, beating up old people to get money. Why? They live in two or three rooms in the sort of conditions I have described. They have no home life. They have no recreation centres. They have nowhere to spend their time. They live on the streets and they live by their wits. This is why we have this situation at the present time.

We have a gang of young people on my street that lives that way day after day because they have no homes where they can live in their houses, spend the evenings with their parents or bring in a friend. How can you bring in a friend when there is no room for him?

Then some of them say, "Do you see any difference in the kids when they come in the morning and they go to school here or they go to the school on Winchester Street?" What difference does it make? A kid is a kid. A child is a child. And a teacher gives his best, no matter whether he teaches in Winchester or Duke of York. I know the teachers and I know all that is possible is being done.

The difference is this, that when a child cannot go to sleep until 12 o'clock at night and a drunk wakes him up in the middle of the night and he goes to school the next morning, how much can he accomplish at school under those conditions?

The Chairman: And often with no breakfast.

Mr. Rotenberg: Yes. That is the question. I sell food in the store and I sell doughnuts at a price that maybe a lot of people don't know, at five cents, which is a hard thing to do nowadays, and I know a lot of these children have their breakfast and their dinner too in my store for a total of ten cents for the day. They don't have their meals at home because there is nothing to eat there. They get a dime, maybe from picking up five empty bottles, and that is how they get the money to eat.

That is the whole sickness that lies in our society. We have to go to the bottom of things and find out why these kids grow up this way. We try to build jails—not try to build them, we have to build jails to put them in—but if we could start at the very beginning and see how these children are brought up and how they live, investigate their home lives, see that they have better educations and better home lives, recreation centres and see that people are taught better so that their language is better, for instance,—what kind of language can a child living on the streets use? I am ashamed to say what they use. Sometimes I go out and say, "You are not allowed to say what you are saying. Is this the only word you know?" They say, "Oh, I'm sorry, I'm sorry", but that is what is happening.

Senator McGrand: With reference to some of what you have said, I understand that there are some 60,000 people a year coming into Toronto from outside. Do many of these migrants come from the maritime provinces?

Mr. Rotenberg: That's right.

Senator McGrand: Of course many of these people move here looking for the promised land.

Mr. Rotenberg: Yes.

Senator McGrand: Have you any experience with my fellow maritimers moving up here?

Mr. Rotenberg: Yes.

Senator McGrand: Could you just give me some idea what their condition is? Have any of them improved very much?

Mr. Rotenberg: I don't think that the maritimer is the one particularly. I have them come from all over Canada and live in my area. I don't think they are any different from anybody else. They are the same people. They look for a job and they are very eager to work as long as you can find them a place to live or they find a place themselves. They take care of their obligations. They pay their bills. They dress well. They have cars if they have the money. They live normal lives like anybody else. I don't think you can distinguish between somebody coming from the maritimes and somebody coming from Quebec. It is all the same type of person.

Senator McGrand: What I would like to know is, they are on welfare, but are they improving their condition? You have no data on that?

Mr. Rotenberg: I doubt whether anybody on welfare can improve themselves. All I can say is that in certain provinces they do not get as much welfare as they do in Toronto. They are taken care of here a little better.

My objection to a lot of these helping hands, to a lot of the organizations we have, is that we have too many organizations, that we should have a more central organization which could help instead of having some 15 or 20 such organizations. Everybody likes to help.

The Chairman: Perhaps it is even as high as 40.

Mr. Rotenberg: Forty, yes, whatever it is. I think we could get these people who mean well and are really interested in helping, that if we can get them together like we have in the case of the United Appeal fund, that we can get these people together and organize one big organization.

The Chairman: May I say something in that respect? I think we have found out that you have a great number of organizations in Toronto, in Montreal, and other large centres

Now, perhaps I would like to ask you this question: Are you of the opinion that this last five years people have become more conscious of poverty?

Ten years ago I don't think anybody paid too much attention to poverty, but in the last five years, and I think this is the result of the 40 organizations you have in Toronto, people have become more conscious of poverty. They are trying to do something. They have not solved the problem by a long shot because, as you say, you have a group of people working on this side of the street, and another group working on the other side of the street not knowing one another, but all working in the same direction. Do you agree with that?

Mr. Rotenberg: I don't think so. I don't think, knowing the factors, that there is more poverty now or that they know more about it because there are more organizations. I would feel that help might be granted to people who need help in a better fashion if there were one or two organizations or central bodies with branches in certain areas.

I want to tell you that most things happen usually at night. You will see a lot of kids doing things at night. A lot of fires happen at night. People need help late at night. I have people come into the store at 11 o'clock and say, "My kids have not eaten all day. I would like some bread or milk." I say, "Look, it is 11 or 12 o'clock at night. You had all day. Why didn't you tell me at 10 o'clock even that your children had not eaten all day? Why did you wait until 12 o'clock?" Then they so often say, "Oh, I thought maybe I could get it from the neighbours," or they say, "My husband, I thought, would come home and bring something with him"; there are all kinds of excuses.

If we could get a central organization which could operate in divisions and which could have central management we could get this help much sooner and better than having all these organizations taking up so much time and energy and money, because it costs money today to operate them. There is no doubt about that. Then the government would know just exactly where the money goes and for what purpose it is put instead of having, say, 40 organizations, as you say, and each one trying to do a bit.

The Chairman: Then you recommend that the various varieties of organizations should be combined into a few?

Mr. Rotenberg: If we could do that, yes.

The Chairman: Senator Carter?

Senator Carter: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I am very interested in the gap which Mr. Steele referred to when he spoke of the gap between ages 11 and 14 or 15. I am a little puzzled about this because he says we do not become concerned about this group any more until they get up around 17. It seems to be that the gap goes all the way from 11 to 14 to 17.

Mr. Steele: Well, yes, I agree, senator, that that does not look too good there as it is, but the point is that at about the late 15s or 16s we have a little concern because the child is leaving school. There is a possibility of the child approaching where he is no longer treated as a juvenile, which I think is at age 16. But the real concern becomes evident at age 17 because he is getting to the stage where he should either be in school or some place where he is getting training for full employment.

So really the harm comes in at 11 to 15, and we become a little concerned at 15 to 16, and we really become concerned at age 17 because the kid has very little education and he is not coping, and perhaps he has only a job that may last a few weeks. As I say, our real concern comes at 17.

Years ago, at 11 to 14 you could involve them in Scouts or Cubs, things of that nature. Cubs and Scouts have changed. They are lacking in leadership; I mean in numbers of people to lead things. We have a gap there definitely.

Senator Carter: What I would like to know is what starts this gap at age 11? Why is this the specific age? What happens then when he gets to age 11, that everybody has been interested in him before and he is suddenly out in the cold? What happens? What causes that?

Mr. Steele: Up to age 11, depending probably upon his religion, if he is Protestant, probably he is going to Sunday School, or his mother can make sure he goes, and then he starts to drop out of Sunday School, which means he drops out of Sunday School activities such as Tyro, or whatever it may be, and programs are not geared for that age group. We just run a lot of drop-in centres for the older teens. At the other end we have shows and programs that entertain the 11s and under. However, we as yet, outside of a few pre-teen dances, do not really have programs that are geared to the minds of these children, their interests. We just do not have them.

Senator Carter: Well, the school-leaving age is 16, is it not?

Mr. Steele: Legally it is 16. You can get a work permit, I believe, at age 14 or 15.

Senator Carter: But they don't get family allowances or anything like that if they drop out before age 16?

Mr. Steele: Just going to school is not the whole thing. You see, a child at Grade III or IV can be streamed into vocational, which may be the limit of his learning ability, but, in any event, in many cases if the child got proper exposure there is a learning capacity greater than that.

Senator Carter: What I am trying to get at, this gap you are talking about from age 11 to 15, these children are still attending school, they are not out of school, they are in school, but there is no program for them in school; is that the situation? Are there no Boy Scouts or Girl Guides or other organizations, nothing to take up the slack at all while they are in school?

Mr. Steele: For some unknown reason, Girl Guides or Boy Scouts are not attractive in sufficient numbers for this group. No, they are not. It is a good program but that is the situation.

Senator Carter: I just mentioned those two, you know, as examples. Surely if children are in school from ages 11 to 14 or 15 the school program itself offers something. They have football games, hockey games, various teams. There must be some sort of organized activity for that age group. Why isn't there, if there isn't?

Mr. Steele: Well, in most organized activities—in hockey, due to lack of space—the situation is that they are geared to the best 15 players representing an area and the other 45 perhaps to 100 or 200, in that category, there are very few house leagues, there are very few things that are geared to just the fact of you being there. In athletics it is geared to the best few representing the community.

Senator Carter: Well, don't they even have track and field teams and other activities of that sort?

Mr. Steele: I am glad you mentioned that. I was going to anyway. I put an application in to John Munro. We have a track on the other side of the Don in Riverdale Park. National Health and Welfare are concerned with the Canadian National Hockey team. I asked for a grant in order that we could ask Broadview YMCA for the use of their shower facilities and suggested we could start a track and field club for the youngsters of this area inasmuch as the track is there, making the suggestion that we would ask Metro, with his support, for the use of the Island Lagoons for a paddle, canoe, and rowing club for the kids in this area, for a general health program for the area, for a number of six items all told. We got a reply that it was being looked into. That was two years ago. So it is still being looked into.

There is a facility over on the other side of the Don River. You say track and field. There is an island where we could have kids from this area, the same as the kids from Mississauga or Balmy Beach Canoe Club, we could have this sort of thing going for the kids here. You write to the people who you feel should have the money and certainly the ones who are talking about fitness under National Health and Welfare but you cannot get anywhere with them. The facilities are there but we cannot get the backing to open up this sort of thing.

The Chairman: Mr. Rotenberg would like to say something, Senator Carter.

Mr. Rotenberg: I think when Mr. Pearson was the Prime Minister he allowed a certain amount of money for sports and recreation, and I think it was Richard, the hockey player, that was on that committee. After the Canadians lost the championship in Europe there was a lot of money suddenly available. We were supposed to build up sports in Canada. However, over that period of time, nothing has come of it. They had a few meetings and then after that we never heard of it again.

When I said we have no recreation centre in our area, that is literally true. You see, in our area where there are some 45,000 people in one ward—just a single ward, which is something like having a city somewhere in New Brunswick or Nova Scotia or perhaps almost anywhere else, but this is just a ward of the City of Toronto—in that whole area there is nowhere where the kids can go in the evening.

A boy or girl of 11 years of age feels he or she is growing up. They want to go out and see the world. And this is where we should come in. We should be ready for them, ready to get them into these recreational centres giving them facilities where they can be indoors rather than outdoors in the street getting into trouble. That is what I was trying to bring out before. We need these facilities so we can guide them into proper ways of living and becoming better citizens with proper educations and living as we would like them to live, growing up as we would like them to grow up. That is our problem, that we spend a lot of money on a lot of things, but we do not spend it on the right things in the right places.

Senator Sparrow: A supplementary question. Is the witness aware that for sports and recreation under the Department of National Health there was last year a budget of two and a half million dollars when he said there were no funds available?

Mr. Rotenberg: Well, we didn't get it.

Senator Sparrow: You are talking about at an individual community level, and I am not just sure that the program was set up on that basis. It was to encourage and promote national sports through national associations as such. They have not, of course, got down to individual community projects as such. I am not too sure I know how the federal government could relate down to the community level, but if there is a program that should be undertaken perhaps that type of suggestion should be made.

Mr. Steele: Well, we made a specific request for a track and field club with the track being there, and suggested also we would go to Metro and ask for the use for our children of a canoe club, and these were specific natural facilities in one instance, and man-made in the other, and the reply was most indefinite. You could wait until my children had children before you got an answer.

I feel also that the federal government at times is guilty of not intentionally but unintentionally hiding where certain monies are available. For instance, would you yourself think, if you wanted a community worker, that this money is available in the Department of Citizenship? When I heard it I was amazed that the money for a community worker was available in the Department of Citizenship. I would have thought it might have been a department of urban affairs, you know, something related to the community.

If the area around here wanted a community worker, how many people would know where to go, where to apply? How many people know that the Ontario Athletic Commission still is operative and if we formed a league in this community right here we could get balls and bats there? We do not make public enough where the funds are available and what the ground rules of the game are.

Senator Sparrow: I would certainly agree with that, Mr. Chairman, that this happens on a municipal, a provincial, and certainly a federal level. Most of the community contributions though are made through the provincial level, from the federal to the provincial and then to the municipal level; that is really the chain. However, I appreciate what you are saying, that almost without exception no government body puts out catalogues saying that this money is available and the budget is so much and that is should be used. I certainly appreciate that.

The Chairman: Senator Carter, did you have anything else? We have to start thinking of the time.

Senator Sparrow: Yes, I am afraid I took too much time. That was a rather long supplementary.

The Chairman: Yes, time is running on quickly.

Senator Carter: The school finally has no organized activities for this particular group, I take it. What about the church? Does the church have nothing either?

Mr. Steele: I would say that churches have certain activities. One of the questions at the moment within the downtown area is the possibility of churches selling their buildings as such and the congregations joining together. We don't have to mention denominations, but it is a case of, say, one church taking congregations from two other churches and then selling the property and making the money available.

I feel that Earls Court United, for instance, serving a predominantly Catholic Italian community, has now become a community centre working with Italian mothers, and religion is out the door and it is forgotten. I think that is what could happen in our community, that rather than the church selling these buildings which are already standing, let's make use of them for the community. If there are not enough people going on Sundays let's make sure they are used. Let us not sell them. I am afraid of this selling business because you never replace buildings, the same as you never replace parklands. Theoretically you do, but in fact you really don't.

Senator Carter: I will ask one more question. Time is flying. If there is time at the end I will come back to something else again. On page 7 down at the bottom paragraph you talk about public attitudes, Mr. Steele. You mention that the press, radio, television, etc., can play an important role if they give recognition to the potential which lies dormant in a depressed area. What have you in mind there? Would you spell it out in a little more detail so we will know what you have in mind?

Mr. Steele: Well, the news media has not lost its effectiveness. It is probably the strongest thing going, whether it is the television or the press. I feel that organs such as the Toronto Star, the Globe and the Tely perform their function quite well in telling of the things that are wrong in the community. This is a role they should play.

I would like to see the papers also spell out in their way those things that can be corrected quite easily, to spell out where the area of responsibility lies. I would like to see the papers do researches and make recommendations and recognize that there are, as I say, certain talents lying dormant in a community, that they spell this out and put pressure on the general public and on governments for action.

Rather than just saying that this is all wrong, the papers have an important role to play where they can make specific recommendations. I think this is a role that the papers and the television and radio can play.

Senator Carter: Don't you think they should do more than this? There used to be a time when papers were crusaders and you had crusading editors.

Mr. Steele: I agree with that. I probably should have come right out and said that. I think the papers and the television should do it on a continuous basis rather than on a one-shot basis, saying, "This is all wrong". I mean, you people are in town this week, and next week and the week after I would like to see the press carrying on with certain things that have been observed and heard and crusade, as you say. Yes, definitely; they are not doing enough of that.

Senator Carter: This situation you talk about, this gap where you have a large number of youngsters 11 to 15 that have nowhere to go and nobody wants to help them, surely that is a matter of public concern to everybody. I would think that every paper would become a crusader.

Mr. Steele: I think the papers could very well crusade as to this 11 to 15 group, yes. I agree with you, senator, they should do that. It is just a case of so much happening in the world today, I guess.

Senator Carter: Have you any idea why they are not doing it? Is it just apathy, that they accept this? Or is it that they just don't care? Or what?

Mr. Steele: No, I think probably reporters, like everybody else, get so damned many assignments they cannot go into it. I would like to see the papers put on specialists, in this world of specialization, people who can work in this area and stick to it for a number of years, a team perhaps. They could really perform a function.

I mean, to take the reporter from one thing to another and switch him all over, he has so many things to do, just, for instance, as a clergyman has so many problems where he is a welfare man, he is concerned with religion and so many other things, and if there were a staff at the newspaper put on this for a year or two and who really did a crusade, I think they could do something, because I think they are all fair people. However, there are just so many different assignments it does not get done.

Senator Carter: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Senator Pearson.

Senator Pearson: You talk about a program of athletics and so on for the young people of 11, 12 or 15. Athletics is one item only in the development of the young people of this district. There are a great many other things that have to be looked into in order to take these young people off the streets besides athletics.

Mr. Steele: I would say that is right.

Senator Pearson: I agree with you when you say that the best are on the team and that is the end of it.

Mr. Steele: I think what happens too is that a lot of youngsters in the community have a great interest in, say, music, whether it is folk music or other types of music, and maybe a kid wants to learn to play the piano, and the very awareness that this opportunity is not there does take place in the age area that we are talking about.

St. Christopher House, for instance, has, I think it is, a number of rooms off a big room where a child can go to learn to play an instrument. St. Christopher House, in my opinion, is one of the most progressive places in that regard.

Senator Pearson: It is not only music, there is statuary work, ceramics and all sorts of things, including painting and so on, a hundred and one different things.

Mr. Steele: Yes.

Senator Pearson: Everybody is interested in something.

Mr. Rotenberg: That's right, senator.

Mr. Steele: I agree.

Senator Pearson: You talk about the young people being taken out the farms. Do you know if anybody pursues this subject at all, taking young people out to the farm to spend a week or ten days or two weeks out on the farm?

Mr. Steele: We write to the weeklies and lallies, and the press and radio help to get people to transport them there and back. The kids will spend anywhere from a week to two weeks to even a month at a farm. This definitely has a good effect.

However, there is one thing I should tell you, we do find that they have to be about ages 7 or 8 to start with. We tried it with youngsters 5 and 6 and found that in the middle of the night we were going up and ringing the youngsters back. This is a good thing for them, to get into a farm atmosphere, but it has to commence at about age 7 or 8.

Senator Pearson: Another point, and this has to do with the senior citizens; there is a lonely group of people there; I don't know what you can do for them. They need a little entertainment. That is really all they need, feeling that they are connected with something.

Now I was in an old folks' home not too long ago and I saw some of these people just sitting there, sitting around in their wheelchairs in the hallways and in their rooms, and there was nothing to do. They were just sitting there like lumps of plaster with no interest in the world. Those people need some entertainment. Of course there are a lot of old people that do not belong there, living in these old folks' homes.

Mr. Steele: The ones that are worst off are those living in rooms. I don't feel that everyone wants to be entertained. I mentioned somewhere in the brief about on the banks of the East River, the National Council of Jewish Women have a place in New York City, and I believe there are two or three other organizations, where older people who are still active can go and work for two or three hours, maybe putting buttons on cards, doing light assembly work under subsidized industry, and when those old people come out of that place they are sparkling. They may be dragging their legs a bit but there is meaning in their lives. I don't think we should put all old people into the category where we feed them and entertain them. There are some of them with a lot of drive.

Who carries your local churches? It is the senior citizens at the moment who are doing all the work to carry them. I think we have to look at senior citizens and find those that are still capable and interested in having meaning in their lives and give them light work to do, perhaps giving $40 or $50 a month for working a few hours a day, and that would mean the difference between living and existing for them.

The Chairman: Senator McGrand.

Senator McGrand: Yes, I have one question, Mr. Chairman, and the answer can be very short. Is poverty in Toronto increasing percentage-wise faster than the growth rate of Toronto? Or is it just more evident than it was before? My impression is that poverty is becoming worse. Is it growing as fast as the population?

Mr. Steele: Statistic-wise I could not answer you, but I would say that certainly with the increase cost of living, and if one is not with a strong union, with wages going up as quickly, that the number of people falling into your so-called theoretical poverty level—and I don't mean yours, but the economists' and the social workers'—I would say the number of people having difficulty getting by and having a few pleasures in life and meeting their needs is increasing.

Senator McGrand: That is including the working poor?

Mr. Steele: This is our big danger, the person earning $70 to $95 a week with a family who, when he sees the guy next door on welfare having everything paid for, debates whether he would not be better off on welfare himself. If they ever lose their dignity and go on welfare our economy could not stand it. Our whole society could not stand it. I think we have to be concerned with low incomes.

Senator McGrand: Then you would agree with me that poverty is a bigger problem now than it was ten years ago?

Mr. Steele: I would say yes, with the increased cost of living and the deterioration of housing. They say there are 18,000 people waiting for housing. I would say it would be much closer to something like 60,000.

Senator McGrand: Do you agree, Mr. Rotenberg?

Mr. Rotenberg: With the growth of the city, I don't think the poor have grown as fast, but it is just that the costs today are higher.

Senator Pearson: Do you include the working poor as well as the poverty people?

Mr. Rotenberg: It all depends on what you mean by working poor. I mean a man who works...

Senator Pearson: A man who cannot meet his needs and is still working.

Mr. Rotenberg: He is working and cannot catch up with the cost of living.

Senator Pearson: That group must be increasing.

Mr. Rotenberg: Well, you can see that yourself. If the prices keep going up, this will happen, that that group will go up in numbers. If you were in a good position yesterday, you will not be in as good a position tomorrow. If your rent previously was $80 a month and the landlord comes along and says that it is now $120, you are going to be out $40. You may be poor overnight.

Then again, you may be in business and what you could buy for $100 yesterday, you might not be able to buy tomorrow. It is up to the government mostly, I think, and to the people in charge to see that those things do not happen, that it does not get out of control, that profits and the cost of living do not get out of line, that wages and the cost of living do not go one above the other. That is the biggest problem today. If the cost of living goes way out of line there are going to be a lot of poor.

Senator Pearson: All right, thank you.

The Chairman: Well, Mr. Steele and Mr. Rotenberg, you have made very well-planned briefs and presentations. I want to be fair. I think, Mr. Steele, in your brief you have not presented anything new to us. I hope you understand what I mean. I mean, we have heard this on several occasions. We have been travelling around, you know, and, after all, the briefs on poverty are all about the same.

Mr. Steele: Yes.

The Chairman: But it is good for us to find out that the problems you have in Toronto are quite related to the problems in Montreal and that those problems too relate to the ones in Halifax and will probably relate to the ones in many other cities. That is what we are trying to find out. We did not expect to come to Toronto and find a new world here. We are just finding that it is part of the existing world. I am not being critical certainly of your brief.

I think we have a lot of respect and admiration for the work you are doing, especially with this group of young people which needs so much attention today. This young generation today for some reason finds it very difficult to face life as we faced it 30 years ago. I think perhaps it was much easier in our day for various reasons. In our day you did not need as much education and you did not need as much effort to find a place in the world where you could fit in. Today it is not like that at all. You have to almost become a specialist. You need to be educated in more than one way. Jobs are getting more and more scarce every day. There is mechanization. You have the technical development that is going on also. So the young people today are really facing a problem. I think this is one of the problems with our young generation they don't know what is awaiting them.

As I say, we certainly appreciate what you are doing. I am sure I speak for the committee when I say that the committee would like to see more people with your devotion to youth, which seems so essential today, the need to try to do something. We do thank you very sincerely, and I am sure your brief will be given careful consideration.

Mr. Steele: Thank you very much.

The Chairman: We have received another brief which was not expected. I am no too sure whether I should accept this brief because the briefs are usually sent to the committee's office in Ottawa where they are looked over. However, we do not want to deprive this young man of the opportunity of presenting a brief. We have not read it. All I say, together with the rest of the committee, was the cover when it was received. I think we can take a few minutes and ask the man who presented the brief, Mr. Allan Waldron, to give us a brief explanation. I would like to tell my honourable friend that his time will be rather short. I know he cannot explain everything that is in the brief but he can give us an outline. And I would give him the assurance that copies will be made, if we are given the authority to do that, and every member of this committee will get a copy within a few days and will read it. At a later date possibly we will be back to Toronto and you will have a chance to present your brief officially. At this moment we do not want to deny you the privilege of telling us in your own words something about it. Do you agree, gentlemen?

Some Senators: Yes.

Senator Carter: We are receiving the brief now.

Senator McGrand: Yes, he may wish to explain something.

Mr. Allan Waldron: You are aware, sir, I am just an individual.

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Waldron: I am the product of...

Mr. Chairman: You will have to speak louder, I am afraid. Would you come up and speak more loudly so that we can record what you are going to tell us.

Mr. Waldron: You must be aware that I am just an individual. I am the product of three generations that have spent most of their early childhood in orphanages. I am well aware of the problems of the poor. You understand?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Waldron: Not a language awareness but a realization of awareness. As I said, I am just an individual. I do not represent any group. I am the fourth generation of individuals who have spent time in orphanages because of poverty, so-called. Now, it does seem to me that poverty is a numerical, mathematical ratio difference between top and bottom. I don't care two hoots about all these make-work projects for agencies and school teachers.

I have outlined in my brief the very genesis of our Christian nation, our ability to call ourselves sapiens. And we never get this from these people. We give money to the educators to tell us that homo sapiens emerged from the trees. They also are homo communicatis. They are just concerned with joining their chorus, their school of thought, and they just stay with their local choreography.

I have given the genesis of nepotism. Psychiatry and the very diversity of our natures assures an infinite make-work project for all these welfare agencies, and psychiatry will not give the genesis of these.

In the poverty of the poor we are surrounded by these psychiatric high priests who use this word "hedo" and will not tell us what they mean. I have outlined in the brief that there would be no epilepsy among our species, there would be no schizophrenia, and we would not be such versatile communicators. It does seem to me someone should begin at the beginning.

Now, if we begin at the beginning, I have outlined also very simple ideas of rational participation. This brief has been submitted to the Bishop here in Toronto. There is a great deal of Masonic copying going on. And you have not a free press either in the communist or capitalist worlds, and they will not print it. You understand? They themselves do not want it. They seem to be afraid of the social implications of making everyone aware that there are mongrels, bits and pieces, mongrelization of mongrels.

It could only have been through social selection that we became the most egotistical species on earth. And if the psychiatrists are going to insist that all our behaviour is determined by sex we want them to tell us if we are the sexiest species under the sun how come we never had a genesis.

You understand I have outlined a way for His Holiness the Pope to intercede in his presence in a nuclear confrontation. In spite of the opinion given by psychiatry and the rest of the educators this present nuclear confrontation is not just an erection of phallic symbolts. Psychiatry is the newest and youngest member of the social sciences and of course has yet to mature from its adolescent preoccupation with sex, with everyone being homo communicatis joining in the chorus played by the psychiatric high priests. The very diversity of our nature assures an infinite make-work project for the psychiatrists and the religious witch-doctors.

The Chairman: You have two more minutes, sir.

Mr. Waldron: I have outlined a way for His Holiness to intercede and I have given both suggestions to the United Nations. I do think it should be communicated. Thank you.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Waldron. Your brief will be given all the attention it deserves by the committee and will be taken to our headquarters.

Gentlemen, we thank you very kindly for your participation.

The committee adjourned.

Toronto, Tuesday, March 10, 1970

The Special Senate Committee on Poverty (Subcommittee "B") met this day at 8.00 p.m. at Flemington Road Public School, North York, Toronto.

Senator Arthur M. Pearson in the Chair.

The Chairman: The purpose of this meeting, ladies and gentlemen, is to hear a presentation called Community on the Move, Lawrence Heights. The spokesman will be Mr. Dale Shuttleworth, who is a social service consultant. There are also present here others who are working in this community and who are prepared to give short statements of about four minutes in duration.

As I understand it, Lawrence Heights is unique in Canada in its approach to community problems and services. Your professionals are collaborating in a team approach in their work towards education, recreation, family counselling, library services and day care, etc. The citizens in this community formulate their interest and priorities in the above fields and give active leadership in the implementation of these programs. Through the citizen involvement and new approaches to the organization of services it is the goal of the community to have an effective approach for the prevention of social problems.

Your professional service teams will be making a formal presentation this evening to this committee, the Committee of the Senate on Poverty. This will be followed by a meeting of the citizens, a program that may include a formal brief with informal discussion with you community people.

Without further ado I am going to ask Mr. Shuttleworth to make a short statement, and then we shall hear from various ones who are now in the audience.

Mr. Dale Shuttleworth: Thank you, Senator Pearson. When we were thinking about how we were going to do this presentation tonight, we had thought about the idea of having some sort of joint brief where everyone could put something into it and we would have someone read it. However, one of the things we try to stress, I believe, in this community, is the participation of everyone, and we felt it might be a different way of approaching it if many people had a chance to say a little bit as opposed to one person saying a lot.

So I would ask those people who are part of the program tonight to please limit what they have to say to a very brief outline of their role within the community and also some of the considerations and ideas that have come from their involvement here.

I have been in this community now for almost five years and I have been working in Flemington Road Public School. One of the things I became very much aware of from the time I came here was that this was a community where people had been very often relocated from an inner city or downtown section of Toronto and had been set up in a housing unit in a suburban-type location.

The problems that exist in many suburban areas, and I am sure we are all aware of the idea of the sameness, the lack of resources, and the lack of facilities, were certainly the case here. But the problem was intensified because these are people who do not have the financial resources very often to compensate for these deficiencies.

The school, I think, very soon became aware of these considerations and concerns because it literally grew with the community. When the first housing units were opened, this school was opened in a much smaller sense than what we have now. As the community grew over a period of four or five years the school grew. I think the challenges to education in this particular school with relationship to the community have been very great because we had a lot of understanding to do. We were like new residents. But as time has gone by and we have progressed I think that we have decided that our only opportunity to have a meaningful educational experience is if we do relate to the community and the resources that are here because we really feel, I believe, that this is a partnership.

One of the ways we have attempted to do this is by reaching out into the community. I have been involved in this. One of the central points has been the idea of the community school, which still is a growing concept, but in the beginning it had to do with the extension of the school day and the involvement or the forming of the partnership of services and people in interested groups in the community.

What you saw downstairs as you came in—and I hope you were not too much inconvenienced by it—is a teen drop-in centre. It has been operating now for over three years. I think it is an example of where a number of different agencies and groups have formed a partnership and pulled together to make things happen. There are over 50 such activities going on in this school in the extended day program. In addition, we have been able to form an inter-disciplinary team where agencies are able to look at problems related to children and related to the family.

From my standpoint this has been a very productive experience for me, mainly because I have seen things happen.

The main group that governs this or directs this is something called the community school advisory council. Many of the people or, in fact, just about all of the people who will be among the representatives tonight, sit on the community school advisory council. It has been in operation now for about three and a half years.

I would like to introduce now the principal of Flemington Road Public School, Mr. Jim Montgomerie.

Mr. J. Montgomerie: I think the reason I was picked first is because that is the principal's lot. When I thought I had four minutes to say something to the senators I thought of all kinds of things, like teacher-pupil ratios and teacher education and all that type of thing. I rejected them all because you are going to hear those a thousand times.

I think what we are trying to do in this school, as part of our contribution to the community, is that we are trying to say: What are the basic needs of the children in this community?

I think, because of the way they are and the image they have, our school can only do one thing first, and this is what the teachers try to do in this school, and that is love the children. We give them love. We try to make them know that as a human being every human being deserves loves; and we have had remarkable success in making these kids feel they are people of value and worth. And I think in our work in the community that is what we try to do, to make these people see that they are people of value and worth. Every time we make them see that, they prove they are.

There are lots of aspects to education, the effectives, the cognatives, the motor skills, and so on. In a community like this we find that the effectives and the motor skills are the two things that are lacking most because of the kind of environment they live in. Without those two no learning takes place. Since all learning has an emotional base, you must have self-worth before you can do it. You must have a positive identity. Before you can teach these kids anything you must make them have that positive identity.

So, my two cents worth would be that most of the ills of the world can be cured if we start loving these kids and making them feel like people of worth. That is all the school has tried to do.

The Chairman: Very good. We will hear from each one who is going to say something, and then the senators will ask questions later on.

Senator Carter: Could we go down the list, Mr. Chairman, if they are here, in the order in which they are on the paper?

The Chairman: Well, we can call each one out and if they are not here we will go on.

Mr. Shuttleworth, would you care to do that?

Mr. Shuttleworth: Mr. Harry Zwerber, Lawrence Heights Family and Child Service.

Mr. Harry Zwerber: I feel somewhat cheated because before this meeting started I was told I had ten minutes, and now I find I have only four. So I will have to cut down what I am saying.

Senator Carter: Now you know how a politician feels.

Mr. Zwerber: Oh yes, but I hear they have all sorts of ways that they can extend things.

The Lawrence Heights family and child service is a pilot project in its third year of operation. It is sponsored by the Family Service Association and the Children's Aid Society of Metropolitan Toronto. Both agencies share the operating costs of this unit. As the co-ordinator I am responsible for the operation of the unit to an administrative committee which is made up of administrative people from both agencies.

At the time of its inception about three years ago, the two parent agencies directed us to institute a preventative program in order to prevent family breakdowns and child neglect in the community of Lawrence Heights.

In terms of direct service to families in need of assistance our goals were directed to helping families to function in a manner providing the maximum amount of stability and protection to their children. In terms of preventing the need for service we saw our role as something to develop a more self-sustaining community in which, hopefully, much of the services delivered to the community would be delivered by the community itself. Further, we envisaged both areas of service, that is direct service and community development, as being very much interconnected and interrelated.

The only professional-like structure in the community that involved any degree at all of community participation in the operation of its program was the community school program of Flemington Road Public School directed by Dale Shuttleworth, which he has already spoken about. In addition, from the point of view of delivering a good case-work service to the community, we saw the school as having the major resources to provide a direct service to children and ourselves as having the major resource to provide the direct service to families.

These were the factors that provided the rationale for our unit, seeing the formation of a working partnership with the school as being crucial; and a good deal of energy has been expended in the formation of this partnership and the building of a coordinated service in conjunction with the community school.

Apart from the direct service to clients offered through our case-work service through the groups for adults and children encompassing about 120 active case families, the most important service we can offer is that of supporting the community to help to make it a more pleasant and healthy place to live. Much of this is done through time allocated to the community development component discussed earlier.

We have attempted to use our staff as resource people, enablers and supporters in order to help indigenous groups and indigenous leadership. Most of the really meaningful work done in this community has been done by indigenous people supported as much as possible by professionals who have committed themselves to working in the community in response to express needs.

We have active membership in the community advisory council and with the board of education and school personnel have an interdisciplinary team, which Dale also mentioned, which meets monthly to discuss cases of mutual concern to both organizations and to plan for the best focus of service possible.

As an agency we always have to look at the service we are providing to evaluate, to change, to plan, to respond to needs expressed by clients and by the community. When our service becomes a static and unresponsive one then we are no longer serving the community.

What we have learned here in the working together of agencies in an integrated service and in a specific community has been incorporated into the manner in which many other agencies are now working together across this community and elsewhere.

That is the statement I would like to make about the service we are providing in this community, Mr. Chairman.

On behalf of our staff, I would also like to say something else in regard to this meeting here tonight. Nothing which I could say about poverty would add one whit to what you have already heard so far in your travellings around this country.

The poor are the disadvantaged—in every way possible from before birth until after death. We perpetuate the cycle through our welfare legislation and practices.

I am sure that every one of you gentlemen are honorable people who have distinct personal interests in the area of poverty—otherwise you wouldn't be here today. Unfortunately, you are also a very ineffectual tool. Even the Minister of Health and Welfare shrugs off the efforts of your committee. Some people in this community, some agency people as well as residents, really are not interested in bringing forth any worthwhile material since they feel it is like dropping it into a bottomless pit. You'll never even hear it hit bottom.

I personally question the waste of hundreds of thousands of dollars on this committee. It would be so much better used in direct service to help the poor. One thing a committee like this does do is to drain off a lot of frustrated people's energies in formulating and presenting briefs. This has the overall effect of keeping the lid on.

The economic aspects of poverty are very obvious—just look around this community. The psychological aspects of poverty are not as easily measurable. We don't understand its long range effects well enough. On a person-to-person level one certainly feels the lack of self-worth, the destruction of the dignity of a man who has to beg for a subsistence allowance from the welfare department to feed his family; the desertion of husbands who know their families are better off on welfare—not only financially but also that they will have available to them the needed medical benefits so necessary to people on a low level of subsistence.

The attitudes of those professionals and semi-professionals offering services to the poor leave a great deal to be desired—often they are despicable—especially those involved in the direct process of offering financial assistance, such as welfare departments, W.C.B., etc. People need support to be able to grasp the power to bring about change. We are generally loath to do that as it threatens us immensely.

We must listen to the recipient of service. He can define his problem much better than we can. We must then gear our service to that, if it is requested. No more of this nonsense of consulting the poor or token poor who usually aren't the poor or the recipients of service but the "graduates", those who have made it) on boards of agencies.

Now is the time for change. I challenge the government of Canada to supply needed capital, no strings attached, to community activist groups, people who want to tackle their problems their way. If it means criticizing the government, allow them this right. Only then will we be able to begin to build a true just society where all men will have at least equal opportunity.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Mr. Shuttleworth: Our next speaker was to have been Miss Bunny Keeley, who, because of a death in the family, has had to leave the city. However, a resident of the community, Mrs. Barbara Aoki, will present her contribution to this evening's program.

Mrs. Barbara Aoki: This was written by Bunny, so I am just going to read what she has here:

"My responsibilities in Lawrence Heights are:

"1. To meet with community groups in order to determine what they are doing and how they see my role and my usefulness to them.

"2. To assist community groups to initiate and operate activities of their choice by acting as a resource person and an enabler.

"3. To operate programs where a need appears to exist and where the group served cannot undertake leadership themselves, such as children's activities.

"4. To make available department facilities to community groups who wish to use them; in this case, the community centre and the pool.

"5. To coordinate my programs and to share my concerns and ideas with other agencies working in this area.

"Problems that potentially can occur: Because there are so many agencies, organizations and outside individuals at work in this community, there is always the danger of fragmentation in goals, overlap and duplication in practice. In Lawrence Heights the 'workers' have so far been able to communicate freely with one another so that activities complement rather than conflict with each other. The fact that much dialogue occurs on an informal and frequent basis between workers is most favourable. A step which is starting to be taken but which still must be encouraged is joint planning of courses of action based on concerns and ideas already shared.

"A danger in having strong agency cooperation is that people in a community may leave the action up to the workers, either because they feel their ideas are worthless in comparison or because they like having the onus left on the workers to serve the community. Fortunately, Lawrence Heights has several residents who are willing to state their ideas, to plan and operate activities. However, I feel reluctance still exists in many, and more encouragement to participate is necessary.

"Another potential problem is that of funding activities that may spring up. Most community people cannot give real financial support to worthwhile services and activities. The resident agencies, who by and large operate on rather strict budgets, tend not to be able to contribute assistance either. Thus, provision of necessary services relies heavily on grants, such as an Ontario Housing grant, or on outside groups who donate money. Even these grants are restricted and so services such as the day care centre continually must make do as best they can."

The Chairman: Mr. Shuttleworth, will you convey this committee's sympathies to Bunny Keeley for her loss in the family?

Mr. Shuttleworth: Yes. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I would now like to introduce Mrs. Marilyn Gross from the National Council of Jewish Women.

Mrs. Marilyn Gross: The National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, founded in 1893, with a membership of 5,500 women, organized in 13 sections across Canada, is dedicated in the spirit of their faith to furthering human welfare locally, nationally and internationally, through affiliation with the International Council of Jewish Women. Through an integrated program of education, service and social action it provides essential services and stimulates and educates the individual and community towards their responsibility for participation through personal commitment.

The Toronto section of the Council of Jewish Women has been involved in the work of the community here for the past six years. We started off in September, 1964, with the establishment of a junior kindergarten program, which was housed at the council house, and accommodated the children of the Lawrence Heights community. It was felt at that time that the children in this area were ill-prepared for starting school because of a lack of stimulus and a lack of communication and so forth that made it more difficult for them to enter the school programs.

The goals of the pre-school program were to broaden the conceptual world of the child, to enrich their verbal vocabulary, and to teach them skills which they were unable to acquire in their home environment. This was a very successful program, and three years after it was started it was taken over by the North York board of education and it now has its own junior kindergarten program.

As an ancillary program, the National Council has a mothers' program which was designed to improve the zest for living and to foster a sense of personal worth. That was also a very successful program and I think did a great deal to improve family life for the residents of this community.

The National Council of Toronto is also involved in helping out in the community school. As part of the community centre curriculum we have volunteers working as student aids in Grades I, II and III in the school. These volunteers help out and take small groups of children so that their teachers can carry on with other work.

We also have many volunteers in the after-school program working in interest groups and as resource personnel, and they work with the community volunteers and eventually the community volunteers take over as resource personnel.

Two years ago we were asked to help out in setting up a day care centre. This was not to be the usual type of day care centre for working mothers, but more of a therapeutic type of day care centre to help out the mothers who for reasons of health had to be away from home for the day or part of the day. This was started as a pilot project and was very successful and is now an ongoing project.

Just in closing I would like to add that it has been a great learning experience for all of our volunteers and a most satisfying one to have been a part in, hopefully, making the community a better place to work and live.

The Chairman: Thank you very much. Would those who are going to speak from now on speak a bit louder because the reporter cannot quite hear and get it down on the record.

Mr. Shuttleworth: Next I would like to introduce Mr. Len Chester of the Bathurst Heights Public Library.

Mr. Len Chester: I will see if I can speak up for the reporter. I should mention that the Bathurst Heights Library of course is a branch, a divisional branch of the North York Public Library. Our main role here has been, with the community school, to provide a cultural opening for the people in the area. We have done this through story hours mostly for the grade school children in the early grades, Grade IV and down, actually, given here in the community school after school gets out.

During the summer, when the school is closed, we decided that we would take the library to the people in the community, and we did this with the help of the National Council of Jewish Women who provided us with volunteers and with library staff to go around to the various courtyards in this community and tell stories in the heat of the summer. It was certainly a great testimony to the courage of the volunteers going around in the heat of July to relieve the doldrums in which the children found themselves. During the last year, in a very approximate sort of way, we totaled up that some 2,000 students altogether were involved in the eight or nine weeks that we were out one day a week.

In response to a request put to the advisory council for better library service in the area, we brought in the bookmobile which had a stop here one time and which had been discontinued. We brought it in and staffed it with staff from the local branch whom the people in the community might know if they came over to the other branch. It is located within a mile of the project.

With the assistance of Mr. Delegram from Seneca we have withdrawn books that are deposited in what we call courtyard libraries in charge of residents of the community and they can loan them out and take them back as they see fit.

In addition we have tried to set up special programs as the opportunity arose. We recently, as an example, brought in a hockey player from the Toronto Maple Leafs along with their hockey highlights film and showed to some 200 younger children in the auditorium here in the school.

I think that sums up fairly briefly just what we have been doing, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, sir.

Mr. Shuttleworth: Next I would like to introduce the Reverend Isaac Tiessen of the Mennonite Brethren Church.

Reverend Isaac Tiessen: The Toronto Mennonite Brethren Church was built here some twenty years ago to serve this community. The children of this community are coming to Sunday School, a few adults are coming, and we have a vacation Bible school in the summer. However, this was only once a week and we were concerned about more everyday needs. To meet these needs in a practical way the winter before last we rented the church basement to the kindergarten of the school.

We were glad to do that but then we felt this was sort of an isolated service and we wanted to meet the needs of the whole person. We inquired from some of the agencies of the school here, family services, the children's aid and last year we started it, and this is the second year that we have had a couple of volunteers here working in the area, working for the children's aid and family services, working for the community school. I think we will hear more about that. They have a hot lunch project. The ladies are helping out in the day care centre and also in the community school in the after-school activities.

We are able to give some small material aid in individual cases that are being pointed out to us where no other aid is available. We have also been able to support the co-op of this community in a small way.

We appreciate very much the cooperation of the social agencies and the people here. We have learned to know a lot of wonderful people in this community and it has been a joy for us to work together with them, and we hope that for the future we can continue to work to keep our program. We want to improve it and increase it even, to get even more workers here to help us. And we are quite flexible. We want to find out how we can help in the best way.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, sir.

Mr. Shuttleworth: I would like to introduce Mrs. Janet Gilmour of the Lawrence Heights Family and Child Service Volunteers.

Mrs. Janet Gilmour: It is about eight years ago that this service was provided. It was started through the foresight of a couple of social workers who felt that there was help needed and could they call on the community.

What has happened since the beginning is some of the volunteers have gone, under the guidance of the social workers, into homes to help with visiting. From this has come the idea of a store for secondhand clothing. This need was realized and it is in this area where most of the volunteers are used because the store is open several times during the week, some afternoons and some evenings, and it takes a lot of people to staff it.

As the years have gone by local residents have helped in this capacity and it has been very rewarding. It has given them confidence. We hate to lose them but we find that through gaining this confidence they have gone on to work in surrounding areas.

From the store where people came in to buy the clothing, some of it perhaps did not fit as well as it might, and we were asked if we could help them alter their dresses and so on, and therefore a sewing group was needed. From the sewing group we found that local residents again were helped because they soon learned the techniques and helped each other.

While they were at the sewing group on Wednesday afternoons it was necessary that their children be looked after in a nursery. There again when there were perhaps as many as 30 children it took several volunteers.

When there is the need for a nutrition group this is something that can be provided because we have a home economist who gives her time in that way.

I think that is all I have to say at this time. I too would like to say it is a very rewarding experience and a great deal of joy to work in this community.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mrs. Gilmour.

Mr. Shuttleworth: I would like next to introduce Mr. Saul Cowan, the trustee of North York Board of Education in this area.

Mr. Saul Cowan: You have all heard the principal of the school express his formula for success in this area, and that is to love the children. I will subscribe to that as being basic, but I think that next to that in a successful community program, such as I believe this to be, is the cooperation of the school board.

I think without the recognition by the school board that it has a special role to play, and is willing to play it, it is impossible to carry out many of the wonderful things you have heard and will hear. From the director right down to the people who are looking after the school there is almost constant dedication seven days a week.

One of the first things our school board did many years ago, in recognizing its responsibility right from the formation of this community, was the selection of a teacher-counselor in the person of Dale Shuttleworth. His work is not only doing case work in the school, and he has a very heavy case load, but he has a very heavy job to do in in-service training; he has a preventative job to do with regard to young people and delinquency, and most especially he has a particular job to do as liaison with the general community. And he is also a full-time member of our staff. Not only the job itself but the nature of the person is crucial. We are very happy to say Mr. Shuttleworth has been able to fulfil all these roles with wonderful success.

The school board recognizes its responsibilities in a number of different ways. In this school we have a smaller teacher-pupil ratio than we have in most other schools. It is considered an inner city school. We have two vice-principals. We have volunteers in this school, as has already been described to you. Not many schools have that. We have special dental assistants and a public health nurse on a full-time basis with the co-operation of the Borough, which is very useful and important.

We have a special pre-school program which was started on a volunteer basis but which is now part and parcel of the school program and paid for by Metro.

We have developed, in liaison with all the other agencies you have heard tonight, the community school program which goes on after the school day and which I think is one of the shining lights of our complete educational system in North York.

Above all I must pay tribute—and this is essential—to the nature of the staff we have here. It must be a staff that wants a challenge and accepts a challenge and is not going to run away from difficulties. We have such staff. In great measure it is due to the kind of principal you choose, the kind of vice-principals you choose, the kind of people like Dale Shuttleworth we have, who will spend countless hours in in-service training preparing teachers for the difficulties they face. In this and in many other ways the North York board of education has tried to meet its responsibilities to the community.

We feel that a small investment of money can bring tremendous results. It is tremendously frustrating for a few dollars here and there if you cannot carry through yet.

important fundamental projects of value. We think there is a tremendous role to be played in the arts, the development of music. I think there is tremendous deprivation in this field in a community such as this, and we are now bending our efforts to rectify that.

Above all I think if there is any third ingredient I would like to say it is the spirit of liaison which exists between all the agencies and the resources of this community working together through the basic resource, which is the school, its building and its facilities. Thank you.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, sir.

Mr. Shuttleworth: I would like to introduce now Father David Clarke of St. Philip's Anglican Church.

Father David Clarke: I would like to say amen to the things which Saul Cowan has just been saying and also, because I think this is a most remarkable setup, I would like to say that I am glad Harry Zwerver said the things he said and said them with such vigour because otherwise it seems to me that what you may hear mainly is nice people telling you how nice they are. I do think that there is an effect of a lot of people who are working in professional capacities which ultimately somehow is discouraging. How this operates I don't quite know, but I think there are some evidences that it still happens in spite of all the good intentions that they may have.

I was asked to say something about the role of the church in St. Philip's parish, which includes this community but it is not in this community. It is at least a mile from here. It was here before this community was built. I think that the first thing which struck us, and which has really been a feature of this community's self-awareness and of the full community's awareness, was that it had all the signs which in an affluent setting would be the signs of exclusiveness. No streets led into it and it is surrounded by a fence which puts it off. However, in fact this is of course a symbol of excludedness in this situation and therefore represents the fears of the community at the time when this project was first built.

I think that, as far as our parish was concerned, our main concern from a fairly early date was to try to provide some place in the neighbourhood where there was a kind of open door, where we were not principally interested in getting people into pews but where we were interested in people and concerned about them. I think there has been a certain degree of friendship from outside this particular immediate project and our parish church.

We run a bus which brings children and others over to our services on Sunday mornings. Our church building is mainly used by community groups of one kind and another. Two of them come from this project. One of them is a group, which has been meeting for several years, of mothers who come over with their pre-school children and have a nursery for them downstairs and run their own program upstairs every Wednesday morning.

Another one is the community co-operative grocery store which was unable to find any accommodation within the project itself or anywhere else locally and which operates out of our basement in, unhappily, rather crowded conditions. But at least it is the kind of thing which we personally feel in our parish is most to be supported and encouraged because it is local initiative and it is the people doing something to meet the problems out of their own capacities.

I think the other thing which was really most striking to us was the separatedness of all the different people. First of all there were all the churches that descended on this community calling at all the doors and trying to find people for their churches—and we were included in that. I think the people here were pretty browned-off by that—and rightly so. But also, apart from that, there were all the agencies who were in some way trying to help or do things, all of whom worked from separate bases.

Some years ago the Planning Council of North York arranged for a whole series of discussions to look at the effects of this kind of thing that was happening. It did not come to any conclusions but following that Phil Delegram came here and took up the role of a new kind of social worker and produced a very useful survey. And while he was still here Dale Shuttleworth came and the school began a new approach to things, and that was the first time I think I ever really experienced co-operation.

I remember calling on one family where there were some problems and after the woman had mentioned three different other people who were talking to her about some aspects of the family life I asked her if I could call some of these people and ask them about this, and she said, yes. One of the ones I called was Dale. He said, "Would you like to have a meeting?" I said, "That would be wonderful; is it possible?" As a result, eight of us met and all eight of us had been dealing with this one woman in isolation from one another. That was the sort of problem which existed. I don't know to what extent it still may exist but now everybody who is working here in some professional capacity has the opportunity of being in touch with the others, and the advisory board or the school certainly provides the basic common ground. But there is a lot of back-and-forth communication that goes on apart from that.

I think that is probably mostly what I have to say, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Father.

Mr. Shuttleworth: I would like to present Mr. Eldon Comfort of Yorkdale Vocational School.

Mr. Eldon Comfort: Ladies and gentlemen, I was introduced as the principal (sic) of Yorkdale Vocational School. Actually I am unemployed, although I hope to be re-employed in September. I want to endorse Mr. Montgomerie's comment earlier in the evening when he was talking about the great importance of feelings of self-worth for these girls and boys because it is this that I have been studying during the last year and hope to be more effective in that same area myself when I resume activities at Yorkdale in the fall.

What I want to do for a few minutes is just to give you some idea of how another school can work in co-operation with Flemington Public School and help to complete the community school's image.

Our involvement began really out of selfish motives because we were trying to improve the image of Yorkdale Vocational School in the community. It began as a project whereby staff members of the school went out to homes in this area. This soon grew into coffee parties almost ad nauseum, but it has been going on for several years now and a great many close friendships have sprung up and it is now a two-way thing.

Parents, I think mostly the mothers, have been coming back to the school in groups of various sizes to visit the school and it enables us to help them in several ways.

Some of the ways in which the school has helped the community school have already been mentioned indirectly. The hot lunch which is provided here during the noon hour for some children is prepared at our school and sent down here as a hot lunch. During the day care operation we take advantage of this, help ourselves in the same way, by sending some of our girls on what we call a work study program here. They help in the day centre work but they help themselves at the same time since they are training in nursery care work.

We provide some clerical services for the community when they want to put out flyers to advertise some of their activities. We can run them off on our machines. The girls who do it are not our office staff but the girls training in clerical work. Some live in the community and are therefore helping themselves.

I want to close on a note which indicates that we do not have all successes and perhaps this might be a recommendation for this committee since, I presume, this is one reason for its being. A couple of years ago we started—Mr. Shuttleworth started it, of course, as he seems to start most everything—working with a group of youths who were not employed and who were not even seeking employment. They were not at school, of course. They had long since dropped out of school. But they were beginning to show a little interest, and through the therapeutic group counselling they were getting here they showed some renewed interest in school and we were able to take them at the vocational school and give them help in some of the basic academic skills and in some of the shop work.

However, this did not last as long as we would have liked. There were a lot of positive results, some of which are measurable and some of which are not. In some respects the non-measurable results are perhaps of greater value, but you cannot equate it in dollars and cents. Anyway it was a very expensive program. A small number of youths were being helped in ways which were hard to measure. It was financed by the North York board of education but they decided it was too expensive a program. Perhaps the members of this committee could take cognizance of that, that in this kind of work which is extremely expensive and in these days when education costs are being trimmed, perhaps the burden should be placed elsewhere than on the local taxpayers. I just make that suggestion in closing, sir. Thank you very much.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Mr. Shuttleworth: I would like to introduce Mr. Jesse Deane from Twelve Madison.

Mr. J. Deane: It is pretty difficult to say what I do exactly. I think the young people could probably tell you more about that themselves. I try to deliver services to young people in a jam. Sometimes I try as best I can to rectify situations as they arise.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Mr. Shuttleworth: Next I would like to introduce Superintendent Charles Bond of the Metropolitan Toronto Police Department.

Superintendent Charles Bond: Gentlemen, I suppose if the projects of all these people were 100 per cent successful...

The Chairman: You would be out of a job.

Supt. Bond: Yes. It would be a nice way to go. I don't think crime is restricted in the province to the poor. In our area up here it happens that this particular patrol area also encompasses Yorkdale and we have the largest number of radio calls, the largest number of complaints, in this patrol area of anywhere in North York.

We gather a tremendous amount of statistics and they all filter through the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. And every year I think, "Well now, the good people in Ottawa are going to suddenly realize that Toronto is in rather bad shape", and they will probably set aside fifteen million or twenty million dollars to help us to police this community that is rapidly rising in crime.

Actually last year as a project we started with a community officer, this bright young fellow on my left here. We put him in the community, much like was done when most of us were boys, as a policeman who got to know the people in the community and who was in turn known by them. It is an old concept but it suddenly has become new gain. We have gone full circle.

So we are now in the process of instituting throughout North York a number of these community officers in an attempt to see if we cannot prevent crime. This is in its most basic concept, not merely through the fact that policemen are there but that young people are relate to these persons whom they respect and perhaps the crime will not even germinate. We find that whatever we are doing now is not succeeding.

The Chairman: It is not succeeding?

Supt. Bond: It is not succeeding, so it is obvious we are going to have to try some other approach. We found the project last year more or less immeasurable in terms of statistics. I think there was a lot of feeling generated. I have had a lot of people talk about it, that it was valid and satisfactory. Dale of course is a great exponent of the community officer. We are going to try it again, this time for a longer period of time. Perhaps then some of these statistics will start to appear.

You know, I am a little bit nutty about figures. I am comparing always last year's crime with this year's. I am like a salesman except that I want mine to go down instead of up.

It is an interesting community because it is fairly closely knit. It is not too large in its number of people. It has a rather interesting cross-section of humanity in it, so you too should find it interesting. Thank you very much.

The Chairman: Thank you very much.

Mr. Shuttleworth: Next I would like to present Mr. Al McChesney of the Legal Counseling Service.

Mr. A. McChesney: I don't think what the police are doing will affect us very much because we are law students and under the Legal Aid Act we are not allowed to deal in criminal matters. I would like to thank him for bringing a policeman but it will not affect our services in this area.

We got here largely through requests from people in this community. Dale Shuttleworth was one of them. Barbara Aoki was another.

I am with a group at Osgoode Hall Law School known as the community and legal aid service program. We have about seven branches working on different projects in this city. Of course it is just free students' work. Part of the reason we are doing it is that we realize through taking our courses, through listening to our professors and through what we have read that people who are not making as much money as lawyers cannot afford lawyers. Consequently people in areas such as Lawrence Height were missing out on the valuable things that lawyer could do for them, not only after they were in trouble but also in preventing trouble from happening, things like drawing up wills that other people think nothing about going to a lawyer for. Since it costs money these people have to think twice about doing it.

Also there are certain types of cases which Legal Aid cannot handle because they have a large volume of cases to handle, and if it seems to be a very small case in comparison with others the student certainly does not mind handling it because to us it is a very big matter and we are willing to help people for those reasons.

Another good reason for us to be in Lawrence Heights of course is that we learn a lot by doing things in the community. It is good experience for us. Of course if we have difficult cases we are not foolish enough to think we can do it ourselves. We have professors at the law school who are just as expert in certain areas as are practicing lawyers, so people get the benefit of their experience when they come to us.

In order to get to meet the people and let them know about us we have gone to different community meetings and we have tried to advertise our services.

We went to the Addiction Research Foundation which sponsored a drug education program. It was a program of some four weeks duration. We went to one of these meetings and sat in as regular participants on the same level as anybody else in the community. One thing we found interesting of course is that because of the people we had met at the university and because of things we had read in our law school course sometimes our attitudes on drug laws were not as favourable as other people's we spoke to, and it led to quite lively discussions sometimes.

One thing we hope to do in the future is have some type of lecture in which we tell people what they want to know about law, both young people and adults. Possibly we will do this on separate nights.

We have evening office hours, which we feel is a good idea. It helps everybody to get a chance to see us. What we do is free. We have an office—as a matter of fact it is in Dale Shuttleworth's office—that we are in four nights a week. People can make appointments or just drop in. Sometimes we cannot handle a matter, but at least we know where to send people. They are getting that type of advice which they were not getting before.

We have handled a few wills and a couple of landlord and tenant problems, things like that. Anything anybody brings to us, if we cannot handle it, we will tell them who can. We are not kidding ourselves. We know that what we are doing is a very small amount.

Another one of our students, Ian MacDougall, will be presenting a brief to this committee downtown tomorrow at St. Lawrence Hall explaining reasons why we think legal aid should be extended more widely in the province and what can be done about it.

One thing we have experienced in Lawrence Heights is great cooperation from the people in the community in letting us know what they wanted. We just hope that more of them start coming in to our office. We hope they have been staying away because they haven't any problems. But if they do have problems we hope they come to us more in the future. We have only been here a short time and we hope to see more of them.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, sir.

Mr. Shuttleworth: I would like to introduce now Mr. Paul Godfrey, who is the alderman in this area of the Borough of North York.

Mr. Paul Godfrey: Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, my comments this evening will be based on many of the facts I have obtained over the five years I have completed in office as a representative for this area, including the Lawrence Heights development. The one thing that initially comes to my mind is the term "welfare" and the use of the term "welfare". The committee should take into consideration, gentlemen, that whether you be a senior citizen, whether you be a parent, whether you be a student, whether you be an ordinary employee of any business, to some degree we are all receiving welfare, whether it be family allowances, whether it be old age assistance, or what-have-you. But, unfortunately, too many of the people who are labelled as poor and have to go on relief, as they say, are dubbed as people who are on welfare. I as an individual object to the term "welfare", and I think that the committee should back in Ottawa give some consideration to burying that term "welfare" once and for all and follow the leadership of the province of Ontario in calling it "family and social services" because I think 20th century thinking should be used with 20th century terms.

The problems that I have encountered mainly when discussing this term "family and social services" are ones of confusion because people are not sure exactly whether they are dealing with the municipal government, the provincial government or the federal government. As to this term, "family and social services," I believe there should be a national co-ordinating body which would encompass all three levels of government and make it easier for those people who are involved in family and social services to understand the problems that they are encountering.

We hear the term "family allowance" used. In my opinion, the whole concept of family allowance should be changed and changed drastically. Of those receiving family allowances, some find it ludicrous because the money they receive does not do anything for them. They are in a class that should not be receiving family allowances. Others who are receiving this nominal sum find it is insufficient for them and they cannot do anything with it because of the rising costs of the day. So I believe that the federal government must undertake a complete study and a complete revamping and pay to those who actually need it a proper subsistence with respect to a family and not pay those that are going on at their own steam. And I believe that this would be a step in the right direction as far as curing one of the ills of the poor.

It appears to me that in the field of education more must be done to aid the families who are labelled as poor because if the poor of today cannot afford to educate their children the way the rich are able to educate their children we will have poor in multiples in the future. I believe that we as members of government, you in your relation to the federal government and myself in relationship to the municipal government, must do all we can to make sure that the children of the poor families will be able to get the best education possible in this country because that way they will not be the poor families of the future.

With respect to nursing home care, the present rate for a welfare patient in a nursing home is $10.50 per day. The per diem rate in a Metro home for the aged is $10 per day. It is estimated that 75% of the patients in a nursing home being paid for by the department are there only because of the lack of beds in homes for the aged.

While it is appreciated that it takes a considerable sum of money to build a home for the aged it is also a fact that there is no comparison in the care given in a home for the aged and that in the average nursing home. The home for the aged has sufficient medical help, nurses, dietitians, therapy treatments, rooms, etc. Movies and bingos are held regularly. If we are going to give something other than lip service to the aged it would seem reasonable to funnel the money now being paid out for maintenance of nursing homes towards more homes for the aged, where they can not only receive excellent care but be able to live a more active life. It would also eliminate the present yearly situation where the nursing homes approach municipal offices with guns to their heads demanding more money.

My final point is in the field of recreation. I believe that where there is a government-sponsored housing development, be it either individually or through a partnership with both the federal and provincial authorities, they should be concerned with providing more than just housing. It has been said that such low rental housing developments create social problems which apparently go along with such developments and the authorities involved should provide the amenities in the developments serving the people, and this could be through the development and construction of community centres, provision of day nurseries and incorporating health and social services as well as recreational services. The development of such a recreational centre has been that if it is built and paid for by the two senior levels of government the local municipality would be required to staff and maintain it. It is all very well to say this is a neat package but the ongoing staffing and maintenance costs can be quite high to a local municipality and, because the higher authorities have created a housing situation usually with high densities, there should be an ongoing grant with respect to the operation of such community centres. And whatever else it may include, such as day nurseries, health, social and legal problems. Thank you.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Godfrey. We have one more politician here in the person of Mr. Vernon Singer. I think, having heard one who did a very good job, we will not hear from the other one, much as I know he would like to speak.

Mr. Shuttleworth: I would like to introduce at this time Mrs. Leona Morley representing Coffee Parties.

Mrs. L. Morley: Three years ago a group of parents was asked to have a group of teachers into individual homes from Lawrence Heights to learn about each other. This came about originally between one parent and one teacher. Through these conversations it was felt that the more formal approach would not be the way to communicate in Lawrence Heights, so the concept of parent-teacher coffee parties came about.

These parties have been most successful by bringing an informal dialogue into being between parent and teacher, thus sometimes solving a problem or simply getting to meet different teachers of the children, or vice versa. It has also helped people in Lawrence Heights by making them become more involved in other areas of the community.

We are presently now involved with other schools such as Yorkdale Vocational, Lawrence Heights, Bathurst Heights, Saranac School, St. Charles School, our Lady of the Assumption School. Our parties are held about once a month and we have teachers from each of these schools usually attending. We also have many parents from the Lawrence Heights project.

As Mr. Comfort has covered our coffee parties very well, I don't believe I need to continue but I would add as a personal note that I am enjoying the work very much. I have just gotten involved myself.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Mr. Shuttleworth: I would like to introduce Mrs. Mary McNeilage representing the Brownies and Guides.

Mrs. M. McNeilage: I wish to make it very clear at this point that I cannot represent the Girl Guides of Canada. I simply represent myself as a member of this community.

I have enjoyed very much working with the children here. There are 84 children in the Guide group altogether including the Brownie packs. There is not really a great deal I can say. One of the aims of girl guiding is to make these children conscientious citizens in the long run, but at present and in the immediate future all we wish to do is keep these little people busy and happy.

We try to be self-supporting and put much effort into selling Girl Guide cookies in order to get them away to camp and into other activities.

I have enjoyed my work in the community and I am glad other people are trying to do something for the people in the community.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Mr. Shuttleworth: I would like to introduce Mr. John Frotten who represents the Scouts.

Mr. J. Frotten: As the adventurer leader of the 261st Adventurer Company, I also would like to make it clear I am only representing the scouts group in this district and not the Scouting League of Canada.

I would like to make clear to you people that we serve around 110 boys in the group and my biggest feeling behind scouting today is keeping young boys involved. I feel if you can keep young people involved then you can control a lot of the juvenile delinquency which is going on in this area and in surrounding areas. We are, however, having problems. One of the major problems is a leadership problem, which we feel is due to the lack of interest in the community among the parents. It is unfortunate that this is happening. We have been told by headquarters numerous times that if we did not get so many leaders by such and such a date we would be closed down. Thank the Lord we have been able to come up with leaders and we are still operating.

In closing I would like to thank the rest of the committees working along with us in the area and join with all of the other committees in saying that we are doing a fairly good job. Thank you.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Mr. Shuttleworth: I would like to introduce Mrs. Sylvia Parker who represents the Co-op.

Mrs. S. Parker: The Co-op is the chartered, non-profit, direct charge co-operative food store that we have at the present time. This is for members only. The membership is open to anyone. We started this in this community with the help of Reverend Tiessen and St. Philip's Anglican Church in the person of Father Clarke.

In order to help us raise money and stand on our own two feet, each member in the Co-op is required to buy a share. This share is returnable at any time but it buys the inventory that goes into the store. Then the other charges come when all of the bills are added up. All our overhead is added up and divided equally among the membership and this is paid every week, whether a member shops or not.

For the past six months we have been carrying almost a full line of groceries in our small Sunday School room. The saving is 20 percent on the average grocery bill. We are still very small at this time. We hope to have a larger membership from the community but the problem has been that there is no place for a store within the housing project. When the housing communities are built they do not supply any outside rooms or buildings other than schools or community centres which can be used for other purposes.

Now I understand that in Ontario most of the housing projects do supply a small space for stores that is either sold to a regular operator of stores or else rented out. We have found in this community that it has been impossible to get in. I understand in new communities where there have been Ontario Housing developments just beginning the stores have been put up and they are immediately rented out.

At the present time we are only in the food end of it because that is where we find most of the people in the community need the service. And I think we all eat better, those of us who shop at the Co-op. When we can find larger premises we hope to be able to expand. We are doing this for ourselves.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Mr. Shuttleworth: I would like to introduce now Mr. John Cadieux who is involved in Youth Work.

Mr. J. Cadieux: I am working in the capacity of a detached worker in Lawrence Heights. I live in the community. I have all this time because I am on dependent father's allowance myself with my wife and children. I was on the verge of a nervous breakdown so I decided to find something for myself to do, and I started working with my proteges here. I enjoy the work very much and I am sure that it means something to them, although I don't know what it is. I think that is all I have to say.

The Chairman: Thank you very much.

Mr. Shuttleworth: Next we have Mr. Denis Bulman from the Sports Club.

Mr. D. Bulman: I would like to give you some notes I have here. We had expenses connected with baseball of $1,300 and with hockey of $900. This includes uniforms, crests, balls, bats, equipment, banquets for the hockey and softball and so forth. We have 300 children involved in the softball and we would like to have about 150 involved in the hockey. Unfortunately, due to lack of equipment we cannot have this.

We have shows every Saturday for the children and we have a bingo every Thursday night of course, about which everyone here knows, and we take in approximately $21 every week from this bingo. I don't think there is anything more I can tell you here. I think those are about all the figures we have.

The Chairman: Thank you very much.

Mr. Shuttleworth: Next we have David Burrows representing Youth.

Mr. D. Burrows: The youth in this area have many things they can do and which they can participate in like the teen drop-in centre which you saw when you came in. There are also summer programs. They are planning camping trips and so forth. With the help of certain volunteers and staff they are helped to get into Seneca for upgrading courses to help them with their jobs. There is not much more for me to say. I am not a very good speaker anyway.

The Chairman: Thank you very much.

Mr. Shuttleworth: Next we have Mrs. Grace Sherman representing the Information Centre.

Mrs. G. Sherman: This is right off the top of my head. I did not come over here prepared. The Information Centre is really just getting off the ground. As one newspaper put it, it has everything from birth control to garbage. We are there to provide information, to channel calls that come in, to help in any way as far as information about agencies and the resources of the community and anything else that is inquired about is concerned. The Information Centre is manned by volunteer personnel. There is a board of directors of approximately nine people. These are people who are both professionals and people who are tenants in the community here.

As I say, we are just getting on our feet. Finances are a big problem. We feel this is an extremely important thing for this area. We have had calls from as far away as Scarborough asking for information about various things. Information centres are very much in the news these days. We do not feel there are enough. So we are hoping that ours will grow bigger and be able to cope with all the problems that still arise. We are certainly having a great deal of help from the advisory board here at the school. What we lack in number of volunteers we make up for in enthusiasm. We are looking for more volunteers all the time.

It is pretty early to say what is going to happen, where we are going or what we are going to be able to do. However, we are going and are on the way.

The Chairman: Thank you very much.

Mr. Shuttleworth: Next I would like to introduce Mrs. I. Barker representing the Garden Club.

Mrs. I. Barker: I did not prepare anything. The only thing is that the Garden Club was formed eight years ago to help people with that sort of project. At the moment we have about 70 members and each year we have awards for the most presentable gardens. However, I think we need a lot more interest in this project.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Mr. Shuttleworth: I would like to introduce now Mrs. Jean Dale from the TOPS Club.

Mrs. J. Dale: The TOPS Club started from about 7 members who branched out from another area outside of this area. We have grown to about 18 now. We have our meetings each Wednesday night in a teacher staff room, for which we are thankful. We do not have to pay any rent for that space where we would have to pay rent outside somewhere else.

From the TOPS group some of the ladies have branched out into other fields working in the community.

Mr. Shuttleworth: Excuse me, Jean. Can you tell us what TOPS stands for?

Mrs. Dale: It is "Take Off Pounds Sensibly". That means without diet pills, without fad diets. And it works. I can vouch for it working. It really does work. We are very pleased with the results we have had with the girls there. We all work very hard and we really enjoy the meetings. If anybody would like to come, men or ladies, please feel free to join in.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Mr. Shuttleworth: I would now like to introduce Mr. Walter Molnhuber of the Lawrence Heights Judo Club. Where is Walter? Is Walter in the house?

The Chairman: Well, we are going to have an open discussion but there will be refreshments first.

Mr. Shuttleworth: I think we would have the refreshments now and then we could bring our coffee back.

The Chairman: All right, we will have a break now for refreshments and then we will come back here. Bring your coffee with you. Would you just go out and get your coffee and come back and we will start an open discussion.

(A short recess.)

The Chairman: Could we come to order, please, and we will continue the meeting. I just wanted to say something at the start as to what is the value in having the senators here, what good are we doing going around asking about poverty. We have been across Canada from Halifax to Vancouver and we have had this thrown at us quite a number of times by people who do not know what the Senate is or what the Parliament of Canada is, as a matter of fact, in a great many cases.

I might just say this to you, that we have had a great number of inquiries in the Senate very similar to this, although this is a very much more intensive inquiry because we are doing a lot of travelling around in order to have a confrontation with the people themselves, with the poor, including the working poor.

We are out to find answers to the problem of poverty. We are not dictating the question of poverty to you. Everybody knows what poverty is but we are trying to find out what, if possible, is the cure for poverty.

In the Senate we have had a number of inquiries, as I was saying. We have had the old age pension inquiry. It brought along an Act to increase the old age pension. We had the aging committee. We had the land use committee which is a tremendous thing as far as the rural areas of Canada are concerned. There was an Act brought down by Parliament after the Senate made its inquiry, and that inquiry lasted about two years before they came up with a solution. The Senate had the manpower inquiry. This resulted in another Act being brought forward by the Parliament of Canada after an inquiry by the Senate.

So we hope—mind you, this is just our feeling—that we can come up with a solution to the problem of poverty, and that is why the Senate is making this inquiry and travelling around. It is a rather expensive job but it is not as much as you might think because we do not travel at a great deal of expense.

I just want to say now that I have enjoyed very much coming down here tonight and listening to you people. You followed along very nicely. You have given us a lot of ideas. We have had a tremendous experience at the Duke of York School this afternoon. We had a memorable experience there this afternoon going through on a tour of that school and listening to those teachers and getting questions from the community there. Now we have had the same thing here. It is indeed a terrific experience to see and hear you people.

We are not getting answers to our poverty questions really. However, it is to a certain extent giving us ideas as to how the community helps itself, particularly this co-op idea, using a little room to start a co-op. This is really a community development, and it helps tremendously to see a community working for themselves in that regard. This is what is really needed, people involving themselves, as far as I can see, in the community. And poverty may be helped that way, by the community helping themselves and having a certain amount of help given to them so these people can be brought up out of their depressed condition.

Senator Sparrow: May I pursue your comments somewhat further, Mr. Chairman, and directly to answer, I suppose, Mr. Zwerver and perhaps similar questions in other minds?

The Chairman: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: I would just like to say this, that the real value of a study by a committee such as this, whether you realize it or not, is the publicity that the problem of poverty is getting. Pick up your local newspapers, this morning's edition, or today's afternoon edition, and see two full pages at least ringing forcefully the problem of poverty in Toronto to the fore. Look at your TVs tonight at the 7 o'clock program and our national news tonight. We were on national CBC radio this morning bringing the problem of poverty to all of the people of Canada.

The people of Canada are going to pay the cost if poverty is going to be solved. Therefore they have to be conditioned and sold on the idea that poverty does exist. It would surprise you the number of communities we go into and the individuals we talk to and so many of the citizens who do not understand the problems say, "Well, all you have to do is get those lazy no-goods to go to work." We have to make that message a false message that they are getting across.

We have to let them know that of the poor people 40 per cent are the working poor, 30 per cent are the poor who are the one-family heads, primarily mothers who are one-family heads. We know that 10 per cent of those are the disabled. We have reasonable assurance that only 5 per cent of the people at the poverty level are those who might be no good as such and might be able to make a living if they were really ambitious. If you talk of 5 per cent of the total people in that condition of poverty, it is a very low figure. This is a message we have to sell to the Canadian people because they have to be taxed to cover this cost.

You suggest, Mr. Zwerver, and I am not critical because this is general thinking, why does this committee spend the money and go around? Why don't we give the money to the poor?

The total cost of these studies and the tours in Canada might very well amount—this is in relation to four million people on the poverty level or below that—might in fact amount to 2½¢. per person who is poor. The total cost to each individual Canadian might be ½¢. per Canadian. If you want to base these figures very easily, that is $100,000. It would cost each Canadian a half cent. With 4 million Canadian people at the poverty level and below, if the cost were $100,000, and make any multiple of it you wish, it would be 2½¢.

Surely it is of value that we try through this national medium to get across to the Canadian people that poverty does exist. Poverty does not only exist in the City of Toronto, it exists in the maritimes, it exists in northern Saskatchewan. You have seen the reports on the Metis and Indian problems. There are poor people in other cities as well. They are spread all across Canada.

If we talk about money, and I will just talk about money for a moment, Mr. Chairman, where do we place the emphasis? Where are the Canadian people ready to place their emphasis on these: housing, health, education? Somebody mentioned pollution.

In the next 10 years we are going to require approximately 3 million housing units in Canada. At least 40 per cent of those housing units should be built for the poorer people. The total cost of those 3 million units would very probably run to $60 billion. If you relate 40 per cent of that to the poor people, we are talking of an expenditure in 10 years of $24 billion for housing alone.

I just want to give you one more figure. Of the 4 million people who are at the poverty line or below, 30 per cent are in fact single people, either a single woman or single man, and 70 per cent are family units as such with a single family head or a two-head family. If for each single person who is below the poverty level you increase their income in one year by $500, that would amount to $600 million.

If you gave a family, and I think any one of us here would agree this is not very much money, if you gave each of the ones below that poverty level an additional $1,000, we are talking about $2 billion-800 million. Now that is a total for those groups of $3 billion-400 million additional cost per year. That would mean a 30 per cent increase on all levels of federal government taxation, including tariffs, income tax, every form of taxation.

We have to get across the message to the Canadian people that this is the cost, and we have to convince them, you and us and anyone else we can get on our side, to convince the Canadian people that this is a necessary expense and, in fact, that it is really not an expense, that it is an investment in people. We are investing this money. If we can convince the Canadian people that this money should be invested in those citizens it will pay us all back in the long run. So let us convince them it is an investment and not a cost.

Mr. Chairman, I am sorry to have taken so long on that.

Mr. Chairman: Thank you very much, Senator Sparrow. I might say to you all that he is another farmer from Saskatchewan.

Do you have anything you want to ask, Senator Carter?

Senator Carter: I think we are all familiar with poverty. We all run into it in our own little spheres but this is the first time that anybody has taken a look at poverty on a national scale, as a national problem.

Just following along with what Senator Sparrow has said, we in Canada are spending $7 billion a year on various forms of welfare. That is all levels of government, municipal, federal and provincial. The federal government itself is spending somewhere between $3½ billion and $4 billion of that money. If we can only save 10% on administrative costs we are saving $700 million. It is a great problem and this is the first time anybody in Canada has ever taken a look at it from the national viewpoint, looking at it in its totality on a national scale.

Mrs. Shirley Clark: I think we all understand what the Senate is trying to do, and think we are quite aware of your billions of dollars and everything else. However, to the people who are poor, when you are talking in billions of dollars you have lost us. We are talking about $20 a week or 10c. in our pockets tonight, not your billions of dollars or where you are saving 10%.

You have said that 5 per cent probably of the population of poor people are the lazy ones. The rest are there because of circumstances. They are willing, if they are there by circumstances, to stand on their own two feet, but not with charity. This is, I think, what most people classed as poor people are trying to get across to everyone. We don't want charity. We don't want someone knocking on our door and giving us a cheque for $60 a week or something and saying, "There, we are done with you until next week when we can give you another cheque." We would like something that is going to give us a helping hand to stand back up on our own two feet and start working for ourselves again.

I am sure everyone at some point in their lives has fallen flat on their face and they have been down and out. But the poor people, as you class them poor people happen to have fallen flatter than most, I guess, and they cannot get up on their two feet. Depression and everything else sets in and then you are classed as being in poverty and put in the Lawrence Heights project with fences all around. We are built up so we all have our little clubs and we are all patting ourselves on the backs saying how great our little community is with these little clubs that we have. But this is not what we want, and we would like the Senate to know that we would just like a helping hand.

We don't want billions of dollars spent on us in feeding us and things of that sort. I know the government is supposed to be doing this for us but do not concentrate on the face of larger welfare cheques and things like that. And when we do go to welfare asking for help let us not have door slammed in our faces, not be sworn at and called names and everything else, which happens very often.

It is really atrocious some of the ways that people have been treated by different social services. We all have the social services to go to and they are really great, but if you have not the problem they are looking for, or if you haven't got what they really want to take care of right then, they are not going to help you. You have to depend on yourself. It is just the fact that when you are poor and you have fallen down and you just cannot do it any more you need strength from other people, not cheques once a week that just make you feel more insignificant, more dependent and more incapable of standing on your own two feet. I think this is what we are asking.

The Chairman: Thank you very much. This is what the Senate is trying to find out, how to do it without throwing money at you.

Mr. Montgomerie: One way you can do it of course, with all those billions, is that I would like to get a little piece of it for the school. I am serious because if there is the poverty cycle that people talk about, one of the ways of breaking it is to go to school. And let's be honest; you know for a long, long time schools have not done very much for the poor. We are a middle-class institution run by middle-class people supporting middle-class values. The poor people come in and what we try to do is give them enough experience so they become middle-class. It doesn't work. One of these days we have to find out what it is like to be a poor child and build on the strengths he brings to us and build an educational system on that.

You cannot do that on a ratio of 25 pupils to a teacher in a room. You have to do it with one or two kids at a time. That is the way to work it with kids. Our board cannot afford it. The Metro board sets the pupil-teacher ratio and that's it. They make allowances for us but the allowances are not enough to deal with the problems here. I say, if we are going to break the poverty cycle, we have to zero in on education and perhaps have federal grants to this kind of school and we can spend the money further reducing the pupil-teacher ratio.

Senator Sparrow: Can I just say this though, that in the interval surely you must see that each citizen in the community has a basic standard of living. If this basic standard of living under the economic system is too low, it must be raised at least to give some dignity at that level so you could start on the educational level, putting those funds there.

Mr. Montgomerie: If I wait until that happens it will never happen. We have been saying this for a long, long time. I am afraid I cannot wait any longer and I don't think the community can wait any longer for some guy to turn around and give more money. It is not going to happen. It has to happen now in schools so that the kids coming through the schools are not going to be locked into some communities.

The other thing is that they ought to have their heads read for ever building a community like this in the first place. This was no thing to do to people, putting 5,000 poor people into one community. It is ridiculous.

Senator Carter: Mr. Chairman, I don't think there is any point in entering into a debate.

From the Audience: That is what we came out for.

Senator Carter: We didn't come down here to debate. What is done is done. We cannot alter this community. It is all very well for Mr. Montgomerie to say he wants money. We all want money.

Mr. Montgomerie: You misunderstand me, sir. I think inner city schools must be given money whether in Saskatchewan, Halifax, or Toronto or North York. They all have to have more money. We cannot get it any more from home-owners, so we have to get it some place else. If the federal government puts a high priority on education, let them put their money where their mouth is and give us some.

The Chairman: Does anybody else have any comments they would like to make?

Mr. Ed Ryan: I would like to take on the senator away at the end. I am also from the maritimes. From the maritimes come to Toronto a bunch of refugees. Our jobs are taken away from us. Our homes are taken away from us. Our buildings are taken away from us. I arrived in Toronto and across the road was this refugee from Czechoslovakia. He was better prepared when he arrived in Toronto than I was. He was supported by the Immigration.

We arrived here and were destitute in every way. If we take sick we don't know a soul. We have to look for a job. We have to look for friends. And even today the branch of the Legion to which I belong has asked for people to give their names as volunteers for pall-bearers. People come up here, especially from the maritimes, and die and they cannot raise six friends to be pall-bearers. Now, there is an area that needs to be looked into. And it is brought about by bad administration, especially from Ottawa.

They have urban renewal grants, ARDA and other grants. These grants are used not to promote industry down there but to send out anybody who may interfere with the status quo.

Mr. M. Cairnduff: When your travels take you to St. Thomas, Ontario, I hope you look into the situation down there at the present time where you cannot get a hotel room or any kind of accommodation because of the refugees who came from Czechoslovakia a few years ago and located down there. The hotels down there are full of them. The manpower offices have special facilities set up. There is English language training. Job opportunities are created and all the rest of it. And yet our Canadians from the maritimes come up here, are berated and criticized. They seem to be sort of infringing on what we consider to be the affluent part of the country.

While I am on my feet, I would like to make a few observations that I think are worthy of consideration. And they are not necessarily in this order of importance. I am lamenting for one thing that this meeting so far has not heard from two groups that I feel are significant in terms of Canada's development. I refer particularly to one group being the senior citizens or older citizens whom we have not heard from at least at this meeting, having in mind that we do have a senior citizens' project in this area right in our midst.

The other thing is I have been following with interest your travels across the country right down to your arriving here in Toronto, and I have yet to hear any veterans' group, including the Legion and the other groups that might be mentioned, who have raised the question of poverty as it affects a very significant group, namely the ex-servicemen of the Second World War who traditionally since that war ended in 1945 have been afflicted with the problems of housing, which other Canadians have also experienced, of course, but we were supposed to have some preferential treatment, you see, when the war was on and when the war was over, and now after 25 years we are sort of forgotten. There are still many veterans and veterans' families who are suffering and being deprived of the basic things of life and living on minimal incomes.

I would also like to point out to you gentlemen that veterans' benefits in this province of Ontario do not meet the benefits that the recipients receive under the provincial legislation, the family and social services. In the case of a veteran with a family of three or four or five children, the benefits of their war service disabilities and war veterans' allowances do not meet the benefits that are awarded by Ontario. I do not know about the other provinces but that is so in Ontario.

There is another thing. Right out here you see the traffic moving up and down the expressway that is going to be completed down, as we understand it, into the city despite the opposition of many people in this area. Instead of some priority being set to provide public transportation which could serve the needs of the people in this area, many of whom cannot afford private cars, what do we do? We see the expressway going through, which is adding to the hazards of pollution and soon. The politicians involved seem to want to put this thing through but there is no provision for rapid transit at least in the immediate future. I think that might give you some idea of the thinking of the politicians.

The Chairman: Thank you. Has anybody else any comment to make?

From the Audience: I think the whole purpose of Lawrence Heights or any other housing development is more or less defeating its own purpose because a housing project such as this should not be for permanent residents. It should be more or less a transition place between the time people move out of a flat until such time as they can buy their own homes. The thing is that once you get in here you are trapped.

To give an instance of myself, I have been up here now, I would say, for about ten years. During that time I spent approximately $12,000 in rent to the Ontario Housing. That $12,000 would go a long way towards buying a house or buying two Cadillacs, whatever I wanted to do with it.

The situation is that right now the rents are frozen. If a person gets a raise the rent does not go up. But people are not saving money. I am just as bad about this thing as anybody else; I will say that for myself too. You get a raise and the rent doesn't go up and so you say, "Okay, next week instead of buying one case of beer I am going to go out and buy two", or "Next week I am going to buy steak instead of hamburger."

I think when a person gets a raise, if his rent is not going up, the authorities should say, "Okay, we are going to take so much of your money on your raise, we are going to hold that money in trust for you, you cannot touch it, but we are taking it. It is going to be put in a bank account."

It could not be touched by the government for any purpose. When there was enough money in that bank account to make a down payment on a house then they would give you your money back and say, "Okay, boy, you are out. Here is your down payment. Move out of here and buy your own house."

From the Audience: It would take you years to do that.

The Previous Speaker: I don't think it would.

The Chairman: The problem here, of course, is that even with the rents frozen the cost of living is going up so rapidly you need this extra money to keep living.

Mrs. B. Aoki: I would like to reply to Malcolm's statement. The senior citizens knew what was going on tonight and were very interested but they had a free night with the Metropolitan Police choir at the community centre. This really had some enjoyment for them and that is where they are right now. I hope they are having a ball.

There was also the matter of Manpower. I am very upset with Manpower. We have kids who do not have a three-year work term and they cannot be retrained because they have not been to work, and this is not fair.

My husband is in university. I cannot have a loan for him. He works full-time, supports me and my three kids, and the Ontario Housing says, "So what?" and the government says "So what?" I want help and so do other students like my husband. I am one of the woman who the Women Electors said I should have an abortion—because I am pregnant. And she should be shot.

From the Audience: On this Manpower thing, we wanted to get a job during the summer and for us to get a job we have to go all the way down to Weston Road. Like, the Manpower centre at Yorkdale, they practically turn around and slam the door in our faces. So what are we supposed to do?

From the Audience: It really doesn't matter where you go right now. Young people just cannot seem to get any jobs through Manpower. Other organizations seem to do a much better job.

From the Audience: When I was unemployed and I went to Manpower at Yorkdale there was this man who took over, like the manager, and I went in something like this and they told me I had to wear a suit and a tie, you know. I don't have the suit. I cannot afford it.

The Chairman: Well, Manpower has a variety of managers. I think it is the particular person at each location that might cause the discontent. Is there anyone else?

From the Audience: Tonight is the first time I have heard the people themselves, the poor, if you want to class them as that, speak for themselves. They have had other people speaking for them all day long. Perhaps if there had been prior publicity before coming to Toronto besides the one little box in the Globe and Mail and Star, they would have been here in droves. You might have generated a little more interest and you would have had more participation by the people and you would have heard a little more from the poor.

The Chairman: We were disappointed ourselves. We were very disappointed with the results of that ad.

From the Audience: So far everybody has been patting themselves on the back with the wonderful job they are doing for the poor but they don't mention the things that are still lacking, that are still needed.

The Chairman: We only got three letters. We expected at least 1,000 letters to come from Toronto.

From the Audience: Well, I write to the members and they don't answer their mail.

Mr. Vernon Singer: I am a member, and I answer my mail.

Mr. Montgomerie: The other thing is, you know, the poor people are not here. They are home right now. The problem is that you put the tables up, eh, and you are senators. Well, right off the bat you might as well forget about it because I know the people around here and the worst thing you can do to them is put them in a formal situation where they have to stand up in front of, you know, leading citizens of the country and say something. I think they are all scared to say things.

You are going to find out about the poor if you come to a coffee party. You can sit down and talk with them. You can go into their houses and find out how they live—not how they live, but how they get along—on the money that they get.

Also come to the school and see how the kids come to school. Then you will learn something about the poor. The poor are just not here.

Mr. H. Zwerver: Looking at this agenda, the first X number of people on the agenda are professionals. Getting back again to the same point that we don't have the poor here, who decided this was to be the agenda? I would have preferred to have representations from the community and then maybe have professionals react in terms of what services were or were not provided. I think we are doing it backwards.

Senator Carter: We did not draw up the agenda.

From the Audience: Well, you missed out on your job.

Senator Carter: No. We left it to the people here. We fitted into your own program. We came here to do what you wanted done.

Mrs. B. Aoki: Tell them what happened on Sunday, please, Dale.

Mr. Shuttleworth: We were given some direction as to what you people wanted and the direction I got personally was that you wanted to hear something from the professionals in the community and you wanted, of course, to hear from people in the community. So, you know, my concern was that we could have—and I have mentioned this before, and I feel very strongly about it—we could have got together and drawn up a brief, and people could have contributed to that brief and it could have been very, very shocking and very critical and so on, because I have lots of critical things I would like to say. But, you know, the problem is we wanted to involve people. We didn't want three or four people sitting down to make a brief and we didn't want one person reading the brief. We wanted people to come here and feel they had some involvement. Maybe their involvement is simply a matter of getting up and saying a few words about something they have done. At least it is a form of involvement.

One of our big problems in this community is that people just take these things for granted. They become dependent upon the types of services that all of us so-called professionals give them. And we are getting very frightened about this because we say maybe we should get out of here, maybe we should all pull out of here, and let the people do it for themselves. We wonder if we have not created something in the process. We are concerned about this. Maybe this is what the story has been tonight. Maybe this is a very dependent community. I think we have to face that as a reality too.

Mrs. S. Parker: I think Mrs. Aoki may be complaining about the fact that nobody turned up Sunday for a meeting that nobody knew about because we didn't get notice until Monday. This happens with voluntary organizations, we all realize. However, I have to agree with Dale.

My big beef about this community is that we have become a tight little group, we have tied ourselves up in neat little packages with ribbons on. Each little organization is a closed organization. We have a huge community and three-quarters or more of the people in this community are not involved with the things that go on in this community.

Our principal says he first has to teach the children love. He teaches the children love instead of arithmetic which they have to have to go on to the other schools.

Mr. Montgomerie: Who said "instead of"?

Mrs. Parker: I did. I have two of them there. They don't get enough love at home. The houses are too small for the children to be living in and you cannot give love in a 2 x 4 box. You just cannot do it because there are just too many problems. You know, it is just one big mess. Maybe if, as Dale says, there were not quite so many involved, outside social worker people running the organizations, maybe we could get down to earth.

One of the things I would suggest is that coffee parties are not reaching this community. They are lovely for the people who attend I'll admit. I have enjoyed myself at many. However, you are not reaching the people of this community. You have to open this school and invite the people to complain and every thing else. I might say I have not been so invited.

Mr. Montgomerie: I publicly invite you.

Mr. Parker: No, I want to come with a lot of people. They should come as a group.

Mr. Saul Cowan: As one who is not a resident and who perhaps earns two or three times more than most of the people here, I don't want to appear apologetic and I don't want to be made to feel apologetic or guilty because I happen to like working here and I enjoy the people and because I want to be helpful. I don't only want to be helpful to the people in Lawrence Heights, I want to be helpful to the whole of North York. I don't want to feel apologetic about it and I don't think any social worker needs to either.

The only thing we need to be apologetic about is short-sightedness, narrowness of point of view, of thinking we are the centre of the universe, of not allowing, and working for, people to become independent, self-sufficient and have initiative. That we have to be defensive about.

However, where professional workers are trained well, and there are plenty of the others that are not, and where their attitudes are proper and where their ideas are to build autonomous people and where their purpose in life is to develop people, nobody has to be apologetic. You can work wherever you want to. You can do a job. You can do a service well in good areas and you can do it in poor areas.

Our ideas and our purposes must be judged on their merits. If we are not doing a job then somebody should come and do a better one. I think we are filling vacuums. I don't think if all the professional people walked out tomorrow that suddenly all the initiative would rise and all the people would take things in hand and do things in a wonderful way.

Mr. Cairnduff: Give us a chance.

Mr. Cowan: All right. We have argued that having plenty of times, Malcolm. What I say is that there is nothing to be gained by way of exonerations. What we need is good, sound ideas, a faith in each other and an ability to work together. Above all, I think we have put too much emphasis on the power of verbalizing, on the power of communicating. I find that the finest people I have met cannot talk too much. They think and they feel but, because they cannot talk, they cannot express themselves, they are not fluent, and their position in society goes down to the bottom.

I think we are putting too much stress on that and we should be putting more stress on people as people who think and feel, even though they are not fluent and cannot talk for themselves. We should begin to get more of a society with better values to consider people as people and be willing to not only give them their rights, but see that they have their rights, as people. I think that is one of the important things in this whole procedure.

From the Audience: As a student who has lived here for about 11 years now, really I think the whole fault sort of lies with the parents themselves. This is not a generation gap. I have lost contact with a lot of my friends even though I have lived that long around here. I have always had stressed to me, "Get an education. If you don't like it here, work and get out of it." When I was a kid I used to save my allowances and buy things. My first Barbie doll I bought myself. My parents always stressed staying in school. My friends are not taught to stay in school. I see them marrying now and moving into the apartments across the street and across the way.

I think the whole fault lies with the parents. I think it ties in with the coffee parties because the people that are coming to the coffee parties are the parents who really care. The parents who don't, their kids are not being told to stay at school. They are more interested in getting boy friends or girl friends. They don't care about what is ahead of them.

I think a lot of it comes through. I came up through Guides so I saw kids coming back from Mexico and showing me films. So now I don't want to sit at home. I want to go and see these places. I think a lot of it lies there. The kids are not being given the ambition. And a lot of it is in the home. The parents are sort of apathetic to education. A lot of them are. And I think a lot of it could lie there.

The Chairman: The answer to the problem there is that your professionals here have done their job as well as they could do it but they have not got in touch with the people at the bottom of the ladder and brought them into this community in the same way you feel they should be brought in.

The Previous Speaker: I have seen kids pulled out of school to be babysitters.

The Chairman: This is a problem of each and every one of you, not just the professionals. Each of you here tonight who has heard these stories should get in touch with these people and get them here and into contact with their community, and build your community as a whole and not as small groups. Build your community as a whole and then you will have something.

Mr. Ryan: I think too many of us haven't roots and we are too old to acquire them. We have no roots and we will never have them here.

The Chairman: I think your problem is to get involved in your community.

Mr. Ryan: In September I will probably move. I am involved in the community a lot for a fellow who has only been here a short while but there are no roots and no way of getting roots.

From the Audience: What effect are you having on your children? Are they the same way?

Mr. Ryan: Yes, my children have no roots. Of course, I will admit that I have a daughter who is trying to overcome that.

Mrs. Shirley Clark: You find someone with an empty stomach, a mother or father at home with four or five children and no food to put on the table and the children are crying because there is no food, that this frustrates the mother. This goes on day after day and she is not going to love those children because they are a responsibility. If you can get out to the people and offer them some kind of encouragement and help them to stand on their own two feet rather than just give them charity all the time, you will find them coming out to the schools, to your coffee parties, to everywhere. However, you have to go out and get them or the people in the community have to go out and get them.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Senator Carter: Mr. Chairman, when I came here tonight I didn't of course know what I was coming to. I came here from a school—what was it?

The Chairman: The Duke of York school.

Senator Carter: The Duke of York school, which was a special kind of school which is evolving in an certain type of community. I understood that the reason we were here tonight was because here was another school that was being involved in the community and working out the problems of the community. As a member of the Senate Committee I wanted to find out from them what they were doing, how they were doing it, what the results were going to be. I didn't think I was coming here to debate government policy, to debate Manpower, or to debate dollars and cents. I came here to learn. I mean this sort of thing can go on forever and ever.

As well as everybody else, I know when you come to the matter of education you are into a terrible problem in Canada because we have divided jurisdiction over it. You can put the blame on one or the other. However, the ordinary person who is poor wants his child educated. He does not understand the niceties of all the constitutional problems that are involved in it, and you can add to the confusion rather than eliminating it by making references in some sort of a general way.

I did not come here for that. I came here to learn. I thought we were going to have presentations. We did have 26 of them. I listened to them all pretty carefully. I thought after that we would be able to ask you some questions because there were other things, other points and questions raised by the information that we were given by the various people who participated. I thought we would be doing more of that, but I see now our night has pretty well gone.

The Chairman: I think you have the wrong idea. I think the community here has got involved in one program and they have themselves in a tight little corner, and I think this same group have now discovered that they are out of touch with their own community and that they will now be able to get to work and get the whole community involved. I think it is a very satisfactory meeting for the community.

Senator Carter: I agree with you that good will come out of it, but it was not my original idea or what I expected when I came here because they can come and have their self examination any time.

From the Audience: I want to reply to the senator. He said he did not remember where he was earlier today. How is he going to remember tomorrow where he has been tonight?

Senator Carter: I did not say that. I did not say any such thing.

Mr. V. Singer: I am a little surprised at the senator from Newfoundland, because if you did not learn anything here tonight I really believe you have missed the message. I represent this area and I have had a great deal of education here this evening. There are problems, and surely this is one of the messages that communities such as this one have to send back to you, so that you and your com-leagues in your wisdom can sit down and, hopefully, come up with some answers. But this was a learning session. Certainly it was for me, and I would have hoped for you.

Senator Carter: It certainly was. I did not say I did not learn anything. I said it was a very useful session but I said this was not what I expected.

Mr. Singer: This is part of Toronto.

The Chairman: It is now half past ten and I think we should call this meeting to an end. Have you anything more to say, Mr. Singer?

Mr. Singer: No, I am finished.

Mr. Cairnduff: I asked you a question, I think. Perhaps I should have put it more clearly in the form of a question. I would like to know if you would give some indication as to what presentations you have heard thus far relating to veterans as a group?

The Chairman: We have not heard any, as a matter of fact.

Mr. Cairnduff: I think this is sort of lamentable on the part of veterans' organizations because there is a real problem there.

Mr. Montgomerie: If you have some questions, senator, I think you should be able to ask them. We asked a lot of questions.

The Chairman: We are really not here to ask questions. We are here to find out what you want to say.

Mr. Cairnduff: There is the muddled picture with regard to various jurisdictions at various levels of government, like the Veterans Affairs Department, the Department of National Health and Welfare, just to mention two at the federal level, and then we have the provincial social and family services, and I don't know what other services are provided by the province, and then we have the Metro government who have a welfare administration here at the civic level. It seems to me at least to be a very muddled situation. Doesn't that relate to the fact that we haven't a constitution in this country Isn't that the problem?

The Chairman: No.

Mr. Cairnduff: Or an outdated constitution, in any event.

The Chairman: No, no. We have lived a hundred years with it. We can bear with some corrections, of course.

From the Audience: My concern is about unemployment in Canada. About half a million people are without jobs. That means no jobs, no money and no food of course and many other things. And besides that, they have lots of free time with nothing to do. Each one has a hard time either way.

The Chairman: These are problems we cannot settle here. It is a policy that has nothing to do with us on the poverty problem.

The Previous Speaker: In another ten years we will all be unemployed.

Mr. Montgomerie: Not the senators, they are in for life.

The Previous Speaker: I would like to ask or to know about this huge territory of Canada, and it has such resources and lots of money, I believe, and it has lots of people. I would like to do something. And the unemployed, I am sure, would all like to do something, but they are all tied up, they cannot do anything because they are not allowed to do it. They would like to have a piece of land and at least a free bus to get somewhere and do something. As I say, they are just tied up with no food, no money, no job. I think we should all do something about it.

The Chairman: You are right.

The Previous Speaker: I hope this message will be considered.

The Chairman: I think we will have to adjourn because it is getting too late. We have a lot of work to do tomorrow. We have a lot of briefs to hear yet. Thank you very much for turning out.

The meeting adjourned.

THE MUNICIPALITY OF METROPOLITAN
TORONTO1970 Welfare and Housing Committee
Membership:

Controller Karl Mallette (Chairman),
Borough of Scarborough; Mayor True
Davidson, Borough of East York; Mayor
Edward A. Horton, Borough of Etobicoke;
Alderman Karl Jaffary, City of Toronto;
Alderman June Marks, City of Toronto;
Alderman William Sutherland, Borough of North York; Mr. Albert M. Campbell
(ex-officio), Chairman, The Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto.

The Welfare and Housing Committee is a Standing Committee of the Council of the Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto, the members of which are appointed by the Council each year. It is the duty of the Committee to consider and report upon all matters relating to welfare services and housing accommodation as provided for in the Act and such other matters as may be referred to it by the Council or the Executive Committee for a Report.

The attached brief to The Special Senate Committee on Poverty was prepared and approved for presentation by the Welfare and Housing Committee on Thursday, February 26, 1970. The Committee at this meeting also authorized the Metropolitan Commissioner of Welfare, Mr. John G. Anderson, to present the brief to the aforementioned Special Senate Committee.

Mr. John G. Anderson was appointed on December 19, 1966, as the Metropolitan Commissioner of Welfare upon the assumption by the Metropolitan Corporation on January 1, 1967, of responsibilities of public welfare, which became an obligation of the Corporation as of that date.

Mr. Anderson heads the Metropolitan Department of Welfare which is responsible for the following operations:

(i) Administration of Welfare Assistance in accordance with the statutory provisions of the Province of Ontario, and with the policies of the Metropolitan Corporation;

(ii) Administration of the Hospitalization Division (responsible for hospitalization of indigents, post-sanatorium care, burial of indigents and transportation and certification of mental patients);

(iii) Administration of Child Welfare Division (responsible for financial arrangements for Children's Aid Societies, Training Schools, Day Nurseries);

(iv) Development of long and short range plans and programmes with respect to the operation of the Department's services and facilities for the consideration of the Welfare Committee; and

(v) Such other duties as may be assigned from time to time by the Metropolitan Council.

1. DEFINITION OF POVERTY

1.1 Poverty in Canada, particularly in urban, industrialized sections of the nation, is no longer limited to a meaning of indigency or lack of the bare necessities of life. Urban Canadians particularly have demonstrated that poverty includes the inability to acquire and enjoy without stigma those goods and services which are necessary to preserve human dignity.

2.1 Legislation under which most welfare programs operate has traditionally, and does to-day, limit itself in many ways to the basic necessities of existence.

2.2 Municipalities in Ontario provide assistance to "needy persons" and the definitions of need most often used are provided under the General Welfare Assistance Act or the Day Nurseries Act.

2.3 While the Day Nurseries Act provide greater latitude for debts and earning exemptions than the General Welfare Assistance Act, the general provision is to aid persons to obtain the basics of life without recognition of the amenities.

3.1 Municipal welfare payments now approach and in many cases pass the earning capacity of many recipients. Many others in the community not in receipt of welfare (including Unemployment Insurance beneficiaries) work and live on a level equivalent to or below the welfare standard.

3.2 In this group, financial pressures to which welfare recipients are not subjected, discourage the wage earner. Drugs, medications, dental care, optical provisions, garnishees, can reduce such families to a financial level below that of a comparable family in receipt of municipal welfare who may be spared such costs.

3.3 Municipal recipients are in turn disadvantaged in many ways in comparison to recipients of more permanent allowances at the Federal or Provincial levels where work opportunities and wage exemptions permit at least some incentive to increase their total income beyond the welfare level.

3.4 Much of the client bitterness at the local level of administration comes from the local inability to ignore or exempt the casual or limited earnings of the recipient.

3.5 The point has been made almost too often to bear repeating, that only at the welfare level is greater effort expected without rewards. Just as few workers will undertake longer hours, harder work or more responsibility without recognition or higher pay, it must be expected that welfare recipients will resent and resist losing all of each dollar they earn.
